No. 1566. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, January 2, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE accounts of the Toy Fund for the past year are now being made up, and will be published in due course. But I am tempted to defer the publication, first, by the fact that as matters stand at present the balance is still very much on the wrong side, and secondly, by the hope that there are still many readers of Truth who intend to contribute, but for one reason or another have not yet done so. I earnestly trust that they will avail themselves of the few days of grace still remaining, and that the Fund may be cleared of all debts for the past year before the accounts are finally published. The award of prizes in connection with the Albert Hall Show has been delayed by the Christmas holidays, but I hope that it will be issued next week.

Among the contributions to the Toy Fund acknowledged last week there was one of £2 15s. from the gun-room officers of H.M.S. Russell. With this remittance came a letter informing me that the money was originally subscribed for the Poor Children's Society, of Trinity-street, Borough; but after reading the observations on the society that appeared in Truth a few weeks ago, the officers decided instead to send the money to the Truth Toy Fund. I have also been informed that a remittance is being forwarded to me under similar circumstances from another of H.M. ships. I gather that it is Breton's custom to send out forms of subscription lists to Service messes at Christmas time, and I only wish I could have frustrated his intentions in a few more cases. I mention these incidents because in the course of a year many hundreds of people must be saved from wasting their money on undesirable charitable objects by reading Truth; and I do not know how they can show their gratitude better than by following the example of the two naval messes mentioned above.

I have to acknowledge the following contributions towards the Toy Fund:—

E. P., 2s. 6d.; Bombay, £1; J. R. O., £1 1s.; Miss Mayne, 2s.; Francis A. Crittall, £1 1s.; C. A. R. S., £5; J. M. S., £10; Adolph Hirsch, £5; C. H. B., £1; Antelope, £1 1s.; M. A. and D., £1 1s.; S. Further acknowledgments appear under "Mammon" and on the Puzzle Pages.

The King and Queen, who are this week on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire at Chatsworth, will spend the latter part of this month at Windsor Castle, and it is expected that their Majesties will arrive at Buckingham Palace for the season about Wednesday, the 30th. The King is to be accompanied by the Queen when he opens Parliament on Tuesday, February 12, with a full State ceremonial. His Majesty will hold the first Levee of the season in the Throne Room of St. James's Palace a few days after the opening of Parliament, probably on Monday, February 18. The first Court of the season, which will be a diplomatic and official function, is to be held by their Majesties in the ballroom of Buckingham Palace a few days later, probably on Friday, February 22. There will be a second Levee and a second Court a week or ten days afterwards, and these will be the only State ceremonials before Easter.

The King intends to spend the month of March at Biarritz, where he will occupy the Villa Bellefontaine, which is also known as the Château Boulard. This residence is surrounded by gardens, which are well laid out, and extensive grounds. It is probable that during the first week in April the King will pay a three days' visit to the Spanish Court at Madrid, proceeding afterwards to Cadiz, where his Majesty will join the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert for a cruise in the Mediterranean, which will most likely extend to Naples, Corfu, Athens, and Venice, but, of course, nothing can be definitely settled for some time to come.

The King and Queen will receive only one more house party at Sandringham during the present winter, and there will be four days of shooting, one of which will be devoted to a battue in Wolferton Wood, the best pheasant preserve on the Royal estates, and another to the wild fowl on the marshes between Lynn and Hunstanton and the Wash. The battues which had been arranged for last week were stopped by snow, and the King and the Prince of Wales and the guests at the Hall (Count Benckendorff and Lord Howe) were out only on Thursday and Saturday for a few hours in the home preserves.

I hear that the King and Queen of Denmark will probably arrive in England, on their State visit to the Court, either on Monday, May 6, or on Monday, May 13, and it is very likely (if the later date is chosen) that they will remain in England over Whitsuntide, in which case they are to spend the holidays at Sandringham. The State visit at Buckingham Palace will extend from Monday until Saturday. On leaving England King Frederick will proceed on official visits to Paris and Brussels, rejoining Queen Louise afterwards at The Hague.

Last year only one of the Extra (i.e., Royal) Knights of the Garter died, and that was King Christian of Denmark, the doyen of the Order. He dated from 1865. There were two creations, the King of Norway and the Grand Duke of Baden. There was one death among the Knights on the statutory foundation of the Order—the late Duke of Rutland, who was replaced by Lord Carrington. Lord Spencer (1865) is now the doyen of the Order of the Garter. There was also one vacancy among the Knights of the Thistle, which was caused by the death of the late Lord Leven and Melville, who was succeeded by Lord Aberdeen. The Duke of Atholl, who received his green ribbon from Lord Beaconsfield in 1868, is the doyen of the Order of the Thistle. No vacancy occurred in the Order of St. Patrick, of which Lord Gosford is the senior Knight.

It was announced in the last number of TRUTH that the Duchess of Buccleuch contemplates resigning the office of Mistress of the Robes, which she has held altogether for a period of over eighteen years. A weekly journal, repeating this news, adds, on its own account, that the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe is the only ex-Mistress of the Robes. As a matter of fact, the present Duchess of Devonshire held the office of Mistress of the Robes (as Duchess of Manchester) in Lord Derby's second Government, from February, 1858, until June, 1859. The Duchess of Manchester was the youngest peeress that had ever held the post, and there was some carping at the appointment because she is a German by birth. At that time, however, most of the Dukes were either Whigs or unmarried, and Lord Derby found a difficulty in filling the post, as it was refused for private reasons by both the late Duchess of Buccleuch, who had been Mistress of the Robes from 1841 to 1846 under Sir Robert Peel, and by the late Duchess of Atholl, who had held the office under Lord Derby in 1852. The Duchess of Manchester's appointment was a complete success in the end, and her retirement was much regretted by the Court set.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia, who have been spending the holidays at Bagshot Park, are to leave London for Marseilles on their way to China on Thursday, the 10th. The statement that the Royal party will return home from the East by way of Canada is incorrect, as they are coming back through Egypt. It is probable that the Duke and Duchess of Connaught will spend part of next winter in Canada.

Princess Christian and Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein are to be the guests next week of Lord and Lady Exeter at Burghley House, Northamptonshire, where there will be a large party to meet the Royal guests, who are to arrive from Windsor on Monday. There is to be a dance at Burghley on Friday, the 11th, which will be the night after the county ball at Stamford. Burghley is a stately house of immense size, which was built during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. There is a long succession of handsome rooms, which contain superb old furniture and fine tapestry and china. There is a most interesting and valuable collection of portraits of great historical interest, including some noble works. The best pictures in the gallery of Old Masters were sold at Christie's many years ago, and many of the works of this school which are now on the walls are either copies or absurdly misnamed. The grounds were laid out by Capability Brown, who formed a lake of over thirty acres. The park is extensive and beautifully wooded, the numerous avenues of elm, lime, and chestnut being remarkably fine. The park is seven miles in circumference, and pleasantly varied.

A weekly contemporary announces that Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg are residing at Jugenheim, "their delightful villa between Darmstadt and Homburg." Jugenheim is a small town on the Bergstrasse, between Darmstadt and Heidelberg. The country residence of Prince Louis of Battenberg in this district is the château of Heiligenberg, which was purchased by the Empress Marie of Russia (wife of the Emperor Alexander II.), and when she died, in 1880, she left the estate to her brother, Prince Alexander of Hesse, and it now belongs to his eldest son, Prince Louis of Battenberg. My contemporary is dolefully astray in its knowledge of German geography, as it refers to Prince Louis of Battenberg's "home in the Taunus." Heiligenberg might just as well be described as in the Ardennes or on the Italian lakes, for it is far removed from "the Taunus."

Count Gleichen, late Grenadier Guards, is vacating the appointment of Military Attaché to the Embassy at Washington, in order that he may return to England and take up the duties of his new post at the War Office. Count Gleichen is the son of the late Prince Victor of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, who was married in 1861 to Lady Laura Seymour, sister of the late Lord Hertford. He is a great-grandson of the Duchess of Kent, through her first marriage with the Prince of Leiningen.

Mr. Balfour, having recovered from his attack of influenza, is expected to join the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire's party at Chatsworth (to meet their Majesties), and early next week he will proceed to Scotland, intending to reside for between four and five weeks at Whittingehame House, after which he will return to town for the session. During the Easter recess (which will occur a fortnight earlier than last year) Mr. Balfour is to be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Percy Wyndham at Clouds, their place on the borders of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, near Shaftesbury.

Lady Burdett-Coutts deserves to be remembered in history, not only for her boundless charity, but for her wisdom. When a mere girl she came into the possession of wealth which might have turned the strongest head. Every temptation to use her fortune for the gratification of selfish desires or ambitions she put away from her from the first. It is evident that she must have formed, while still a child, the resolution of devoting her life and wealth to the benefit of the poor and suffering, and from this resolution she never wavered. A young heiress openly entering on such a course might only too easily have fallen a prey to a legion of parasites in the shape of philanthropic cranks and self-seeking humbugs, but her native good sense carried her through that danger as it carried her through others. That her money was never spent in vain would be too much to say, or to expect; but that in the main it was devoted to worthy objects and with excellent results is undeniable. Only once in her long life was a censorious world disposed to say that she had done a foolish thing, and that was when she married; but the result proved in this case that she was right and the world was wrong.

For APPROVED CHARITIES, see page 59.

There have been few men who inspired more hostility by their opinions and gained more goodwill by their personal character than the late Mr. Samuel Smith. I can say this from my heart, for, outside mere questions of party politics, his strongest convictions inspired me with horror, while even when most irritated by them I could not have said a hard word about him, still less to him. He was a typical Puritan in all respects but one, namely, that his Puritanism never soured in him the milk of human kindness. If it were not profane, I should like to say of him that he hated the sin but loved the sinner. He was a man of considerable business ability, and he showed it in the sphere of philanthropy as well as in trade. He did a great deal of excellent public work, both in Parliament and outside, and many will have reason to regret that his life has been cut short so unexpectedly.

The sudden death of Mr. Blenkinsopp, of Rokeby Close, is much regretted in the North Riding of Yorkshire and in South Durham. He had farmed with great success on a very extensive scale for many years past, and he was widely known and much esteemed. Mr. Blenkinsopp, who was an active magistrate, took a leading part in all local affairs, and he had frequently officiated as judge at agricultural shows. He was a devoted Roman Catholic.

Mr. John Tod, of Lasswade, who died last week, was a celebrated paper maker, and he was widely known in Scotland as a most zealous Liberal. Mr. Tod was one of Mr. Gladstone's most active supporters during the Midlothian campaigns, and he was chairman of many of the Liberal meetings, and worked hard for the party at several elections.

St. Deiniol's Library, Hawarden, which was founded by Mr. Gladstone, has been enlarged by the addition of a new wing, affording accommodation for two wardens and twenty students, which is to be opened to-morrow by the Bishop of St. Asaph. This wing has been built by the Gladstone family, as their joint memorial of the great Minister, at a cost of £10,000. Mr. Gladstone himself expended £40,000 on St. Deiniol's, and £10,000 was obtained by subscription for housing the library, which consists of over 37,000 volumes. Board and lodging are provided for clergymen and students at the rate of 27s. 6d. per week.

After reading the English edition of the Hohenlohe Memoirs I am more than ever unable to understand how the family of the late Prince Hohenlohe can have regarded the publication of his Memoirs as legitimate.

With us it is deemed as improper as it is illegal for the heirs of any person to publish after his death letters of a confidential character written to him, without the consent of the writer. But here we have the most confidential conversations between the German Emperor and his Chancellor made public, in which opinions are expressed by the former in regard to other Sovereigns and to State matters. Be this, however, as it may, the Memoirs are most interesting reading. The first volume refers to a period which has become history, and probably will not be read with so much interest as the second, as it deals mainly with Prince Hohenlohe's action as Prime Minister of Bavaria, and the discussions which took place as to the position of that country as a German State, after the withdrawal of Austria from the German Confederation. In the second volume we are introduced behind the scenes during the reign of the late Emperor Frederick, and the first years of that of the present Emperor. There is much fresh information concerning the dispute between him and Prince Bismarck, and the attitude of all concerned in it, and a vast amount of new light thrown upon the real views of all these august personages. The English translation of the Memoirs, which has been issued by Mr. Heinemann, is an admirable one.

No one who reads Mr. Reginald Blunt's fascinating "Paradise Row" (Macmillan) will fail to regret with him that such an historically interesting bit of old Chelsea should have been pulled down to make way for modern residences. But there is one compensation to be found in the fact that the knowledge that Paradise-row was doomed to the housebreaker, inspired Mr. Blunt to tell the story of the Row and of the famous and interesting folk associated with its old time houses, now no more. When the old landmarks are swept away it is well to have a printed record of them in the pleasant fashion in which they are recorded in this volume.

Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons send me the following letter in defence of their "postcard chain":—

TUCK'S POSTCARD CHAIN.

SIR,—We would not have troubled you in reference to your article of December 19 re our postcard chains now running in connection with hospitals and other philanthropic institutions as to which you have taken up an antagonistic attitude, were it not for its concluding paragraph. In this you say, that the special instructions given by us that the postcards were only to be addressed to ladies were not given out of any regard for the feelings of wives, but because not one man in a thousand would lend himself to such transparent humbug.

We can but regret this assumption that our instructions were given for reasons other than consideration for the fair sex, but that the term in which you thus qualify the promotion of these chains is anything but obvious to the stronger vessel we are fortunately able to prove by figures, which show a very different proportion of male as against female interest in their respective endeavours to benefit hospitals by means of this competition.

These postcard chains, as you are aware, are opened by friends of these institutions and not by us. Of the three hundred chains that have been so originated, sixty-eight have been opened by gentlemen, among whom are governors, treasurers, secretaries, doctors, registrars, and superintendents of hospitals, besides rectors, vicars, and ministers of various denominations. These figures, showing a percentage of upwards of 20 per cent., as against the improbable 1-10th per cent. you suggest, as to the likelihood of men identifying themselves with these postcard chains, clearly demonstrate two things: Firstly, that the name of this Company, which has been running competitions connected with its various art departments for nearly thirty years, during which periods sums aggregating to a very large amount have been paid to the prize winners, whose names and addresses have always been published, stands sufficiently high to assure these men of the world, and the many other thousands of men who have since supported these chains, that the bona fides of this Company is above suspicion. And secondly, that these postcard chains which, apart from the fifty prizes offered, must bring the respective institutions in touch with a very large number of new people who may ultimately be induced to become subscribers, are likely to prove beneficial to these institutions, your contrary opinion on this point notwithstanding.

In your other comment on the scheme you say that this combination of business and philanthropy is very objectionable, and that it is amazing that so many thousands of people should be found who are ready to spend their money in this way for the benefit of a business firm merely on the off-chance of thereby securing a certain proportion of the profit to the hospital. The first proposition is surely a matter of opinion, for it will be conceded that many thousands of pounds would be lost to charities in the course of every year but for some such combination of business and philanthropy. As to the second, we may mention that of the two hospitals which have so far secured the longest chains (the number of albums which we supply gratuitously for the housing of the postcards sent to the institutions, supplying us with this information), both are situated in small provincial towns, the energy of their originators, ladies in both cases, having carried them at present to the front against the many competing London and large provincial hospitals.

Finally, we can give you the assurance that any benefit to our business can only accrue to us in an indirect form, viz., from the additional popularity to be gained for our postcards, owing to the wide field covered by these chains, and not from any purchases for this special purpose by even hundreds of thousands of contributors, the considerable value of our prizes, and the very considerable expense of advertising and working these chains, far more than balancing any direct profit. . .—Yours truly,

RAPHAEL TUCK AND SONS, LTD.
ADOLPH TUCK,
Managing Director.

I understand Messrs. Tuck and Sons to assert in the last paragraph that the whole profit on the thousands of cards that must have been sold by means of their scheme is absorbed by the prizes, and advertising and working expenses, and that the only value the thing has to them is the indirect one of serving as an advertisement of their goods. I confess I am astonished to hear it, and I wonder they did not say as much when advertising the scheme, for many people must have shared my opinion that the firm would make a very big profit out of it. But I have never questioned the right of Messrs. Tuck or anybody else to run such a competition for trade purposes. The fundamental objection to the scheme, which nothing in the above letter touches, is that every penny spent on buying and distributing those cards is contributed by people whose object is to benefit some particular charitable institution; that the greater part of this money is divided between Messrs. Tuck and Sons and the General Post Office; and that from the nature of the case only a limited number of institutions will receive any cash benefit, and the majority of them only an album of postcards. From the point of view of charity, the scheme involves a huge expenditure of labour and money for an insignificant result. From that point of view, therefore, it is wholly delusive.

The only people who are assured of a profit out of it, whether direct or indirect, are the Post Office and the firm promoting it. As to the part played in the movement by male sympathisers, if the percentage of male contributors is higher than I estimated, all I can say is that I am sorry for my sex.

ON A FALL OF SNOW.

Oh! a beautiful thing is snow—
  Except, of course, in town,
Where dingy and sooty it 'gins to grow,
  From the moment it cometh down.

But on country-side it is fair to see,
  As the meadows it carpets white,
And decketh each naked hedge and tree
  In robes of pure delight;

When blood-red Phœbus wintry gleams
  The frosty welkin through,
Reflects it with such fire his beams
  As opal never knew;

Or when Diana, chaste and fair,
  With pale, cold face doth rise,
Ten thousand diamonds everywhere
  Entrance our dazzled eyes.

Yes! A beautiful, beautiful thing is snow,
  When on dale and down 'tis seen,
Transforming this commonplace earth in a mo'
  To the realm of a fairy queen.

But ugh! When arrives its time to go,
  Why then, say I, Oh lor!
The wet and oozy and draggled snow
  Is a beautiful thing no more.

For the roads are ankle-deep in slush,
  And the by-lanes words defy;
And the gutters in pea-soup torrents gush,
  And the fields are all mud-pie.

And it's nothing but mire and sludge and mess,
  It's nothing but soak and drip,
And the general air of sloppiness
  Might give Mark Tapley the pip.

Yes, a hideous, hideous thing is snow,
  When the sloppy thaw begins,
Transforming our earth to those regions below,
  Where naughty folks go for their sins.

So since, though snow is a beautiful thing
  When it falleth upon us first,
Its subsequent slushy vanishing,
  With all these horrors is cursed,

Towards that self-same beautiful snow
  This is my mental frame,
That, as by coming it's got to go,
  I 'd sooner it never came.

This advertisement appeared the other day in the columns of a weekly contemporary:—

REQUIRED, Lady-Cook-General. Sleep out, 3s. 6d. weekly. Small flat. Adults. 7—10.30 and 5.30—9; one morning till 12. Call before eleven, 11, Stamford Brook Mansions, Chiswick.

It has sometimes been suggested that the servant difficulty may be surmounted by the introduction of "ladies" into domestic service; but as far as I can make out those employers who try this remedy seem to do so because they consider that ladies can be sweated to a degree which non-ladies refuse to stand. At any rate, that is the case with the "lady-cook-general" who is to work over fifty hours per week for 3s. 6d., without lodging, and presumably with only "partial board." Ladies in search of such jobs would do better to turn their attention to charing, in which line I understand that 2s. a day, plus dinner and beer, is the standard "living wage."

The following circular has been addressed to parties doing business with the well-known establishment from which it emanates:—

The assistants at Messrs. Parkins and Gotto's (London Western District Printing Company, Ltd.) respectfully solicit your donation to their Christmas-box fund for general division among the staff, and beg to inform you that this application is sanctioned by the firm, who are strongly averse to gratuities in any other form.

Donations will be received in the counting-house by Mr. J. F. Penny, to whom all remittances by letter may be addressed.

It is rather surprising to find a firm of the standing of Messrs. Parkins and Gotto sanctioning an application of this kind—if, indeed, it is true that they have sanctioned it. The fact that they are strongly averse to gratuities in any other form makes such a proceeding all the more remarkable, for really it is difficult to conceive any appeal more undignified than this. This is, indeed, so obvious that I imagine it will turn out that the circular has been issued under some misapprehension as to the wishes of the principals of the firm.

It is becoming a regular feature of Christmas time for one or two slate-club secretaries to abscond with all the cash entrusted to them, and in view of the magnitude of the defalcations in the latest instance, it seems about time that something was done to surround slate clubs with the same sort of restrictions and safeguards as savings banks, friendly societies, and other concerns to which poor people entrust their savings. I do not know that these clubs represent a very admirable form of thrift. Their main object is to enable people to accumulate funds for Christmas festivities, which is not much better than saving up your money for a "spree," and not saving at all from the point of view of thrift. The probability is that if the money were put into a regular savings bank much of it would be really saved, and that to that extent slate clubs are hindrances to thrift. Mr. Landfear Lucas contends in a letter published the other day that they owe their vogue to the fact that the Post Office savings banks close too early in the evening for the convenience of working-class depositors. It is well worth consideration whether arrangements could not be made to keep a certain number of Post Office banks open till eight or nine p.m. on one or two nights a week—Friday is the most important day from this point of view—and if this incidentally diminished the slate club business it would be a good thing for everybody.

The Christmas of quite a number of minor poets must have been spoilt by a disappointment that they suffered on December 21. That was the appointed date for the announcement of the results of a competition for four-line verses in praise of a boot polish. In itself this was not exactly a soul-inspiring theme, but the promoters of the competition provided another sort of spur to Pegasus by the apparent offer of a first prize of £1,000, a second of £500, a third of £250, and fifty prizes of £5 each—I say the apparent offer, because a close perusal of the rules and regulations revealed the fact that the amount to be awarded in prizes would after all be entirely dependent upon the amount received from the competitors, every verse sent in having to be "qualified" by a payment of sixpence for two tins of the polish.

It would now seem, however, that the proprietors of the article in question, Polishes, Limited, are dissatisfied with the quality of the rhymes (or the quantity of the business) that they have secured by this advertisement—at any rate, instead of giving the results, as they definitely undertook to do, on December 21, they have coolly announced that the competition will remain open till March 14. It is difficult to see how this departure from the original conditions can be justified. As is pointed out by one of the aggrieved competitors from whom I have heard, it is obviously unfair that those who forwarded their verses by the stipulated date in December should now have to encounter the rivalry of those who have another two or three months in which to exercise their muse on the subject of the boot polish.

The new Professorship of Naval Architecture, in the Armstrong College, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. J. J. Welch, who has been for seven years manager of the shipbuilding department of Messrs. Cammell, Laird, and Co., Birkenhead. The Chair is worth £1,100 a year. Mr. Welch has had a large experience of both Admiralty and commercial designing, and he is the author of a valuable text book on naval architecture, written for the use of naval officers.

Dean Randall, who has died in his eighty-third year, was long one of the most active, influential, and popular leaders of the more advanced section of the High Church party. He was a great admirer of Dr. Pusey, and was supposed to represent the traditions of the Oxford Movement, but he loved an elaborate ritual, and there were bitter complaints against many of the usages at All Saints', Clifton, during his long incumbency. His prolonged controversies with Bishop Ellicott excited general attention. Dean Randall was a very able organiser and administrator, and he established a remarkably complete parochial machinery at Clifton, which soon made his church conspicuous throughout the country. His operations were much facilitated by the fact that he was possessed of large private means. It was said that over £5,000 a year regularly passed through his hands for distribution.

Dean Randall succeeded Archdeacon (afterwards Cardinal) Manning as Vicar of Lavington, Sussex, in 1851, on the presentation of Bishop Samuel Wilberforce, with whom he was on terms of intimate friendship. In 1868 he was transferred to the new church of All Saints', Clifton, which was intended to become a leading centre of High Church teaching and ritual. Early in 1892 Lord Salisbury appointed him to the Deanery of Chichester, where he succeeded the present Dean of Bristol, and he remained there for ten years, and then resigned, in consequence of failing health. After Dean Pigou had accepted Bristol the Deanery of Chichester had been conferred upon the late Archdeacon Norris, but he died a few days afterwards. Dean Randall was a most effective preacher and platform speaker, and he was celebrated as a successful conductor of retreats. He laboured incessantly for the Church, with distinguished ability and zeal, for upwards of fifty-five years.

Principal Rainy, who has died at Melbourne at the age of eighty-one, had been for many years the leader of the Free Church of Scotland, and, in his way, he was a great ecclesiastical statesman, but he belonged to the more bigoted and intolerant section of the Presbyterians. He was a zealous advocate of Scotch Disestablishment. He was a consummate organiser, and few men have ever managed their fellows with more dexterity, his success in this department of affairs being the more remarkable when one considers the conceited and obstinate characters with whom he had largely to deal. Principal Rainy succeeded in bringing about the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterians. He carried through the union of the two sects with complete success, but he had ignored hostile legal opinion as to the result of the amalgamation, and he was severely blamed in 1904 when the House of Lords decided that the property of the old Free Church belonged to the protesting remnant.

If there had been any approach to a tactful compromise between the two parties this crash would have been avoided, but Principal Rainy had carried through the whole affair in a very high-handed fashion, and his opponents had good reason to complain of the arrogance with which they were treated. The situation was saved for the Church by the Act of 1905, but overwork, disappointment, and anxiety entirely broke down Principal Rainy's health, although he had received the hearty support from first to last of both his clerical and lay brethren. He left Scotland a few months ago for Australia in the hope of being benefited by the sea voyage and a long rest.

Principal Rainy first attracted general attention early in the seventies, when he delivered a series of most uncompromising lectures in answer to Dean Stanley, whose exceedingly Broad Church views, as set forth in his lectures on the Scottish Churches, had considerably fluttered orthodox Presbyterians, and in Edinburgh they excited a great sensation among the Pharisees. Both lecturers were described by an acute critic as "shallow, inaccurate, prejudiced, and narrow."

The early death of Professor Maitland is profoundly regretted by a very wide circle of friends, and he will be greatly missed at Cambridge, his loss being a most serious one to the University He had filled the Downing Chair of English Law with brilliant success eighteen years. He was a perfect reservoir of precious and peculiar learning, and an admirable writer, his works being eagerly read by students in all parts of the world. He was always kind and encouraging to those who consulted him. Professor Maitland was an ardent Liberal, both in party politics and in University affairs. His last work was the excellent biography of his intimate friend Leslie Stephen.

Canon Henry Scott-Holland has replaced Chancellor Newbolt as the Canon-in-Residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral. Dean Gregory, who is in his eighty-eighth year, is in a precarious state of health. In the event of a vacancy in the Deanery of St. Paul's (which is worth £2,000 a year, with house), it is generally expected that Canon Henry Scott-Holland would be promoted to this office. He was appointed to his stall by Mr. Gladstone in 1884, when Canon Stubbs was promoted to the See of Chester, and it is understood that in 1893 he refused a bishopric which was offered to him by that Minister. Dean Gregory was appointed to a canonry in the Cathedral in 1868 by Lord Beaconsfield, and in January, 1891, he was promoted by Lord Salisbury to his present office, in succession to Dean Church.

Owing to last week's TRUTH having to be published on the Monday morning before Christmas the following letter with reference to recent incidents in the Roman Catholic diocese of Nottingham unfortunately reached me too late for publication in it:—

SIR,—As the Very Rev. Canon Hawkins has of late been the subject of several uncomplimentary references in the columns of TRUTH, perhaps you will allow me to make a few remarks. I would premise that when a layman undertakes to write on Canon Law, or any subject connected therewith, he almost always falls into some inaccuracies. Thus, your correspondent last week asserted that Bishop Brindle had bestowed a canonry on Father Hawkins. This is not correct. Canons in England are chosen in regular turns by the Pope, the Bishop of the diocese, and the Chapter. When Canon Hawkins received his promotion it was the turn of the Chapter to elect, and therefore the reverend gentleman owes his promotion to his brother Canons, and not to the Bishop.

Much has been made of the fact that Canon Hawkins was indicted for slander a few years ago. I fancy that if either you or your correspondents knew the facts of the case your view of the matter might be altered. . . . None of your correspondents seemed to have recognised that for twelve years Father Hawkins lived and worked in the poorest quarter of Leicester, that he enlarged his schools, renovated his church, and won the respect not of Catholics alone but of Protestants also. It is strange that a correspondence which began with the object of exposing Bishop Brindle's treatment of Father Hays cannot be carried on without casting slurs and innuendos on one of the most popular priests in the Diocese of Nottingham. SACERDOS.

Beyond the fact that a verdict was obtained against Father Hawkins in an action for slander, I am not aware that any particular slur or innuendo has been cast upon him by any of my previous corrrespondents. The passage which I have omitted from the above letter gives certain facts in regard to the slander action which I do not feel at liberty to publish, as other parties are concerned, and the facts may possibly be disputed. But I may mention, in case others have forgotten it, that the action in question arose out of a report made to the N.S.P.C.C. which was found to be inaccurate. No doubt, however, it was made in good faith, and I agree that after the case has been closed the mistake which he made ought not to be used to the prejudice of Canon Hawkins. My correspondent who first referred to the case did so, obviously, for the purpose of drawing a contrast between the Bishop's treatment of two priests. He may have been ignorant, as is above suggested, of the circumstances under which the Canon obtained his preferment; but, anyhow, it would seem that the facts justify the inference that was drawn from them.

With reference to what a correspondent said last week about Father Hays delivering a temperance lecture in Mr. Aked's chapel at Liverpool—long after the termination of the dispute between him and the Bishop of Nottingham—another Roman Catholic writes:—

It might be pointed out to your correspondent that Father Hays has never questioned the canonical authority of his Bishop. He has simply resisted the Bishop's uncanonical tyranny. There is nothing in Roman Catholic Canon Law to prevent Father Hays, or any other priest, delivering a temperance lecture in a Baptist chapel, provided such lecture did not form part of a religious service. Whatever Bishop Brindle's motive may have been in depriving Father Hays of his mission, the Holy See has very properly condemned the Bishop's actions, and intelligent Roman Catholics in general, both clerical and lay, rejoice at the fact.

The humble industry pursued by the "Schnorrers" of Jerusalem seems to be in a very flourishing condition. Two or three proofs of this have reached me during the Christmas season in the shape of appeals accompanied by dried flowers from the Holy Land and similar articles, which have been sent out haphazard to people in England. The most remarkable of the goods is a little album in an inlaid olive-wood cover, containing pressed flowers and views of the Holy Places of Palestine. As these bear inscriptions in French, German, English, Russian, and Hebrew, it is obvious that they are got up for the Christian markets of Europe at large without regard to nationality; and the fact of such articles, which I suppose would fetch a shilling or two in the market, being sent out broadcast to strangers on the chance of getting a postal order in return, proves very clearly that the industry is conducted on a very large scale.

As a good many people must be quite ignorant of the nature of this business, I subjoin a sample of these "Schnorrer's" epistles, which are all in more or less "common form":—

Jerusalem, 7, Dizember, 1906.

Honoured Sir,—You will excuse the liberty I take in addressing these few lines to you; it is only the very miserable condition that I am in that forces me to make an appeal to your generosity. My state is indescribable, my need is great, my misery is torrible. My poor children and I get a living from the making of flower cards.

The flowers we collect from Jerusalem's Holy Places, and mount them. From this work me must get a living, but alas, there is very small demand for such articles from this town, and consequently we are in a very poor state, and even dry bread is often denied us poor. Sad and pitiable indeed is my condition, we are naked and foodless. All my furniture has been sold to procure the needful daily bread, and now that I have nothing else to sell I am forced to call your attention, and ask for he'p. Oh, have pity upon us, and aid a poor family; our misery is great indeed.

I take the liberty of sending you a nice flower album as a remembrane of Jerusalem's Holy Places, and as a specimen of my hande-caft, with tho sincere desire that same will be acceptable and that you will help my innocent ones and myself, so that all least we have dry bread during the time.

And the Lord God Almighty will help you, and shower down His blessing upon you for this act of kindness to a suffering co-religionist. . . .—Yours most respectfully,

E. B. Mazrachi.

P.S.—I kindly beg of you to send answer per registered letter or per postal order, otherwise it may get lost.

I do not wish to do an injustice to a suffering co-religionist, but the wood-work of the aforesaid album bears a strong resemblance to that turned out at Sorrento and that neighbourhood, and I shall be surprised if the printing was not done in Germany.

With reference to the remarks in last week's Truth on an advertisement in the Guardian of a pocket Communion service in solid silver, published by Mr. Hurcomb, of Devonshire-street, Islington, I have received letters from Mr. Hurcomb himself and also from the manager of the Guardian, and from clergymen who have had dealings with Mr. Hurcomb. From these communications I am quite satisfied that Mr. Hurcomb's advertisement—though I am bound to say that it is open to such an inference on the face of it—does not belong to "the same order as all the offers of cheap plated goods that are to be found in the press with the suggestion that they emanate from private persons disposing of goods second-hand." Mr. Hurcomb also states that his advertisements only appear once in three weeks, and only in the Guardian, the manager of which paper informs me that he is personally satisfied of the general accuracy of Mr. Hurcomb's statements. I gather that Mr. Hurcomb is a dealer on a large scale, with a wide and honourable reputation in his trade, and that when he said that the article which he was offering at 27s. 6d. "cost 63s.," he did not mean that it cost him that sum, but that this was its original price new. The bargain offered was therefore a genuine one, and the inference suggested by the advertisement that it might be something else was altogether erroneous.

Without having any desire to add myself to the embarrassing number of inspired army reformers, I have always maintained since the conclusion of the Boer War that the most important military problem requiring solution is the formation of some sort of coherent and efficient secondary army out of our mass of amorphous and half-baked auxiliaries. I rejoice, therefore, to see that the recognised instructors of the public, professional and amateur, seem to be arriving at the same conclusion. In all his recent speeches, down to that which he delivered on Saturday last, Mr. Haldane has been careful to indicate that this is the task to which he is specially addressing himself, though he has been equally careful not to drop the slightest hint of the plan by which he hopes to accomplish it. I gather generally that what he desires to impress on the public mind is that our most pressing military need is an organised and efficient auxiliary army of a quasi-civilian nature, available both for home defence and in some measure as a reinforcement of the regular army for service abroad in time of emergency; and that the Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry must be prepared as patriots to sacrifice their individuality in some degree, and merge themselves in such a force.

That this general idea is sound is hardly open to question. Whether the means proposed for giving effect to it will be at once adequate and acceptable remains to be seen. Meanwhile, on Christmas Eve the Military Correspondent of the Times—one of the most confident and not the least persuasive of our military evangelists—gave us some useful points for consideration in relation to "the future of the Militia" in the impending reorganisation. He has settled the amalgamation of Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry entirely to his own satisfaction, and he is particularly desirous of impressing on the Militia that only by such a process can it be rescued from the process of decay; but incidentally he reveals many of the difficulties which lie in Mr. Haldane's path.

The two difficulties which chiefly impress me are those of training and service abroad in time of war. The Times correspondent treats it as accepted that the old system of using the Militia to reinforce the Army in the field by means of voluntary drafts is to be abandoned; and clearly Mr. Haldane has conceded this up to a point by his proposal that a certain portion of the Artillery, Army Medical Corps, and Army Service Corps shall be maintained in time of peace as militia, but be mobilised with the regulars for war. It seems only logical to extend this principle to the Militia infantry, and this must be done if they are only to serve abroad as complete units, which is what representative Militia officers contend for. But it is out of the question that this principle can be applied to the Volunteers; they are, and always must be, enlisted for home service only. At the outset, therefore, we are met with the fact that one fundamental distinction between the Volunteers and Militia must be maintained, in spite of any formal amalgamation of the two into one territorial army.

Then in regard to training. Volunteers, unlike militiamen, are not paid individually when training, though Government grants are made to units collectively. As long as Volunteers serve without reward, they must train more or less on "go as you please" principles; and even if you decided to pay them, it does not follow that you could then get them to conform to definite regulations as to training, because the pay is no consideration to them, as it is to the militiamen, and if they cannot give their service at their own convenience they will not give it at all, pay or no pay, as experience has already shown. And the more you labour to improve the efficiency of the militia troops (e.g., by giving them six months' training on enlistment), the more you differentiate between them and the casually trained voluntary troops.

I do not say that these difficulties are insuperable, but until the means of overcoming them are formulated, I fail to see how the desired "national army" can be anything like a homogeneous force, or how the amalgamation of the Militia and the Volunteers can be effected except in name and form. And I have a profound horror of that class of reform which consists in giving old things new names. Being modest, I am sincerely anxious to learn; but it seems to me at present that however desirable it may be to rehabilitate the Militia and convert it into an efficient territorial army, if its principal function is to be that of a second line for service abroad in war—and perhaps even to some extent a first line, as Mr. Haldane contemplates—it has far more in common with the Army than with the Volunteers, and if "amalgamated" at all, would be better amalgamated with the former than the latter.

One of the most singular features in the revived controversy over the Channel Tunnel is the alarm with which representatives of the Army view the project. The average civilian fails to see that the security of this country against invasion would be appreciably weakened by the construction of a narrow subterranean passage from the Continent twenty-four miles in length. The soldier—I do not mean every one of them, but many in positions which lend authority to their views—considers the tunnel would to all intents and purposes destroy our insular position. He has no confidence in the ability of the Army to hold our end of the "tube" against surprise, or to recover it when once lost. This frame of mind is no doubt due in a large measure to the natural modesty of soldiers, and I suppose it may also in part be attributed to their experience of the aptitude of military arrangements to prove themselves defective at the moment when they are most needed.

It is not clear to my mind that military opinion alone should be allowed to determine this question. What about the Navy? The British end of the tunnel must be within a mile or so of the sea-coast. Assuming, as the alarmists do, that a forlorn hope from the other side of the Channel succeeded in capturing the British end of the tunnel, and that all arrangements previously made for guarding against such a contingency failed at the critical moment, of what use would the position be for the purpose of an invasion of England in force, so long as we held command of the sea? The foreign force holding the mouth of the tunnel will be under the fire of all the ships in the Channel that we can bring to bear on it, as well as of all land forts which may be constructed for the defence of the opening. To my untutored mind it appears that an invasion of England under such circumstances must be a degree more difficult than an invasion by sea in that "temporary absence of the Fleet" which is the principal stock-in-trade of panic-mongers. I should very much like to hear what the naval men say as to their own ability to prevent the British end of the tunnel being used virtually as a landing-place for a hostile force.

At the same time there is beyond question an element of danger in constructing a tunnel so long as any respectable body of military opinion regards the work as likely to facilitate invasion. If eminent soldiers are to go about preaching that we are liable to have an irresistible French army pouring through the tunnel at any moment, our civilian panicmongers will have an argument such as they have never yet possessed. Considering how difficult it is now to persuade nervous people that millions of German soldiers cannot be landed on our shores at any well-chosen moment, it is quite conceivable that a Channel Tunnel may bring conscription in its wake, kill the "blue-water school," and lead to the abandonment of naval defence. Judging from recent utterances of the two leading Service journals, the views of military experts which killed the tunnel scheme in the early 'eighties still flourish. Military notions have undergone so many changes since that date that one cannot help hoping that if the question were reconsidered to-day by a competent body of military and naval experts, with the authority of the Committee of Defence behind them, less nervous views would prevail. But at any rate the promoters of the Channel Tunnel Bill should make it their first business to convert the Army, and give us some security that the conversion will be permanent.

Surely the custom does not still prevail in the Army of expecting an officer who is about to commit matrimony to make a cash donation to the mess? A naval correspondent asks me to enlighten him on this point, and says that he has heard of as much as £50 being donated under such circumstances. I have heard of such a custom in a long bygone era, but if it is still kept up, I imagine it can only be in very few and very select regiments. I know a good many men who have married in the Army, and it would surprise me to learn that some of them ever gave the mess £5, let alone £50, to celebrate the occasion. Perhaps some of my Service readers can enlighten me on the subject.

An Eminent Physician says: "Every one in any way delicate, especially on the chest, should have a gas fire in the bedroom. Not one atom less healthy than coal."

One of the things in the British Army which no outsider can understand is the possibility of a commanding officer having under his command an officer of higher rank than his own. I believe such a thing has happened in a regiment before now, and there is a story of a second-in-command who took advantage of his superior army rank to publicly reprove his commanding officer for the lack of smartness in his battalion; to which the C.O. retorted by ordering the battalion to parade every afternoon under the second-in-command until further orders. I heard the other day of a case in India where it is alleged that a brevet lieutenant-colonel, holding only major's rank in his regiment, and drawing major's pay, loses no opportunity of giving orders to the commanding officer of another corps, and is even said to have done the same to his own. Is there any other army in the world where this absurdity prevails?

There is much growling in the non-commissioned ranks of the 2nd Battalion Royal Scots over the fact that a man promoted to quartermaster-sergeant in January last without a first-class certificate of education has been allowed to continue in his appointment up to the present date, although he has twice failed to pass his examination in the interval. It seems to be quite clearly laid down that a man shall not hold his rank more than six months under such circumstances, and it is impossible to understand why regulations are laid down on such points if they are not to be strictly enforced, seeing that the breach of them necessarily creates a widespread sense of injustice. In this particular battalion the N.C.O.s have been strenuously exhorted to educate themselves and improve their professional qualifications, and have been assured that their promotion will depend on the result. Numbers of them have energetically complied, but only to find that the prescribed qualifications for promotion are set aside unceremoniously when the time comes.

From a letter recently received from a colonial station I gather that one effect of the recent change in the pay regulations has been that numbers of men, who have extended their service on certain terms in regard to service pay, now find that these terms have been altered to their detriment. They were liable to reduction on failing to reach the prescribed standard in musketry, or for other reasons, but they were not to have their service pay reduced below 3d. Under the new regulations, however, they are liable to lose it altogether. One of the aggrieved writes:—

> Those who extended their service to complete eight years with the colours, consider this a great shame, as the Government induced us to extend on these conditions, and now after we have extended at once alters them. If an employer did the same thing in civil life he could be sued for breach of contract, but all we can do is to complain to the press, and we are liable to be punished for doing that.

It seems to me that the War Office ought to congratulate itself that men can ease their minds by writing to the press, regardless of regulations, when they have been treated in this fashion. I do not suppose that there was an intentional breach of faith, but if the terms of the contract made with such men have been merely overlooked by accident, that does not help the men, or diminish the discontent created. It is to be hoped that the Army Council will speedily arrive at some fixed and permanent principles in regard to Army pay, for the incessant changes that have gone on during the last four or five years have produced nothing but confusion, dissatisfaction, and incalculable administrative trouble.

I have received the following from an eminent naval officer with reference to the disturbances among the stokers at Portsmouth:—

> Sir,—Referring to your notice of the mutiny at Portsmouth, it may not be generally known that Moody, the stoker, was a notoriously bad character. He headed two mutinies on board the Ophir when the stokers struck, he then being in the merchant service, and he joined the Navy subsequently, so he earned all he got.
> With reference to Commodore Stopford, of whom you speak kindly, his fault was in being too lenient. In this he only followed his illustrious kinsman, the hero of Acre, in allowing Sir Charles Napier to have all the credit, instead of trying him by court martial, as he deserved. As you truly say, Lieutenant Collard was chiefly responsible for the trouble, and got off very easily.—Yours faithfully, Admiral.

If the above statement in regard to Moody is correct, it is difficult to understand how the man could have got into the Navy at all, and some means ought to be found of preventing men who have gained bad characters in the merchant service from transferring themselves to that of the Admiralty. Apparently Moody was not the only bad bargain in his branch of the Service, for during the last few days it has been stated in the daily papers that several other undesirables have been summarily dismissed at Portsmouth. It is pretty evident that the maintenance of discipline in naval barracks requires, among other things, that a good deal more care should be exercised in getting rid of troublesome individuals than is necessary on board ship; and I take it that the authorities are learning this lesson. I suppose that stokers are naturally a rougher lot than the average seaman, and they must be looked after with proportionate care. The new commander at Portsmouth Barracks seems to have begun with a judicious combination of the fortiter in re and the suaviter in modo, and one may hope that he will have no difficulty in restoring a proper spirit among his men.

There was a little incident on board H.M.S. Cæsar, while the Channel Fleet was at Portland on the eve of departure for Spain, which is worth attention at this juncture. A contractor's steamer came alongside with canteen stores, and two parties of sixteen men each were told off to transfer the goods to the warship. The men had a strong idea that the contractor was bound by his contract to deliver and stow the goods himself, and the first party before going to work deputed one of their number to convey to an officer their objection to undertake the job on this ground. The officer endeavoured to refer to the contract, but, as it could not be found at the moment, he ordered the men to start work. They hesitated for a moment; he gave them five minutes to think it over, and they then went to work. Next day they were brought before the Commander, who read them the Articles of War applicable to mutineers, and they were then passed on to the Captain, who told them that after stating their objection they were bound to comply with the order, and I understand that they received some punishment.

Up to a point, the Captain's view may be sound; but granting that the correct procedure is to state your objections, and then obey orders, this implies an obligation on the other side to consider the grievance afterwards and put matters right as justice may require. It does not appear that this has been done in the foregoing case. The point which the men raised, and were entitled to raise, namely, that the contractor was bound to find the labour for his own job, remains undetermined. The men are left under the impression that they have been wrongfully put on to work which was not properly part of their duty; that they have been lectured, and punished, and threatened for the future, where they ought to have had a sympathetic consideration of a legitimate grievance; and that they have no security against the same thing happening again to-morrow.

It is all very well to insist upon prompt and unquestioning obedience to orders; but you have got to remember in these days that men are not unreasoning machines. They have well-developed ideas of their own on the subject of justice; and if you require, on grounds of expediency, that unjust or illegitimate orders shall be obeyed, you can only ask for such obedience provisionally, and on the understanding that strict justice will be done at the earliest opportunity. The fault of naval discipline seems to be that it worships the letter and thinks far too little about the spirit.

At the request of the Committee of Management of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, Lord George Hamilton held an inquiry at Deal on Monday with reference to the grievances of the crew of the Walmer lifeboat. The evidence that was given fully established the justice of the men's claim to the usual payment for the launch "on service" on April 3—a payment which was recommended at the time by the local committee but refused by the authorities at the headquarters of the Institution. No doubt Lord George Hamilton's decision will be acted upon by the Committee of Management in London, and so an end will be put to this unfortunate dispute. It is to be hoped that alterations will also be made in the regulations concerning launches with a view to the prevention of any further incidents of the same kind.

I hope, too, that the Committee of Management will see that in future representations on behalf of lifeboat crews are treated with more courtesy and consideration than the Walmer men received from the officials of the Institution. They were curtly refused a hearing when they appealed against the decision which has now been reversed, and it was not until after public attention had been drawn to the matter in Truth that the inquiry was ordered. Of course, all's well that ends well. But if the matter had been properly handled, this dispute could have been amicably settled months ago, and the Institution would thereby have been saved from what developed at last into an ugly scandal.

A growl reaches me from the Burma Public Works Department in reference to the non-enforcement of "the law of the fifty-and-five" in the case of various subordinate officers. In the higher grades of the department officers are compulsorily retired when they attain the age-limit, but among the subordinate staff extensions of service are more or less freely allowed, with the result, of course, that the men so retained in their berths block the promotion of all below them. At the best the prospects of the subordinates are none too bright, and a practice which has the effect of penalising the whole body for the benefit of a few favoured individuals ought not to be permitted.

Dr. Branthwaite's recently issued report as Inspector under the Inebriates Acts is of considerably more than passing value. Dealing but briefly with the details of the work of the year under review, he makes an exhaustive study of the reasons which have been responsible for bringing inebriates within the purview of the Acts. He arrives at the conclusion that the majority of persons who have been sent to reformatories are suffering from obvious mental defect, mainly due to congenital weakness, and accentuated by improper treatment.

Brooklands Automobile Racing Club.—Nomination circulars, entry forms, and racing rules can be obtained on application from the Secretary of the Brooklands Automobile Racing Club, Carlton House, Regent-street, London, S.W.

He further declares that the committal of habitual drunkards to prison is both useless and inhumane, and that the only chance of reformation depends upon their early committal to special medical treatment. A new and valuable feature of the report is an appendix containing sketches and photographs of habitual drunkards committed to reformatories, and altogether, the Blue-book should prove of extreme interest to the scientific temperance reformer.

A serious indictment of the management of the Waterford District Lunatic Asylum is set forth in some letters that have recently been published in a local newspaper. Various incidents that have come to light during the past few months have aroused misgivings as to the efficiency of the administration of this establishment, and if the further statements made in this correspondence are correct, sweeping reforms are urgently needed in the interests both of the unfortunate patients and the public at large. It is suggested that so much work is thrown on to the shoulders of the medical superintendent that it is practically impossible for him to exercise the necessary close supervision over the attendants, male and female, with the result that much laxity prevails, and the treatment of the patients is far from satisfactory. The diet is said to be very inferior in quality, and in the case of many inmates so deficient in quantity that they are more or less continually in a state of semi-starvation. These matters obviously demand the serious attention of the Governors of the Asylum, and if—as seems to be thought—they are too self-satisfied to look into the complaints themselves, it is to be hoped that the authorities at Dublin Castle will direct an inspector to hold an inquiry into the condition of affairs in this asylum.

Some time ago the Longtown Board of Guardians were sharply criticised on account of their callous treatment of an applicant for out-relief, and they have since endeavoured to evade criticism by conducting their business as far as possible in secret. This course was adopted at a recent meeting, when a discussion arose concerning the treatment of two little boys from the workhouse who attend a local public elementary school. One boy, aged eight years, was sent to the school "with the measles full out upon him," and both he and a younger lad were insufficiently clothed, while the mid-day meal with which they were provided—the only food they get between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.—consisted of chunks of dry bread and a small bottle of milk each. After discussing the matter "in committee" the Guardians communicated to the press a resolution severely censuring the master of the workhouse for his neglect, and ordering that children attending school should be properly clad and have a more liberal diet. But such a disgraceful state of things ought not to be disposed of in this hole and corner manner. There is evidently something seriously wrong with the administration of a workhouse where little children (who really ought not to be kept in a workhouse at all) can be so cruelly treated, and a Local Government Board Inspector might be usefully employed in holding a public inquiry.

My attention has been directed to a discussion by the Windsor Guardians concerning the case of a man named Brooks, who was employed for over twenty years in the Royal Gardens at Frogmore. It seems that after keeping him on sick pay for some time the Board of Green Cloth granted Brooks a pension of £20 a year. Though dating from October 1, however, the first payment of the pension did not become due till January 1, and meanwhile, Brooks, being destitute, sought refuge in the workhouse. The Guardians at first thought of calling upon him to repay them for his maintenance, but on learning the facts they appear to have recognised that it would be unreasonable to do this, considering the meagre amount he will have to live upon on leaving the workhouse, and the matter was accordingly adjourned for a month.

One of the members expressed the opinion that the Board of Green Cloth were to blame for leaving the man in the lurch for three months, and this seems to be a justifiable criticism. How was the man to live in the interval between the cessation of his sick pay and the payment of his first quarter's pension? The practice of paying small pensions quarterly is open to serious objections, for, as everyone knows, it results in thoughtless and improvident recipients getting into difficulties which they would avoid if the money came in once a fortnight or even once a month. In the case of workmen living in the place where the pension has been earned it would be an easy matter to arrange for the payments to be made every fortnight, or even every week, and it is hard to understand why the Board of Green Cloth does not carry out this simple reform.

A pauper named Walker was haled before the Ramsgate County Bench the other day for the crime of taking into the workhouse a quantity of spirituous liquor (to wit, a very small bottle of rum) without the consent in writing of the master. It appeared that he procured the rum for a man who was lying ill in the workhouse infirmary. No previous complaint had been made against Walker, and the master of the workhouse stated that he was a well-behaved man and a good worker, who had given satisfaction by his conduct as a wardsman in the infirmary. In spite of this testimonial, however, the Bench, remarking that "discipline must be enforced," committed Walker to gaol for fourteen days in default of payment of a fine of 20s. The magistrates were Mr. H. B. Hammond (in the chair), Colonel Curling, Captain Vaile, Captain Higgins, and Mr.

Tomlin. I do not know whether the predominance of military men on the Bench was in any way accountable for the harshness with which this pauper was punished, but, in any event, it is monstrous that such an offence against the workhouse regulations should be visited with a fortnight's imprisonment. The necessity for the maintenance of discipline is made the excuse for many severe sentences in the Army and Navy. Even in a workhouse it is doubtless requisite that rules shall be enforced, but this object could surely be achieved without subjecting an offending pauper—a first offender, too—to the terrors of court-martial justice.

A stalwart Radical Lord Chancellor at issue with many of his own followers and overwhelmed with praises from his life-long opponents, is an object, I think, for respectful sympathy. It is easy to understand Lord Loreburn's difficulty over the magistracy. Ten years of the Halsbury régime have resulted in the complete Toryfication of the Commission of the Peace. To what an extent the process has been carried may be best seen by the full information on this point which has been published in the Tribune. There is one county, at least, in which there is not a single Liberal J.P., and none in which the Liberals are not in a hopeless minority. All who know Lord Loreburn must know also that nobody can appreciate the scandal of this state of things more keenly than the Lord Chancellor.

But to recognise the scandal is one thing, and to put it right is another. The thing can only be done by appointing hundreds, if not thousands, of magistrates off-hand for no other reason than that they are professed Liberals. A Liberal Chancellor who does this reduces himself at once to the level of Lord Halsbury, and rivets on the country permanently the rule that the appointments are to be purely political, for it is not to be expected that the next Tory Chancellor will depart from a practice instituted by Lord Halsbury and ratified by Lord Loreburn. If politics are not to be accepted as the sole qualification, then the Chancellor must ascertain what other qualifications a candidate possesses. Here he is met by two difficulties. The Lords-Lieutenant are the official channel of recommendation. The majority of Lords-Lieutenant, being Conservatives, will have no difficulty in certifying the all-round eligibility of the Conservative nominees, but are highly likely to discover fatal shortcomings in the Liberals. If the Lord Chancellor is not disposed to take a Lord-Lieutenant's opinion as final, he must institute his own independent inquiries respecting the parties. For this purpose he has no official machinery, and when some hundreds of names are in question, it must neccessarily be a difficult and lengthy business.

It seems to be impossible, therefore, for Lord Loreburn to redress the balance quickly, if he is to reject the principle of making the appointments on purely political grounds, and to perform conscientiously what he conceives to be his duty in ascertaining that candidates have suitable qualifications before he appoints them. It is alleged against him that he has accepted the recommendations of Lords-Lieutenant in the case of Unionist nominees while insisting on further inquiry respecting Liberals. But it is evident from the nature of the case that a Lord-Lieutenant may state circumstances in regard to a candidate whom he fancies which would justify the Lord Chancellor in making the appointment, while doubts may be suggested in the case of other men which make further inquiry necessary.

The moral of all this is that the present system is radically bad, unless political appointments are to be accepted as the universal rule; and as Lord Loreburn seems to be fully conscious of the difficulty, it may be hoped that he will attempt such a reform of the system as would relieve him of it. In my opinion, the best solution of the whole question is to establish stipendiary magistrates all round. The only objection to that reform worth considering is that of expense, and it is not certain that even that is worth considering. That stalwart Radical body, the West Riding County Council, some months ago arrived at the conclusion that stipendiaries would not cost much more than the present system.

Mr. Justice Stephen, of the Calcutta High Court, seems to be a Draco even among Indian judges. The Statesman of Calcutta pillories a few of his lordship's sentences at the last Criminal Sessions. For attempting to steal an oil canister from a courtyard a man of seventy-five was condemned to ten years' imprisonment—an utterly outrageous punishment, even though he was an old offender. Four years' imprisonment was inflicted for the theft of two pairs of shoes which had been exposed for sale in the street. In a case in which a young fellow of twenty-four was convicted of a theft from his employer, the Judge observed that, taking into consideration his age, he would be let off with "a comparatively lenient sentence, to enable him to pull himself together." This "comparatively lenient" sentence was actually six years' imprisonment! It is not surprising to learn that public opinion in Calcutta has been shocked by these exhibitions of judicial ferocity, and it is to be hoped that the Government will reduce the sentences in question to reasonable limits.

The Chichester Shallows whose names are inscribed in my Legal Pillory this week are seemingly ignorant of the existence of the First Offenders Act and destitute of the compassion which—quite apart from the special statutory provision for such cases—magistrates might be expected to display towards a youthful delinquent like the boy McEwen. It was essentially a case in which the defendant ought to have been bound over to come up for judgment if called upon, and the sentence of four months' hard labour is an outrage on justice which will be, I hope, at once corrected by the Home Secretary. The matter, however, demands the attention of the Lord Chancellor as well as of the Home Secretary, for magistrates capable of passing such a sentence on a youthful first offender are manifestly unfit to be trusted with the administration of the law. Further examples of magisterial severity in dealing with charges of petty larceny and poaching are given on the same side of the following list, while in the opposite column are some instructive illustrations of the leniency with which offences of brutality and cruelty are treated. Conspicuous among the latter is a decision of Hon. Sheriff-Substitute Walker at Dunfermline. I would point out to this functionary that though he may, as he says, lack language strong enough to express his abhorrence of a wife beater, that is no reason—rather the contrary—why he should let the ruffian off with a ridiculously inadequate fine instead of awarding him a well-deserved term of imprisonment.

Hove Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. Jonathan Field, charged with cruelty by working a horse whilst it was in an unfit state; and William Alfred Field, charged with causing the animal to be so worked. The horse was in a shockingly poor and weak condition, being "simply skin and bone," and the Mayor described the case as the worst of the kind that he had ever had before him. Fined 20s., including costs.

Though I have not thought it worth while to make any allusion to the Spanish Prisoner for some time past, it must not be supposed that he has ceased to prey upon the credulity and cupidity of the public at home and abroad. The inquiries that I receive show that he is still carrying on the same old game, and it appears from a recent issue of the Egyptian Gazette that he is just now devoting special attention to residents in that country. Perhaps, therefore, another word of warning may be useful in saving some innocents from being victimised, though I have long since come to the conclusion that no amount of exposure in the press will ever put a stop to this venerable confidence trick.

An individual named A. Newman, of 6, Ingate-terrace, S.W., professes that he has a well-tried and practical betting system—so well-tried and so practical that it has not lost in any year since 1869. Even then the loss, which occurred in July, was recovered before the end of the season, and owing to the further improvements since made in the system, it is "now believed to be perfect." During the past season, for instance, there was a gain from the first week and the capital was never touched. Yet, instead of selfishly exploiting this gold mine for his own benefit, the philanthropic Newman is spending money on advertising in the sporting press in order to find strangers whom he can enrich by means of the system. Those who entrust him with capital for the purpose of working it will certainly deserve any loss that may befall them.

Through the recommendation of a writer in a weekly sporting journal a gentleman some time ago began sending his betting commissions to A. J. Bee and Co., Craven House, Kingsway, W.C. For a time he was a loser, and altogether he paid the firm some hundreds of pounds in settlement of his accounts. Once or twice a comparatively small sum was due to him on settling day and on these occasions he received cheques. Presently a week arrived in which he came out a winner of about £80. This time, however, no cheque was forthcoming from A. J. Bee and Co., and in reply to a request for payment the backer was favoured with a letter from their solicitor saying that he was instructed to accept service of any proceedings that might be commenced against them. In view of the provisions of the Gaming Act it is, of course, futile to take proceedings for the recovery of such a debt from a firm of this character, and so after giving them plenty of time in which to pay up the backer has placed the facts before me for the purpose of a warning to other possible victims. In their book of rules A. J. Bee and Co. append to their name the words "member (sic) of the Beaufort Club." It will not surprise me to learn from the secretary of the club that this statement, designed to inspire confidence in the firm, is incorrect.

All touting usurers are noxious vermin, but some are more noxious than others, and in this category I place those who make a practice of directing their seductively worded offers of cash advances to persons in positions of trust and responsibility. Railway stationmasters, for instance, are continually being tempted in this way, and among the moneylenders now circularising them are H. T. Lewein and Co., 160, Regent-street, W., and L. Phillips, 31, Gower-street, W.C. When a man in such a situation as that of a stationmaster falls into the toils of harpies of this character, he is, of course, practically at their mercy, being obliged to submit to their extortions or else run the risk of getting into trouble with his employers through an exposure. One railway manager has, I know, specially warned his staff against the bloodsuckers, and it might be useful if this step were taken on other lines.

SCIENCE IN HYSTERICS.

The Grand Magazine
Most surely, I ween,
Its title of "Grand" should recall,
And—in view of its last—
Henceforth should be classed
No more as the "Grand" but the "Tall."

And why I thus speak
In the stuff you may seek Which Professor Lombroso there prints,
At whose fairy tales glib
E'en De Rougemont might jib,
Or Baron Munchausen's self wince.

Aye, the story's a pearl.
It relates to a girl—
A pretty, hysterical dear—
Who, her eyesight once gone,
Refused to be "done,"
But saw with the lobe of her ear.

Nor that, Sir, is all;
But, when later 't must fall
That the taste from her palate did flee,
In versatile mood
And resourceful, her food
She tastes, and enjoys, with her knee.

Eke—astounding to tell—
When the keen sense of smell
Departed awhile from her nose,
Still not to be beat,
She enlisted her feet,
And smelt with the tips of her toes.

Now, I'm fain to confess
That I think the Profess-
Or (ourselves, Sir, entirely betwixt)
Must have been, like the gal,
Rather hysterical,
And got his own senses all mixed.

In short, that the sense
Of his brain most immense—
Whose capacity boundless we note—
Must by similar change
Of locality strange
Have been somehow transferred to his—throat.

The Municipal Councillors of Quimperlé, in Brittany, have devised a way of expressing their disapproval of a proposal of the Legislature which appears to me to be in every way a striking improvement on passive resistance. Their cause of complaint is that the French Deputies, propose to raise their own salaries, a share of which, as the Councillors very justly point out, will have to be paid in part by the taxpayers of Quimperlé. The way in which they have decided to manifest their displeasure at this proposal is by voting an allowance of three francs for every sitting to the Mayor—of Quimperlé, of course—two francs to aldermen, and one franc to councillors. The necessary funds will have to be found, needless to say, by the taxpayers of Quimperlé, who will then have the disgraceful behaviour of the Chamber of Deputies impressed upon their memories. I imagine that, in future, whenever a new Government measure displeases them, the Councillors will, in revenge, immediately double their own salaries. I should not be at all surprised if this new idea were welcomed by some of our own city fathers, for whose consideration I am delighted to offer it.

When Lord Randolph Churchill was Leader of the House of Commons, he was very desirous to bring about a change in the time when the House is in session, and he frequently explained to me how he would effect his object. The Session was to commence in the middle of October, to adjourn for six weeks over Christmas, and to terminate about the middle of June. The financial year was to end on December 31 instead of March 31. Before Christmas the Address was to be voted. Bills were to be brought in and some progress was to be made with them if possible, and Supplementary Estimates were to be passed. On the House meeting in February, the Estimates for the year were at once to be presented.

It certainly would be a change for the good, were each financial year to end on December 31. What happens at present? If the debate on the Address is lengthy, Ministers urge that it must be brought to a close (much to their regret) because so much has to be done before March 31. For the same reason the discussions on the Supplementary Estimates are scamped. No sooner are the Estimates presented than the House is told that the vote for men in the Army and Navy must at once be passed. Everything is scamped up to Easter, and all is confusion. In its present condition the House of Commons is an object lesson in the way not to do things. A good deal is due, no doubt, to the "outs" always wanting to show how little useful work is done by the "ins." But the mode laid down for getting through the work is largely responsible for it.

One of the most necessary changes in the rules is that which is often advocated by Sir Carne Rasch, i.e., a time limit on speeches. When a Member has managed to catch the Speaker's eye, he can prose on so long as he likes. Some Members seem to imagine that the subject under discussion has never been debated, although the debate has lasted hours, and often days. They have before them a big manuscript, and they steadily work it off, ignoring everything that has been said by the speakers who have preceded them. Few listen to them, no one has the chance to read their eloquence in the newspapers. Others, who really are able to debate, or who have to state the intentions of the Government, or of the Opposition, do so at such length, and with such weary iteration, that they take an hour to say what might be better said in a quarter of that time.

There may be rare occasions when a long speech is necessary, but I do not think that I ever heard any speech in the House lasting above half an hour which would not have been more effective if it had been compressed into half that time. Half an hour should be the extreme limit for a speech of a Minister who has to carry a Bill or defend a policy. Half an hour might be allowed to three Members selected by the Speaker who speak in opposition to it, and half an hour to the Minister who winds up the debate. All other speeches should be limited to ten minutes, and, mutatis mutandis, this rule should be applied to the Bills of private Members. Until some such rule is passed, the House of Commons will be a talking shop, and a shop where the talking is, taking it all round, not of a very practical character.

Something must be done to convince a few silly women that they cannot be permitted to make themselves nuisances by defying the law, and rioting within the precincts of the House of Commons, unless that august assembly is to become ridiculous by submitting to such nonsense. There are both women and men who are ready to do anything to become notorious, and if they do not violate the law, none cares whether they do so by standing on their feet or on their heads. But what would not be allowed in the case of men cannot be allowed in the case of women. When first the little gang of suffragettes rioted in the lobby of the House of Commons, they scratched and snapped, and seemed to consider that, no matter what they did, a policeman was a cruel minion of arbitrary power if he laid his hands on any one of them. The magistrate before whom they were charged fined them, with the option of going to prison for a short term, where they were to be treated as is usual under such cases. At once the would-be martyrs fell to blubbering and denouncing men for not recognising their sex. I was sorry that Mr. Gladstone allowed them exceptional treatment in prison, for eventually they went their way defiant and rejoicing.

Personally, I do not regret the antics of these suffragettes. It is an object lesson in what we are to expect of them if they get their way. They are furnishing arguments of the most convincing kind against women having votes. Give woman an inch and she will generally take an ell. Nothing is more pleasing than a woman who is a real woman; nothing more offensive to all right-minded men than these howling and whimpering viragos.

I remember a little incident connected with female suffrage in which Sir William Harcourt did not score. He was a strong opponent of the movement, and we had had a whip to secure the defeat of some motion in connection with the matter. One gentleman had promised to vote against the motion, but failed to turn up at the division. The next day I was standing before one of the fires in the inner lobby with Sir William, when we saw this gentleman approaching us. "You are not the man," said Sir William, "to go with on a tiger hunt; if all had acted like you, the motion would have been carried." "No, Harcourt," he answered "that was not the danger. The fact is that you went about saying that if women got votes you would retire from Parliament, and that brought an unexpected number of men up to vote for it."

The truth is that if voting in Parliament were secret, women's suffrage would never secure above about fifty votes; indeed, most of those who have supported it conscientiously have always seemed to me to be men under female influence, or with feminine minds in men's bodies. But many Members are so pestered by women at an election to vote for their fad that they comply, under the impression that it will be defeated by the more strong-minded. These gentlemen consider that they must stand to their promise if a vote be taken, but they do so with the greatest regret. M.P.s should have more backbone. The electors in the main are opposed to female suffrage; whilst as for the women, almost all are. It is the case of a few sexless persons, who, although born women, find themselves failures in all that makes women charming, shouting and bawling until it is supposed that they have a large following behind them.

Mr. E. D. Morrel's "Red Rubber" does not, I think, exaggerate the hideous cruelties of the rule of King Leopold of Belgium in the Congo State, nor of the methods by which that disreputable monarch manages to fill his pockets. Mr. Morel's indictment would, however, have been more effective had he limited himself to facts instead of rhetorically commenting on their enormity, and left it to his readers to form their own conclusions. He has now issued a new introduction to a fresh edition of his work. In this he strongly advocates the appointment throughout the State of British Consular Courts, not merely, as I understand him, to have jurisdiction in cases where a British citizen is concerned, but to act as protectors to the natives. These courts are to "reinstate the native in the right enjoyed by all black men under European over-lordship to buy and sell with the Europeans, which necessitates the restoration of his rights of land tenure and the disposal of his labour." But do they all possess these in all such lands, and do they all possess them even in those which form part of the British Empire?

If we have the right under the Berlin Conference to establish such courts, then every one of the fourteen contracting Powers which brought the State into existence enjoys the same right. According to Mr. Morel, all the signatories to the Berlin Conference would benefit by our action, and therefore not oppose it. Consequently, "the fear of foreign complications" is a bogey, which would only become a substance if England developed territorial ambitions." But supposing that Germany acted in this fashion, would there not be a protest against it on our part, and should we not think that this was a step towards the development of territorial ambitions?

The cruelties must be stopped. All the signatories of the Berlin Conference are responsible for them, and I have no reason to suppose that all are not prepared to act unitedly in the matter. How precisely to do so is the difficulty, but for us to endeavour to cut the Gordian knot, and to establish in the Congo State what to all intents and purposes would be a British Protectorate, would hardly conduce to the peace of the world. We might be actuated by the noblest of motives. But the Congo State seems to be a valuable asset. France, too, by the Berlin Conference, was given special rights should King Leopold withdraw from the State, and it is not probable that she would carry the entente so far as to renounce them.

TOM AND TURKEY.

'Twas Christmas Time, and Tom—a Lad
Who played a Knife and Fork not bad—
Hailed the good Fare of every sort
The festive Yuletide Season brought.
The way he made the Turkey shrink—
Troth, 'twas a Sight to make you think.
The Zest wherewith he gorged Mince Pies
Had oped e'en Aldermanic Eyes;
And Pudding—well, as much ate that Boy
As e'er did Pickwick's famous Fat Boy.
"For oh!" cried Tom, and rubbed his Hands,
While more and more his Waist expands,
"I do love Turkey. Ma, I say!
I'd like to have it every Day."
His Mother smiled. "My dear," said she,
"Our Friends have sent us Turkeys three;
So, for the next ten Days, at least,
Turkey will be your daily Feast."
Glowing with deep, expectant Joy,
"Good Biz," exclaimed th' enraptured Boy.
But long ere those ten Days expired,
Tom of perpetual Turkey tired.
So when to Table came the Third—
A plump and juicy Norfolk Bird—
He groaned, his Face with Chagrin murky,
"What Ma!—Good Lord!—ANOTHER TURKEY?"

SCRUTATOR.

A PRECIOUS VICTORY—AND AFTER.

THE Clericals and Unionists do not seem particularly happy over their "most precious victory." "A most precious victory" is Lord Hugh Cecil's estimate of the defeat of the Education Bill, his view apparently being that it will somehow result in the overthrow of Cowper-Templeism, which he regards as a damnable heresy. Immediately after the "precious victory" we had the estimable Lord Cross suggesting that Churchmen should forthwith show their magnanimity by subscribing to pay for the cost of Church teaching in non-provided schools, thereby relieving the passive resisters of their grievance. The suggestion has led to a great deal of wrangling, but to no evidence of any widespread desire to put down the money. Sir Henry Howorth has fired off a column of tasty gibes at "the saints"—meaning the Dissenters—and the Bishop of Manchester has fallen foul of him—not out of love of "the saints," but as a protest against anyone else expecting the Church to do anything more than the Bishop thinks she ought to do. The whole faction seem to have an uneasy consciousness that things cannot remain as they are, and that it behoves them to offer some solution of existing difficulties lest a worse thing than Mr. Birrell's Bill happen to them. But as soon as they come to consider what they should do, they are all at loggerheads. Not the least edifying incident is the appeal of the Bishops of London and Southwark for the immediate raising of £50,000 to save those Church schools in London which have been condemned by the Education Committee of the County Council. It is interesting, from many points of view, to see this appeal accompanied by an admission that the County Council has been "patient and considerate" towards the Church. Undoubtedly it has; indeed, it has carried its patience with the Church to a length which has exhausted the patience of many of the more enthusiastic educationists of the Progressive Party. But what are we to think of all the outcry about the rights of the Church in "our schools" by the light of the episcopal admission that dozens of Church schools in London are in a condition which the local education authority is not justified in allowing to continue? The case of London is not unique. There are plenty of similar Church schools in every county which the education authorities have an equal right, and duty, to condemn, unless the Church is prepared to put them into proper order. When we are bidden to remember the rights of the Church in its property, and incidentally to respect the rights of parents, it is important to bear in mind that much of the property in question, from the point of view of public elementary education, is not worth a year's purchase if the education authorities do their duty, and that the right of parents to receive denominational teaching for their children at the public expense is assumed to carry with it a right, or to over-ride any objection, to have their children educated in buildings fit for the purpose. I could instance from my own knowledge a case where this "right" of the parent—a right which the parents have never asserted, and for which nobody else has expressed any solicitude till the last few months—carries with it the privilege, also assumed to be highly valued by the parent, of having the children kept day by day in a building destitute of proper water supply, and with sanitary accommodation which has been condemned by local surveyors and Government Inspectors year after year. If the opinions of parents are to carry the day, let us at least have them at first hand, and on the whole question. Again, let this be remembered, that if the £50,000 required by the Bishops of London and Southwark is contributed under existing political conditions, it will be contributed with full knowledge that the future of the schools in question is a matter on which the State has full liberty to decide. The argument in defence of the non-provided schools is largely an appeal to vested interests, based on the cash contributions of Church people in time past for the erection and maintenance of the buildings. Such vested interests cannot be created or extended under existing circumstances. Everyone who contributes in response to the appeal of the Bishops of London and Southwark will do so at his own risk, and with knowledge that the State is now seeking to renounce the further maintenance of these schools, unless it can do so on terms acceptable to the whole of the public which has to pay for them.

When the inner history of the "precious victory" comes to be written, I think it will be found that the Unionist leaders were divided in opinion as to the wisdom of not accepting the concessions of the Government. Mr. Balfour seems all along to have looked at the matter from the party standpoint, and to have deemed that his party would be the gainers by throwing out the Bill. In his determination to throw out the Bill he was supported by some of the Bishops and opposed by others. The Duke of Devonshire and Lord St. Aldwyn were opposed to the glove being thrown down to the Commons, and the issue of this domestic dispute depended upon the attitude of Lord Lansdowne. He was for conciliation, but finally knocked under to Mr. Balfour, and without him it would have been impossible to induce the Lords to accept the Bill. Lord Lansdowne is to me a puzzle. He is an able man by no means wanting in that invaluable quality—common sense. But he seems to be hypnotised by Mr. Balfour. He followed him in all his twistings and windings on the Chamberlain fiscal proposals, although, judging by his speeches, he is a Free Trader. He was a prime mover in the appointment of Sir Antony MacDonnell as Irish Under-Secretary, and he lost no opportunity indirectly to approve of his action. But when it came to siding with him against Mr. Balfour, he left his protégé in the lurch. So it has been with the Education Bill. He was all for an arrangement. He knew that Mr. Balfour was not, and in the end he stood by him in rejecting it.

It is all very well to say that Mr. Balfour is an amiable man. This does not hinder his being the very worst leader of a party that ever occupied that position. What has been his custom during the Session that has just come to a close? His speeches have been little more than doleful and yet defiant protests against everything proposed by the Government. To speak honestly, they have been beneath contempt. He appears to have come to the conclusion that to throw out the Education Bill in the Lords would rally Churchmen to his standard, and place the Government in a difficulty. He anticipated that it would be forced into a dissolution, at which, if the Unionists did not obtain a majority, they would at least better their position. In any case, his position as their leader would be strengthened. From the party standpoint, this has been a fatal error. It has provoked a struggle in which, sooner or later, the Lords must go to the wall; in fact, one in which this Unionist fortress must be levelled to the ground, unless, whenever the Liberals are in office, no matter with what majority in the Commons, they are only to carry measures which find favour with the Unionist party—a position obviously impossible. What surprises me is not that Mr. Balfour should have sought to use the Lords for his own purposes, but that so many hard-headed Unionist Peers should have allowed themselves to be made his instruments. I should have thought that their experience of Mr. Balfour's tactics during the last few years would have convinced them of the folly of obeying him.

One thing I do not think has been sufficiently noted. The Lords themselves were not left to decide what their course should be. There were meetings at which the Unionist leaders in the House of Commons were called in. One was actually held in Mr. Balfour's room in the House of Commons. What more convincing evidence is needed to show that when the Conservatives have been routed in the country, and have become a small and insignificant gang in the People's House, they fall back on the Hereditary House, where there is a permanent Unionist majority, to defeat the people's will? No one questions that if there were a General Election to-morrow a majority in favour of the Education Bill would be returned to Parliament. It is not, therefore, a case of the Lords stepping in to prevent a mere chance majority in the Commons from acting against the nation's will, but a determination on the part of their Lordships to defy that will, whenever they received orders from the party leaders to do so. "Thank God," say the Unionists, "we still have a House of Lords." Liberals can only reply, "Thank God, we shall not have one long."

So long as the House of Lords possesses the unrestricted power to throw out a Bill passed by the House of Commons, even those that it does pass will only get through the ordeal by the sacrifice of the best intentions of a Liberal Executive and a Liberal House of Commons. What is the usual course of a Bill brought in by a Liberal Government, in accordance with Liberal principles? If it is an important one, the lines of it are sketched out either by a Minister or by a Committee of the Cabinet. When, after being drafted, it is submitted to the Cabinet, the more advanced Ministers complain that it does not go far enough. The answer is, if it did the Lords would alter it out of shape. The same reason is at the bottom of every refusal by the Government to accept Liberal amendments moved in Committee of the House, although the reason may not be openly stated. Thus the House of Lords—or rather, the permanent Tory majority in the Lords—has already had most material concessions in the shaping of a Bill long before it reaches their august House. Nevertheless, on its reaching the Committee stage in the House, a number of anti-Liberal amendments are incorporated in it, and it is returned in a more or less mutilated shape to the House of Commons. A compromise is then arrived at; some of the amendments are accepted, on the understanding that the Lords will not insist on others. Thus every Liberal Bill is conceived in fear of the Lords, brought forth in fear of them, and is finally more or less re-shaped in fear of them. Who can wonder, under such conditions, that the child shows little evidence of its parentage, and bears in maturity few of those Liberal features which the country, the Ministry, and the Legislature have sought to impress upon it? Naturally, Liberals throughout the country complain that electoral professions and promises have not been fairly kept, and they show their anger by deserting Liberal candidates at the next General Election. It is on this that the Tories count. Often, indeed, provisions which have not, owing to the necessities of the case, found a place in a Liberal Bill are incorporated in a Tory Bill when a Tory Government succeeds to office, in order to show that they are the true friends of progress, and the Liberals its enemies. That Liberals should have allowed this state of things to go on when they have the power to end it can only lead to the conviction that there are a good many persons who call themselves Liberals, and make large promises when Parliamentary candidates, but are in reality thorough-paced humbugs, who secretly rely on the House of Lords to prevent their promises ever being translated into facts.

WHITE SOLICITORS AND BLACK.

A good many people have been astonished by the statement attributed to one of the speakers at the recent meeting of the Incorporated Law Society, that only fifty solicitors have been proved to be thieves during the last ten years. I have already said that I do not believe the statement, and as no authentic reports of the meeting have been published, it is possible that no such statement was ever made. But it would be interesting to know exactly what the facts are in regard to the defalcations of solicitors in comparatively recent times. A member of the profession, one of those who feel very strongly the discredit cast on the whole flock by the misdeeds of its black sheep, tells me that he kept a record of all the cases that appeared in the papers between 1893 and 1898, when he seems to have given it up in disgust—like Byron's Recording Angel after the battle of Waterloo. He sends me a précis of his record for the years 1893-5, and though it does not specify the precise nature of the offences, it throws some interesting light on the extent to which professional irregularities prevail. In these three years there were fifty-seven cases against solicitors recorded in the press. The majority of them, of course, were merely proceedings before the High Court on the report of the Incorporated Law Society. Seven of them, however, were criminal proceedings resulting in sentences of hard labour or penal servitude. In the remaining cases ten solicitors were suspended, and the other forty were struck off the rolls altogether. I think it may be safely assumed that of the forty men struck off the majority had been proved guilty of dishonesty in one shape or another, for it is not usual to strike a solicitor off the rolls for mere technical professional irregularities. On that view of the matter, upwards of forty solicitors must have been "proved to be thieves" in these three years. There is, unfortunately, no reason whatever to suppose that things have improved since 1895, as they must have done if only fifty solicitors have been "proved to be thieves" since 1896. I presume that the Incorporated Law Society has a complete record of all the men struck off, and the nature of their offences; and it would greatly assist the discussion of this question, and probably do the profession more good than harm, if this record could be published.

A learned friend in the Temple, for whose opinion I have the highest respect, has reproved me for failing to do justice to those solicitors who oppose the current proposals for some compulsory regulation of solicitors' bookkeeping and banking accounts. His view is that honest men may reasonably resent being placed under some form of professional discipline designed to prevent them becoming dishonest. Doubtless there are plenty of honest solicitors who have that feeling. One or two of them have expressed it during the last week or two in letters to the daily papers. But in my humble judgment it is altogether a wrong-headed view, and ought not to be encouraged. There is a much larger body of solicitors who consider that the honour of the profession at large is tarnished by the continual exposure of roguery among its members, and that honest men are far more dishonoured by this state of things than they would be by any professional regulations designed to keep the whole profession in the straight path. This seems to me the correct view, and the one which ought to prevail. Of course, no one supposes that there are more born thieves in the law than in any other walk of life. I have never suggested such a thing; on the contrary, I have disclaimed such a suggestion again and again. But that the proportion of solicitors who are found guilty of robbing their clients is far higher than the corresponding proportion among any other class of men who have the handling of other people's money is, I believe, incontestable. Granting then that solicitors are born, on the average, as honest as the rest of the world, what is the reason for this abnormal development of dishonesty among them later in life? Simply that it is opportunity that makes the thief. The opportunity comes to solicitors more than to anybody else, first, because from their confidential relations with their clients an unusual degree of trust is reposed in them; secondly, because in too many solicitors' offices the routine of business necessary where other people's money is handled is not systematically followed. A solicitor who values the honour of his profession, and his own, ought to desire that the opportunities of dishonesty should be limited as far as possible. If he says, "I decline to submit to any restrictions on my business which imply that I might be dishonest if I got the chance," it can only mean that he is so deeply impressed with his own virtue that he cares not how many of his professional brethren are shown to be rogues. He may comfort himself in this way; but there is no such comfort for his clients, who cannot be expected to know the impregnability of his virtue as well as he knows it himself.

Moreover, it is futile for the virtuous solicitor to suppose that he can long escape the restrictions which his virtue resents. The public will not permanently tolerate a state of things which exposes everybody who trusts a solicitor to risk, and a large proportion to serious loss. If, therefore, the majority of solicitors, for one reason or another, decline to set their own house in order, they may take it for granted that sooner or later it will be set in order by outside authority, whether they like it or not. No outside power, of course, can prevent a man who finds somebody else's money for the moment at his own disposal from misappropriating that money. But it is a very simple matter to lay down and enforce regulations which will relieve men who are constitutionally honest from the temptation to which they expose themselves by dealing with other people's money in an unbusinesslike manner, and this is the most that anybody has proposed to do in the case of solicitors. A very short Act of Parliament would suffice for the purpose, and when the necessary Bill is introduced, no one is likely to oppose it. Two solicitors, who are also Members of Parliament, pointed this out to the assembled profession at its recent meeting. The only question, therefore, which the profession has really to decide is whether it will make rules for itself voluntarily, or whether it will refuse to do so until it is compelled by superior authority. There cannot, I should have thought, be much question as to which of these courses is the more creditable to the honour of the profession.

INTESTACY AND NEXT-OF-KIN.

Mr. R. Ballard, of 2, Clifford's Inn, has written to me at some length in reference to the article "The Pedigree Specialist," published in last week's Truth. He, however, marks his letter as "private and not for publication," and explains that he only desires to make a few observations for my information. Had these observations not been confided to me in this confidential manner, I should have been pleased to publish them, and discuss their bearing on my criticism of Mr. Ballard's proceedings in the case of Mr. William Newman, deceased. But Mr. Ballard does not appear to desire any further public discussion of this matter, and that being so, my criticism must stand where I left it last week. But there is another matter arising out of the Newman case which I think deserves public notice. I refer to the ease with which anybody can obtain a grant of administration to an intestate estate under the existing practice. This matter was discussed in Truth a few months ago in connection with a case in which a gross fraud had been perpetrated on the nearest relatives of a dead man. I am returning to that case presently, but before doing so it is worth while to look at the circumstances under which the grant of administration was made in the Newman case to an aunt of the deceased in the United States, through Mr. Ballard, holding a power of attorney from that lady.

As mentioned last week, Mr. William Newman died at the beginning of 1906, leaving property valued at upwards of £6,000, and apparently in complete ignorance that he had any blood relations living. In point of fact, he was the grandson of a labourer or gardener at Bath, who had been twice married, and had a very large family; and owing to the spontaneous exertions of Mr. Ballard, numerous cousins speedily came to light in different parts of England—mostly people in humble circumstances, who were as ignorant of the existence of their comparatively affluent relative as he was of theirs. Some of them instructed Mr. Ballard to take up their cases on his own terms, others refused. Mr. Ballard—whether or not stimulated thereto by the fact that his object is to secure one-third of the estate for himself, which he would not do unless he could persuade all the next-of-kin of equal degree to agree to his terms—pursued his researches, and eventually discovered, at Richmond, Indiana, a lady claiming to be the aunt of the deceased—a daughter of the common grandfather by his second marriage. This lady's claim, of course, put all the cousins out of court; letters of administration were granted to her; and unless others equally near, or nearer, of kin come to light within the prescribed time in response to Mr. Ballard's advertisements, the aunt will take the property, subject to Mr. Ballard's claim to one-third of it.

Now bearing in mind that this lady, Mrs. Littleton by name, dropped from the clouds, as it were, after she had been for about forty years lost to the rest of the family, few of whom remember her, it is important to observe how her identity is established. From the documents filed at Somerset House it appears that the register of the parish church of Walcot, Somerset, records the baptism of Jane, daughter of Thomas and Sarah Newman, in August, 1830, and the previous marriage of her parents, Thomas Newman and Sarah Childes, in 1824. Jane, therefore, if living, is upwards of seventy-six years of age. On the 27th of June, 1866, William Littleton, aged thirty-seven years, miller, father Baptist minister, was married at the Registry Office, Bath, to Jane Elizabeth Newman, aged thirty-five years, domestic servant, daughter of Thomas Newman, deceased. Now what is there to identify Mrs. Littleton, of Richmond, Indiana, with the daughter of Thomas and Sarah Newman baptised at Walcot in 1830? There is a letter from Jane Littleton to Mr. Ballard written on April 30 last, in which she states that her mother's name was Sarah Childs. There is a second letter dated May 26, in which she states that her father, when her mother married him, was a widower with a family of girls and boys, that she does not know anything concerning them, that her father died when she was a very little girl, but she can just remember him, that she was married in Bath, Somerset, and was baptised Jane, not Elizabeth, and was "just called Jane Elizabeth after her godmother." She adds "I am sorry I cannot tell you more of the family." This is the evidence, supported by her own affidavit, and by the birth and marriage certificates, on the strength of which Mrs. Littleton takes the whole of this estate. It will be readily seen that there is nothing in it which the lady could not easily have learned from England. Since she appeared on the scene other members of the family have written to her, but she has not answered their letters. One member of the family got a friend in America to visit her. Mrs. Littleton declined to answer any questions about her past life, and referred the visitor to her lawyer, who, she said, knew all about the case. As this interview only took place in October, three or four months after the order of the Court had been made in her favour, there was no reason then, even if there might have been at an earlier date, why she should refuse to communicate with her relatives, or to answer questions about her life in England.

Now, it is true that there was practically no opposition to this lady's claim. The other parties had not the means to contest it, even if they had the opportunity, and, in point of fact, they seem to have known nothing about it until after the grant of administration was made to Mr. Ballard, which was done apparently on an application in chambers. But it seems to me rather a loose procedure that the Court should decide such a matter off-hand on no better evidence of the identity of the claimant than is mentioned above, and with the knowledge that there are many other relatives living in England. I should have thought that in any case of this kind where there is a matter of £5,000 or £6,000 at issue, a claimant in America ought to be required to come to this country and submit to cross-examination in support of his, or her, claim. Any other procedure must necessarily open the door to imposture. It has been mentioned in TRUTH before now that a lucrative business is done in the United States in manufacturing bogus claims on behalf of persons in this country to the property of people who have emigrated to America and died there intestate. It is just as easy to manufacture in America, or any other distant country, claims to property in England. I do not for a moment suggest that anything of the kind has been done in this instance, I have no reason to doubt the bona fides of Mrs. Littleton's claim. All I say, or suggest, is that the evidence which has been accepted as proof of it is extremely meagre, and quite inconclusive; and that if this is the procedure generally followed, it requires amendment, both in the interests of private individuals who may possibly be entitled, and of the Crown which is entitled in default of private claims.

Reference has been made above to a case bearing on this point which has already been described in TRUTH. Full particulars of it were given in an article published on May 4, 1905. In this case an intestate's estate was pounced upon by a relative, who was not the next-of-kin, and had no sufficient reason for supposing that she was. The intestate was a pensioner of the Royal Engineers, employed at the Royal Military College, Camberley, and his estate was eventually sworn as worth £190 odd. He left a brother, but the first information of his death was conveyed to an aunt, who eventually obtained letters of administration, after swearing that she believed herself to be the next-of-kin. By the time that the surviving brother had learned what had happened, only about £30 of the estate remained in existence. The danger of the summary procedure by which administration can be obtained was aggravated in this instance by the absence of all precautions to verify the account of themselves given by the sureties, and this in turn by the attitude of the authorities when the fraud was brought to their notice. The two sureties to the bond given by the administratrix were her son and son-in-law, one of them a porter and the other a carman. They had sworn in that character that they were each of them worth £380—double the amount of the estate—though in point of fact they were neither of them worth more than the weekly wages which they were earning. The brother, who had been defrauded by this procedure, a Mr. Farrer, protested to Somerset House against the course which had been taken in accepting these sureties without any inquiry as to the truth of their affidavits; but he got no reply. He then laid the facts before the Public Prosecutor, with a view to proceedings for perjury against the sureties, but after a long delay he was informed that the Public Prosecutor did not see his way to take proceedings. This was the state of the case at the time when I commented upon it in TRUTH. It furnishes up to that point a striking example of the slipshod procedure upon applications for grants of administration, and the dangerous opening thus offered for making false claims, and leaving the victim without any redress.

I refer to the case again now, not only because it illustrates forcibly the point which I have called attention to in the Newman case, but also because a further piece of evidence has just been brought under my notice by Mr. Farrer, which seems to me to furnish the authorities with the most conclusive proof they can require for the purpose of a prosecution if they have any genuine disposition to move in the matter. It appears that Mr. Farrer did not allow the case to rest at the point which it had reached when last dealt with in TRUTH. He laid the matter before his representative in Parliament, with the result that he was again seen by the Treasury Solicitor, as well as by representatives of Scotland Yard. He was at first told that one witness to an important interview must be found. After some months he found this witness. But after a further lapse of time the Public Prosecutor wrote, on August 4, 1906, that he did not propose to take any proceedings against the administratrix. I assume that he had good reasons for that decision, but I am utterly at a loss to understand why no proceedings were taken against the two sureties, for it is impossible to say that there was not a primâ facie case against them. However, the fresh evidence alluded to above justifies a suggestion that Lord Desart should reconsider the case all round. It now appears that Mr. Farrer and his deceased brother had a sister living in Banstead Lunatic Asylum. That sister died two or three months ago. Official notice of the fact was sent to Mr. Farrer. He states that a similar notice was sent to the aunt, who had obtained administration of the brother's estate by swearing that she was next-of-kin. The sending of this notice to the aunt would prove that she knew that the deceased man had a sister in a lunatic asylum, whether or not she knew that his brother was also alive. This fact can be ascertained in a moment by reference to the authorities at Banstead Asylum, and if the fact proves to be as above stated, the Public Prosecutor will be relieved of all his previous difficulties in regard to dealing with this very gross case. If the asylum authorities even knew of the existence of the aunt, it follows that the aunt must have known of the existence of her lunatic niece, and in that case she could not possibly have honestly believed herself to be next-of-kin to that niece's deceased brother.

The procedure in regard to the grant of letters of administration being what it is, it is obviously of the greatest public importance that when the authorities have the slightest reason to suppose that they have been imposed upon by false affidavits, they should use every effort to vindicate the law. For that reason I again call Lord Desart's attention to the Farrer case. But the mere prosecution of the guilty parties when frauds can be proved to have been committed is not in itself a sufficient protection against bogus claims to the property of intestates. It ought not to be possible for a person living out of the jurisdiction of the Court to establish a claim to property in England, in the face of other claims, without coming before the Court and facing cross-examination, and without some better proof of identity than his own written statement that he is a certain individual who has not been heard of by any of his relations for thirty or forty years. Again it ought not to be possible for any person to obtain administration on the security of a bond the sureties to which are persons of no substance; the sureties' statements as to their means ought to be verified by official inquiry before an estate, whatever its value, is handed over to a party who possibly may not prove to be entitled to it. In these respects, and possibly in others, the present procedure is dangerously lax, and ought to be amended without delay.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE PANTOMIME: "SINDBAD."

Mr. Arthur Collins has done well to go this year to the East for inspiration. All said and done, "The Arabian Nights" are the greatest stories that the world has ever produced, and even a few grains of their gold-dust will make sterling metal of much dross. The story, as Mr. Arthur Collins and Mr. Hickory Wood tell it, varies, it need hardly be said, very greatly, alike from the version that delighted my childhood and from the more complete translations that are the solace of manhood. I may remark, in passing, that the much-talked-of version by Sir Richard Burton is now generally admitted to be inferior to the less-known one by Payne, from which it is proved that Burton borrowed very largely. The version by Payne has the special advantages of completeness, without that revelling in the more objectionable features of Oriental life which characterises the work of Burton, and the verse translations are greatly superior, for Payne is a poet. It has become a rather uncommon book, as this fact has been more generally recognised among Arabists, and I see that the version by Burton has become less expensive than formerly. I trust this digression may be of some service to those who think of purchasing the complete "Nights," and hold Burton's to be the best translation, by common report.

But to return to the Lane of Many Turnings, one of which leads to that Persian garden where we make better acquaintance with the adventurers; see the hen-pecked Sindbad in the arms of his formidable spouse, to the depths of whose objectionable existence Mr. Arthur Conquest penetrated in three days' study. No longer than that, it is said, did Mr. Arthur Conquest need to achieve an excellence which owes a good deal to memories of Dan Leno, but is all hall-marked with the stamp of his own personality. Mrs. Sindbad clings to her husband not less pertinaciously than "The Old Man of the Sea," when they search the Valley of Diamonds, and a word of praise is meet to Mr. Edward Morgan, who played this rather oppressive oldest inhabitant realistically at short notice. Aboard ship we see some first-rate rough-and-tumble fooling by those two British tars, Drew and Alders, who contributed, I believe, next to Messrs. Passmore and Conquest, the most to the children's amusement. And it may be said here that all the boys with whom I had the opportunity of exchanging criticisms expressed themselves in warm terms as to this scene on board ship, which they held to be equalled only by that stirring flight and fight in which the adventurers above-mentioned took part with the baboons in the Forest of Cocoanuts. One small boy said he preferred the clown's methods in the harlequinade; but his opinion was judged prejudiced, as the other small boys had not been allowed to stay for the harlequinade, from which—coming as it does at the end of so lengthy a performance—one has to be either more than mortal, a small boy from school, or a dramatic critic to sip much of pleasure.

But again I have digressed, and return to the most realistic tableau I remember upon this or any other stage: "The Wreck." The heaving of the waves ("are they all men?" said a small voice at my side), the gradual subsidence of the ship as it tossed amid the howling tempest, all combined to make an unforgettable illusion. Our harrowed feelings are soon comforted by finding the crew gradually gathering upon the back of the whale, Mr. Walter Passmore (omnipresent and invaluable throughout) having a more than passable flirtation with a mermaid before his discovery by Mrs. Sindbad—and the charms of the many devices for merriment, such as telephoning to the wreck which one sees spitted upon a peak that juts up from the waves. Ocean powers conspire to carry the entire party safe and sound to the entrance of the Valley, through the Reptiles' Retreat (the dragons in great form, brief in deed, but of a sweetness long drawn out), by the Lagoon, to the Valley of Diamonds.

> And all with pearl and ruby glowing,
> Was the fair valley's floor,
> Through which came flowing, flowing, flowing,
> And sparkling evermore,
> A troop of beauties.

I venture to quote, with the alteration of a word or two, these lines of Poe's beautiful poem, which kept running in my head as I watched troop after troop of fair feminine forms pass across the starry bridge in the middle distance, jewel succeeding jewel, in emerald, azure, carmine, and sparkling white; an orderly procession of beauty. I saw them descend, as it were, into the arena of the valley, there to execute with measured precision their admirable movements, and rapidly, yet without confusion, yield place to others never less exquisitely equipped. In the far background the hills kept blinking, thick with yellow diamonds, but on the bridge, and strewn with artful profusion on the fair bodies of many passing nymphs, the white brilliant diamond, King of Jewels, showed that we were indeed in the valley of its name. This was a genuine triumph of colour and form, on which Mr. Arthur Collins and the many heads and hands that have worked so well with him are heartily to be congratulated.

I preferred this scene in the Valley of Diamonds to the final tableau of the Durbar, for all its splendours. The fact is that with the second part we largely emerge from the enchantments of the old fairy tale, and have to rely upon the sometimes rather trivial and tiresome efforts of such entertainers as Mr. Fragson, who plays the part of an envoy from the Empress of the Saharas. Mr. Fragson does not seem to form part of the quaint company which has been making us laugh, though he works hard with his tiny piano, and secures many a plaudit for his topical songs. This second part is full of such vocal efforts, not the least pleasing of which are those of Miss Marie George, daughter of Sindbad, wooed and won by Hindbad, whom Miss Queenie Leighton represents as a gallant youthful figure. Mr. Fred Emney gets his chance as the Empress of the Saharas, and takes it with much success in his corkscrew curls and his capital "gossip" with Mrs. Sindbad, which ends so disastrously. The Slave Market serves to introduce a dancer whom I thought but moderate and a deal more joke-cracking, until the principal girl and boy mount the runaway motor 'bus, which, on its moving platform, with the trembling would-be passengers whirled away into the wings, moved these around me to many side-splits. Then came the head-cracking in the Forest of Cocoanuts, of which I have spoken, and, finally, the splendours of the Durbar. Throughout the performance Mr. James Glover conducted his well-chosen and well-arranged music with that energy which is habitual to him and counts for so much in the enjoyment of the public.

"Fairy Roma" will not have to wave her wand to charm success for this pantomime. Success has been attained by no wizardry, save hard work and liberal expenditure. Without a combination of these you cannot get much worth having, for they are a faithful couple, and do not like to live apart.

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA," AT HIS MAJESTY'S.

Antony and Cleopatra! Names, indeed, to conjure with; and Mr. Tree, the great poem of Shakespeare in his hand and head, may definitely be said to have conjured up a Rome, an Egypt, that "never was on sea or land," save, as Wordsworth suggests, in the brain of the poet. The result is a great achievement, and should prove of immense pleasure-giving value to that great majority which can only see beauty when expressed in spatial dimensions. To criticise this production of "Antony and Cleopatra" in terms of the Elizabethan Stage Society would be useless. Mr. Tree's aims are other than those of Mr. Poel. But I would here beg Mr. Tree to give, as far as possible, its full value to the magnificent language which pours in such torrent from the lips of Antony whenever he speaks. Mr. Tree, when he comes to a passage which he considers effective, is well able clearly to enunciate, but he is only too apt to slur over whole passages, or even to leave them to the interpretation of a gesture. No gesture ever actor made can equal in interpretative force the words of Shakespeare. With this, and with the regret that candour obliges me to state that I did not hear more than two-thirds of what Antony said, and should not have heard as much save for the aid of my memory, I pass to the pleasant task of praise.

Antony himself formed a grand central figure round which the subtle courtesan queen is weaving her deadly toils all through the play. Habited in blue and golden armour, with his golden and red-crested helmet, he it is, and not Octavius Cæsar, who strikes one as having the greater personality, as the triumvirate sits round that little table in Cæsar's house, and the destinies of nations tremble in the balance with every word said. And yet the Octavius Cæsar of Mr. Basil Gill is a noble and an imposing figure, the silver helmet sitting well upon his comely head and glinting through the play like the crescent moon. This helmet is the last thing upon which the eyes rest as the Emperor of the world looks upon the greatest of the world's lovers lying dead before him within the monument.

Much has been done to bring the story within feasible compass for the modern stage, and the rapid comings and goings of the great protagonists arranged in as logical sequence as compatible with time. Thus, in order to make the action clear, the return of Antony to Egypt and to Cleopatra is expressed in a scene of surpassing Oriental splendour, rather than left to the speech of Octavius Cæsar, as in the text. Deserter of his beautiful wife, sister to Octavius, mad with the passion of love, the great Roman ascends through serried ranks of priests and slaves gorgeously attired, to the steps of the throne where Cleopatra, habited in a robe of silver sheen, like the magic veil described by Flaubert in "Salambo," waits to receive the conqueror, her slave. And Cleopatra, how wonderful she is! Miss Constance Collier was cast by Shakespeare for the part. Græco-Egyptian reptile, born of "reeds and Nilotic mud," a true Ptolemy, she writhes and winds herself through the piece like the "serpent of old Nile" that she is. Her elocution, I am glad to say, was quite clear, the voice ringing like a bell through the theatre. Cleopatra's pride, her love of luxury, her love of beauty inherited from her Greek ancestor, all these we saw before our eyes. Her physical passion and its correlative cruelty were also magnificently portrayed in the scene with the messenger where she shows herself utterly incapable of gauging the situation, but gives herself over to whatever extreme of mood is evoked by the words of Mr. Charles Quartermain.

The scene where Cleopatra does not appear that most strikes one is that on board the galley of Pompey. Here Antony, Octavius, and their host revel uproariously, and Mr. Norman Forbes furnishes, with his fine study of the weak and inebriate Lepidus, a noble butt for their ferocious horseplay. The lighting of the galley and the scenic effects generally throughout the play have high pictorial value, and the eye runs no risk of falling upon incongruities—the only danger is that of being cloyed with too much sweet. The dances and the exit of Antony and Cæsar carrying the helpless Lepidus with the aid of Pompey and Enobarbus, furnishes the only bit of comedy of the evening. The rest is all tragedy, or shot through with the beauty of the Shakespearian Muse.

Mr. Tree has devised a happy method of concluding the play, for he makes his Antony stab himself outside the monument, in which a window is suddenly opened and Cleopatra proceeds to hoist him up with the help of Iras and Charmian. The curtain drops for a moment and then rises to show the interior of the monument. A triumph of stage management.

The beautiful and appropriate music of Mr. Raymond Röze accompanied the action, and if I approved of any music, save the most simple for the accompaniment of songs, I should approve of this. I feel that in so far as I enjoyed it I was away from Shakespeare's creation of beauty enjoying that of Mr. Raymond Röze. On the whole, then, an evening to be remembered as among the brightest and most beautiful that we have had at His Majesty's Theatre.

Mr. Hicks has migrated with his Beauties of Bath to the theatre which he has immortalised with his name; or is it the other way about? No matter, both alike will survive, as will the Bath Buns and other delicacies there provided, or their descendants, but there will be a delicacy in replacing Mr. Hicks.

The new Hicks' playhouse is brilliant in white and gold decorations, with an oval steel and brass railing running round the first, or rather second floor lounge, and a pendant lustre of Venetian diamond glass, flanked with the "Rose du Barry" curtains and hangings. These latter are rather magenta than "Rose du Barry" in colour, but the whole effect is pleasing. The auditorium is all that modern thought has made of old-fashioned discomfort. My only regret in these new and improved seating arrangements is that they make the boxes and those occupying them almost part of the stalls and dress-circle. I like to speculate from the stalls on the mystery of the box, which conceals at least half its occupants, and the loge grillée of Paris shall certainly be among the importations when I build my theatre.

At the Vaudeville the crisp freshness of "The Belle of Mayfair's" skirt has had another flounce—or, rather, a longer train—added to it, in the shape of the amusing harlequinade, which now comes at the end of the second act. The Bishop gives the Belle a soothing pill, for the best of reasons, since it sends her into a sleep, from which she almost immediately awakes as Columbine by divesting herself of her pale pink opera cloak. To her come presently Mr. Farren Soutar as Harlequin, Mr. Angelo "The Swell" (full of quaint pranks and such jokes about the talk of the town as "Mr. Tree is playing with Shakespeare at His Majesty's"), and Mr. Arthur Williams as Clown, also replete with the unexpected. His imitation of the thought-reader and the infant prodigy, among much else, made every one laugh. Miss Billie Burke trips to and fro with piquant effect, and as a last bonne bouche the public is delighted with a glimpse of Miss Camille Clifford behind a transparency from which seclusion she emerges to dance a minuet with Cupid's self, a very tiny person. "The Belle of Mayfair" seems likely to be the fare at the Vaudeville all the year round, to judge from the enthusiasm of the audience last week. It has been said of the Gaiety that the same people go there over and over again. The imagination positively boggles at the number of times some must have witnessed "The Belle of Mayfair." I have heard one person admit to twenty visits, but I believe this to be by no means a record.

Next week I hope to say something of the Hippodrome and of the Palace, both of which places of entertainment provide, I believe, themes for the athlete and the æsthete.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE NEW YEAR'S FAIR.

THAT realm of illusion, the New Year's Fair, is in full swing, and scarcely conscious of Separation, of Briand, Combes, and Clemenceau, save to find in them subjects for jibes and jests, in which there is more gros sel than Attic salt. The Pope himself is a subject for the witticisms of the season—the first time he has been so for a hundred and three years. So long as France had an ambassador at the Vatican the Papacy ranked as a foreign and a friendly Power. This protected its head from the French lampoonist, caricaturist, or maker of those puzzle toys which are at once rebus, and on the face of them amusingly topical. The aeroplane has the foremost place in the Realm of Illusion, but more as a joujou de luxe than as a toy of the child who can only spend a few halfpence on his pleasures. The plus lourd que l'air aeroplane simply hops. Its forward motion is regulated by a mainspring and cogs and wheels, and is that of a flying fish, which is pretty nearly the flight of a grasshopper. In the booths near the far end of the Boulevard St. Germain, where Russian students and studentesses congregate, some tea booths have been run up. A flaunting signboard says, "The hot cup of tea. The drink of the future, the drink of the Japanese soldier," forgetting to say, "and also of the Russian soldier." This is the first time that tea has been sold in a New Year's Fair booth. Is this circumstance symptomatic of a yellow invasion? It coincides with the campaign of the Marine Minister against the opium-houses of Toulon. May not the Chinese passion for opium be a reaction against the nervous wide-awakeness caused by constant tea-drinking?

Toy manufacturers who do not entirely devote themselves to the joujou de luxe—an article in which the French defy competition—complain of the Germans pressing too hard upon them. Germany has this year furnished £3,000,000's worth of cheap toys to Great Britain, Belgium, and France. They are exported by the ton. The German settlements in South America, and notably in Brazil, are the greatest over-sea importers of toys made in the Fatherland, where there are now in every toy manufacturing district technical schools for future toy makers. There are also technical schools for doll dressing. The Germans know how to follow up any advantage they have gained. To gain advantages without following them up is to bring upon ourselves competitors too strong to be resisted, who will besides gain by the experience for which we have dearly paid. The power behind human life is as the London policeman, who keeps all the while saying "Move on." He "runs in" those who want to be stationary.

One must cross the Seine to find the fruits of separation in the realm of illusion. But on Christmas Day I looked in vain for booths in the church squares there, in which, as I had read in some of the papers, crèches, small articles de religion and pictorial Christmas cards in the Anglo-Belgic style could be bought cheap. The only crèche of consequence the season has brought forth comes from Naples, and is an offering from the fishing world of Santa Lucia to the Archbishop of Paris. It is "a Bethl'eem." The Holy Family, shepherds, angels, three Oriental kings, their guards, attendants, and the sbirri of Herod are seen with the eye of faith. The artist did not trouble his head to throw local colour into his work or attempt to Tissot-ise the Nativity country. He gave the rein to his imagination, and found what realism he wanted in the Campagna below Vesuvius.

The religious press here talks of the Pope selling the jewellery heaped up in the pontifical treasury. It is said to comprise the largest collection of "fishers' rings," tiaras, gold and silver altar furniture and miniatures of Royal and illustrious personages, and jewelled settings. There are also those unset rubies and other gems which the tactile fingers of the late Pope so often caressed. The proceeds of this wealth are to go, we hear, to the relief of the parochial French clergy. It can only be a temporary palliative. So also would be the 100,000,000 fr. (£4,000,000 sterling) left by Leo XIII. as a reserve fund to his successor.

There is also talk of those priests who are on the brink of famine breaking away from Rome and making friends with the Mammon of Unrighteousness as personated by Briand, Clemenceau, Combes, et tutti quanti. Hunger knows no law. Were this not so I should be sceptical. The seminary training and the terrible severity of the bishops, who were themselves under the severest occult government, have reduced or exalted the parochial priests to the Jesuit ideal of "devoid of will as a corpse." It is the will to revolt that fails the French clergy. The desire is strong enough. See how the Abbé Loisy struck his colours, though he could have easily found Jewish publishers to secure him pecuniary independence, as in the case of Renan and Michel Lévy. The Breton obstinacy of the former and the income guaranteed by the latter carried Renan through all his difficulties. And then he had, when he decided to strike out, the savings, the strong counsel, and the courage of his sister behind him. She, too, had Breton obstinacy. The ministry cannot propose a Bill for the benefit of the parochial clergy without bringing down upon themselves the Protestants and Jews. They have quietly accepted separation, though it had many drawbacks which they keenly felt. "Because the Catholics revolted," the others will naturally ask, "are they to be placed on a more favoured footing than those religious bodies who obeyed the law?"

Nothing is more significant of general indifference than the revelry of the Christmas vigil. It was, indeed, "Big supper night." The Midnight Mass strike ordered by the bishops threw no cold water on the revellers, so far as I can learn, whether in private houses or restaurants. The restaurants in the Champs Elysées gained by the cessation of the Midnight Mass at the Madeleine, but Durand and the other boulevard restaurateurs lost nothing, as they had not, any more than in years past, places enough at their tables for those who wanted them.

The Gargantuan guzzling cannot this time be laid at the door of Christianity, as it must be taken as an evidence of religious indifference. Just imagine what proportions it took when I mention that on the morning of December 24, 200,000 dozen oysters were sold at the wholesale auction at the Halles, thirteen dozen counting for twelve, and that about 50,000 arrived at private houses from Rochefort, Cancale, and other places. As oysters are but a whet to appetite, judge of the quantities that were devoured of andouilles, andouillettes, boudins, turkeys truffled or stuffed with chestnuts, and truffled capons and poulards.

The only part of Paris that has suffered financially from the Waldeck-Rousseau, Combes, and Briand legislation is the Faubourg St. Germain. The goodwill of a house of business there has not now half the market value at which it could be quoted seven years ago. The prospect of this depreciation frightened Waldeck-Rousseau, who lived in the Rue de l'Université, and made him stay his hand in warring against the religious orders. All the convents save the Poor Clares, Carmelites, St. Vincentists, and most of the monasteries, had schools and boarding houses attached to them. The families of children sent to them took, when they lived in Paris, flats in the neighbourhood and spent there all the money they had to spend. The First Communion celebrations brought crowds of relatives to the hotels and boarding-houses.

The vast convent gardens which are now being offered for sale by the yard secured fresh air and nocturnal silence to the neighbourhood. You could enjoy as much quiet in the Faubourg St. Germain as in the forest of Compiègne. The wonder is that in a time of rapid change, as the last century was, all this lasted so long. All that is bright must fade.

Should M. Clemenceau choose, he can, I am assured, amuse the Chamber by revealing the "finds" of the Juge d'Instruction Ducasse in the postbag of Monsignor Montagnini. The quartet of Cardinals who direct French affairs at the Vatican against that fifth wheel in the coach, Cardinal Mathieu, are, and his Holiness as well, more up-to-date than we imagined. The Bourse is, and has been for some time, their battlefield. Berlin helps them, as it is in gratitude bound. A present of 500,000 marks sent to Leo XIII. in 1893 saved the military Bill which the Emperor had at heart. The proportion between the gracious gift and the immense service left room for further acts of gratitude. Who can now say that the "Morocco Campaign," which scared some of us, was not part of a Vatican-Bourse combination to defeat the Law of Separation? The Pope, as do most of us, defends himself as best he can when attacked. The Sermon on the Mount order to turn the unslapped cheek towards the aggressor does for an ideal world, but hardly for this sad earth of ours. Pius cannot mobilise armies, but he can set Bourse outside-brokers to work, and some of the great inside ones. It appears that the "Bear" campaign that was to have been talked over at the déjeuner which M. Ducasse prevented was to have been on a grand scale. Orders for sale to enlist the "haute banque" on the "Bear" side were to have been given through the Rothschilds.

Monsignor Mirabello di Montagnini did not for nothing work for many years under Prince Granito of Belmonte, now Nuncio in Brussels. The names, by the way, of Mirabello and Granito afford culinary suggestion. Granates now come in at the middle of a trente-cinq plats repast. We all appreciate the Mirabelle plum. The concierges at the ex-Nunciature spend their time in tears. Monsignor Montagnini was, they say, "so kind."

I have the pleasure of knowing M. Henri Cochin, the temporary host of Cardinal Richard, and, by his own desire, his honorary concierge. Could Christian humility and gentlemanly feeling go further than this? M. Cochin is intensely Parisian. Could he be otherwise, seeing that he is descended from a Cochin who served as burgess (échevin) of Paris when Jouvenel des Ursins was Provost of the City by the appointment of Charles VI.? The pedigree rolled on up to the time of the Revolution on the same civic lines. All that I wonder at is M. Henri Cochin allowing himself to figure as "Baron" on his visiting cards. He is a man of the very highest and most healthy culture, and a charming speaker. He speaks best when the spirit moves him to pick holes, or to inflict pin-pricks. His small, shrewd, and laughing eyes prevent his somewhat roughly blocked-out face from being expressionless. I never saw a more amusing pair of eyes. To look at them is to catch the arch spirit that lurks in ambush behind them. M. Cochin has a time-out-of-mind heredity of good sense, practical benevolence, administrative talent, artistic taste, and in short, of every form of civilised activity. His father, a close friend of Thiers, held under that statesman the office of Prefect of the Seine. His grandfather founded the Cochin Hospital. M. Henri Cochin differs greatly from most of the moneyed men of our time, and in none more than in trusting entirely to his own taste in buying pictures. He prefers modern to ancient, and sees merit in every style between Corot and Cazin. It vastly interests him to be on the look out for artistic talent in its early bloom, and he is by no means a hard bargainer when he wants to buy. His gallery is for his own enjoyment and that of his personal friends. The few amateurs who know it think it one of the best formed since the sale of Secrétan's collection. This gallery serves as an ante-room to the visitors of Cardinal Richard. It opens on a wide, long garden, bounded on one side partly by the garden of the poet Coppée, who cannot get over the break in his habits due to the Midnight Mass strike.

M. Cochin is proud to think that he never delivered a sensational speech when even dealing with sensational events such as the massacre by the Turks of Armenian Catholics. He is convinced that the nation which almost deifies as stylists Pascal and Voltaire wants sensational fireworks, either in the journal, book, or tribune. He cultivates in the field of controversy the flowers of courtesy and politeness. If often ready to poke fun, he does so with a light hand and en artiste de la parole.

I incline to look with an optimistic eye on many horrors. My feeling is, "que tout bien ou mal dépend du milieu." A cobra is a being to be admired in a forest opening in Ceylon. But set him down in a bungalow bedroom and he will take another aspect. A crocodile in a tropical marsh is in its proper place, and harmonising with its surroundings has a kind of beauty that it could not have in crawling about the alleys of some Northland Zoo. In this connection a Swiss traveller who has just come to see me has given me encouragement to continue to look at nature's "horrors" in this light. He described a visit to a crocodile farm in the swamps of the Hooghly. No sort of farming pays so well as this. But it must be carried on near a great city for the sake of the offal, which in the particular case he mentioned is taken from Calcutta in hermetically closed box trains, such as those used at Baku for the transport of petroleum. A crocodile is not nicer than, if so nice as, a vulture. What is offence to our nostrils is the promise of a feast to his. The offal which at Calcutta breeds fever and cholera is rapidly transmuted by him into living substance and into those hides which are now the glory of trunk and valise makers at the top of their trade. What aspirant to fashionable style is there who does not long for portmanteaux, satchels, and purses in the skins of adult and baby crocodiles? The leather of the Hooghly crocodile is, it appears, better than that of the Florida alligator. French enterprise will soon run in this direction in West Africa in the valley of the Mekong and in the tepid swamp over which King Sisowath still nominally reigns. The Niger is alive with crocodiles, but they disappear before the river steamer as in Egypt, where I had the disappointment not to see a single one before the Third Cataract.

My Swiss friend assures me that it is a mistake to suppose Dame Crocodile is indifferent to the fate of her eggs. The spot where she drops them is always well chosen, and she remains beating about it on land and in water until the sun has done the hatching work. Directly they break the shell she and they part company for ever. They possess the whole science of their lives on rising to life, and know as well as she can tell them what they ought to do. It appears that they do evolve. Says my Swiss informant:—"One can imagine a race of improved crocodiles thousands of years hence taking the place of human beings degraded with war, absinthe, and other ardent spirituous liquors."

The announcement that M. Leduc solved life's mystery was premature. The so-called vegetables that he produces chemically in glass tubes no more vegetate than the shapes we see on a frosted pane of glass. The miracles worked by Jaunes and Jambres, the Egyptian magicians, were of a piece with the Leduc phenomena. There is not a living cell in any creation of M. Leduc.

The Church of Scotland has reason to cry, "What have I been saying for 300 years?" Her Shorter Catechism teaches that in six days the world and all that therein is were made out of nothing. This no longer seems unreasonable. It did when we believed matter could never be destroyed. In view of the lectures of Mme. Curie, and the lessons of M. Gustave Le Bon, matter really matters very little. It is fast wearing itself out, and human agency precipitates the fall into nothingness—or ether. The latter becomes the vast puzzle. It is not matter as we understand matter. Still, it transmits light and heat. In this way it is the general post office of the universe. The more we learn the less we seem to know. We are like children in wanting to walk or to ride their ponies to the horizon.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE New Englishwoman, dear Lady Betty, is well able to take care of herself; unfortunately, she is altogether unable to take care of her family.

"Gentleman" is not a word now that describes a character, but a financial condition.

* * * * *

The Christmas Smile should have a foremost place in "The Studies in Smiles" which so many satirists have threatened to write. For a week before Christmas Day almost every woman in the land had the Christmas smile which seemed to invite even the stranger to give a present! Those who have studied seriously this annually recurring phenomenon predicted that it would be altered even early on Christmas morning into the Christmas scowl; an expression caused by disappointment at the value of the gifts received. Unfortunately, the accounts which have as yet reached London from all parts of the country confirm this view; the prediction appears to have been generally fulfilled in the towns and the country alike.

* * * * *

The Co-operative Heart is no longer despised by the generality of Englishwomen as it was until recently; many of them possess it now.

* * * * *

The death of Lady Burdett-Coutts should remind all in this country and the Colonies that the Grand Old Woman of England is still alive—Miss Florence Nightingale. Not only did Miss Nightingale distinguish herself in the Crimea—and so greatly that her contemporaries presented to her a sum of £50,000 to establish an institution for the training of hospital attendants—but she is the foundress of the admirable nursing system which we now possess. Lady Burdett-Coutts was created a Baroness in her own right as a slight acknowledgment of her great and intelligent generosity to the poor. Why has no title of the same or greater value been conferred upon Miss Florence Nightingale? That reflection opens another matter which cannot be ignored for long now. Why should women who greatly distinguish themselves in the various activities of life not be rewarded by the State as the latter does men who attain eminence? A great authoress should have as much right to receive the Order of Merit as has an author of the same importance; a woman who benefits her fellow men or women deserves a peerage equally with the millionaire who achieves the same end.

One day it may happen that the "leader-writers" in the newspapers will gravely tell their readers that "Miss Florence Nightingale has outlived her contemporaries"! That stock phrase is capable of being slightly altered; it would read more correctly that "Miss Florence Nightingale has outlived the gratitude of her fellow-countrymen and women"—a deplorable circumstance.

* * * * *

This is the age of short memories in this country; movement is a new feature in England, and it has altered for the moment many of our characteristics. The English, even of the immediate past, were not bombarded with interests and incidents as we are. News falls about us so fast and thick that the memory retains little for more than a few days. The scandal which is a year old has generally long since been forgotten; the triumph which is a month past is already dead. "The Man of the Year" was formerly the customary outline; it was altered later to "The Man of the Week," then to "The Man of the Day," and last to "The Man of the Moment." It will be "The Man of the Second" shortly, or "The Man of the Millionth of a Second"! Money alone has some stability in this country now.

* * * * *

Even the physical characteristics of the English are altering rapidly in the new conditions. The tall, graceful woman with the finely-shaped head, well-chiselled nose, kindly eyes, sweet smile, small feet and hands, and light tread, is almost extinct; she is being replaced by big-made women, with a firm chin, hard-looking, and taking long, decisive strides. The man with the aquiline nose and amiable expression, and delicately framed, appears to have perished altogether; there is in his stead the bullet-headed man, with beady, cunning eyes, the bulbous nose, thick necked, vast waisted, and a voice that apparently struggles through a salmis of money. It might be said that it is always easy to know an Englishman or woman on the Continent now; both are bad imitations of the American of the same sex.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

This is to inform the Patrons of the Grand Hotel, Cannes, that a large Restaurant has recently been erected, overlooking the gardens.—A. Menge, Proprietor.

SPORTING NOTES.

Dr. Barr, a well-known Presbyterian minister, delivered an address last week at Glasgow on the subject of "Betting and Gambling," in which he denounced "the blackguardism and corruption of the racecourse," and described "the drugging and pulling of horses"; the Turf being so vile a welter that the Duke of Portland had given as his reason for retiring from ownership, "that he could trust nobody, trainer, jockey, attendant, or public." As a matter of fact, the Duke of Portland has never expressed any such views, nor has he retired from the Turf, for at the present time he has a considerable number of horses in training at Kingsclere. It is hard that the Duke should be credited with having talked or written such extravagant nonsense, and his trainer and jockey might justly complain of their characters being so grossly attacked by this reckless ecclesiastic. His statement is stupidly false and grossly absurd. Dr. Barr evidently knows nothing whatever about Turf affairs, as he informed his audience that "horse deterioration" was being brought about by "the number of yearling races." Nearly forty years have elapsed since yearling races were absolutely prohibited, and they were only allowed for a short time.

The Keele Park Meeting, which was started a few years ago with a prodigious flourish of trumpets, has ceased to exist. It is stated that every fixture held there has resulted in a deficit, in spite of the support of the Grand Duke Michael Michailovitch, who is the tenant of Mr. Sneyd at Keele Hall. It is announced that the directors of the undertaking propose to start a new meeting at Uttoxeter. They must be a set of mooncalves if they are so infatuated to indulge in any such folly. There are far too many meetings already of this class, at which the prizes are paltry in value, so that the races are contested by a lot of wretched crocks, and are of no interest whatever, except to those who have a pecuniary interest in the events.

Sir R. Waldie Griffith has fourteen horses in training at Newmarket, the older ones being Shilfa and Charis, with three three-year-olds and nine two-year-olds. Shilfa stays well, and should win a long-distance race next season, if he gets through another preparation. The three-year-olds are not of much account, as Simon Square went altogether to the bad, after having shown very fair form. Asian, by Ladas out of St. Ia, is likely to turn out a very useful colt, if judiciously placed. The two-year-olds include colts by Isinglass out of St. Ia and out of Merle, by Ian out of Vain Duchess, and by Cyllene out of Bettyfield, and fillies by Persimmon out of Princess Anne, and by Veles out of Sweet Duchess and out of Vain Duchess. Mr. Baird Thorneycroft's lot of six includes some two-year-olds which cost large sums as yearlings, notably Game Lass, by St. Simon out of Game Chick, a filly bred at Sledmere by Sir Tatton Sykes, for which 1,600 gs. was paid at Doncaster, and Mosedale, own sister to The White Knight, which cost 1,050 gs. One of the two-year-old failures in this stud last season was Camlary, filly by Cyllene out of Sweet Duchess, for which 880 gs. had been paid as a yearling.

The retirement of Thrush from the Turf at the end of his four-year-old season is to be regretted, as he appeared to be perfectly sound when he last ran, and every one would have liked to see him racing for another year. Thrush was not only the best T.Y.C. horse in training, but he was a great "miler." He is a son of Missel Thrush, who is a grandly bred horse, being by Orme out of Throstle, winner of the St. Leger, and half-sister to Common. The late Duke of Westminster held a very high opinion of Missel Thrush when a yearling. He was cheaply purchased at the sale of the late Duke's stud for the present Duke of Westminster, the price being 900 gs. Missel Thrush, however, did not stand training, and a few months afterwards he was sold to Mr. Lort Phillips for only 410 gs. Missel Thrush sired Thrush in his first season at the stud, and he is also the sire of several other good winners, although at first he had not much chance of distinguishing himself as a stallion.

Lord Derby's mare Victorious, who was at one time expected to win last year's One Thousand and Oaks, has proved a direful failure, and she has been returned to her breeder, Lady Meux, from whom she was leased for her racing career, and she is going at once to the stud. Victorious, who is own sister to Volodyovski, was a very beautiful yearling, and she then threw all who beheld her into paroxysms of enthusiasm. What a number of animals turn out utter and hopeless failures which as yearlings were praised as quite perfect!

Mr. L. de Rothschild will commence the New Year with a stud of thirty horses in training at Palace House, Newmarket, of which four are four-year-olds, six are three-year-olds, and the remainder are two-year-olds. Radium is the most promising of the old horses, but the three-year-olds are an exceedingly moderate lot, and the popular Rothschild colours are not likely to be dangerous in any of the classic races. Of the two-year-olds five are sired by St. Frusquin and four by Galeazzo, while one colt (Louis Quatorze) is a son of Le Roi Soleil.

I observe that Baron de Forest's filly, Bellatrix, is mentioned as likely to be a dangerous candidate for the Oaks, if all goes well with her. Bellatrix (as was mentioned in TRUTH some weeks ago) was withdrawn from the Oaks by her breeder, Mr. Musker, when the minor forfeit for that stake was declared on March 27.

Lord Howard de Walden's four-year-old, His Eminence, is a great tip at Newmarket for the Lincolnshire Handicap or the City and Suburban, whichever of the two races he may "go for." His Eminence ran well in the Cambridgeshire for nearly a mile, and he showed good speed in the Derby. He is believed to be an uncertain horse, as he has done better in his home gallops than in his races. I do not believe that His Eminence can really stay one inch beyond a mile, but the City and Suburban is run over a very easy course. He is reported to have improved considerably during the last two months.

Lord Howard de Walden may also win some T.Y.C. races with Certosa, who is a very fast horse, but he is no use over any distance beyond an easy six furlongs. Poussin has not been seen out since he defeated a contemptible field for the Ascot Derby, and he is not likely ever to do much good on the Turf. Indeed, all the animals in this stud which have been seen out are exceedingly moderate, with the possible exception of His Eminence, who may justifiably be expected to improve with age. Lord Howard de Walden has twenty-nine horses in training, of which fourteen are two-year-olds, and this lot includes a colt by St. Maclou out of Kitty Grey and a filly by St. Maclou out of Glass Jug. The running of these animals will be watched with interest, because their sire was sold in 1905 to go to Germany, and the stock of a horse which has thus been disposed of frequently run so well after he has left the country that his exportation is loudly bewailed. Lord Howard de Walden does not keep as much as possible to any particular sire, as is too often the calf-headed custom of breeders, for he has two-year-olds by Cyllene, Orme, Isinglass, Gallinule, Carbine, St. Serf, Florizel II., and Ayrshire. One of his two-year-olds is Catskill, own brother to Kilglass, whose career has been a disappointment, as in his early days great things were expected of him.

Gingal was one of the disappointments of last season, and he had previously failed as a two-year-old. He is by Carbine out of Pindi, and is said to have made a considerable improvement during the winter. He ought to be able to win a good handicap next season. He is entered for the Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park, and for the Atlantic Stakes at the Liverpool July Meeting. The final forfeit for both these races is to be declared this week. The original entry for the Liverpool race included Spearmint and Keystone II., but both animals were long ago withdrawn from this event, while Troutbeck is a notable scratching out of the Sandown Park race, from which M. E. Blanc's Ouadi Halfa, who was one of the best two-year-olds in France last season, was also taken in October, 1905.

Linacre is the best three-year-old in the stable in which Gingal is trained, and both horses were bred at Worksop Manor by Sir John Robinson. Linacre, who is by Wolf's Crag out of Lismaine, is a very nice colt, and he evidently wanted time last season, while the hard ground was much against him. He had been well galloped before he defeated Varra Weel and Tui at Derby early in September. He is decidedly promising, and as he has no fewer than twenty-four engagements in the future he ought to be placed to advantage, even if he does not prove up to Derby form. Linacre's first engagement next season is in the Craven Stakes at Newmarket, and a fortnight later he is entered for the Two Thousand. His owners, however, might very likely be disposed to reserve this colt for the Newmarket Stakes, as the public form of the animals engaged in that race is very moderate indeed, putting aside Traquair, and Lord Rosebery's colt is not likely to be of any use whatever next season over such a course as A.F. Traquair is badly touched in his wind, and he has no earthly chance of winning the Derby, for which Bezonian will be the best from this stable, as was predicted several months ago in TRUTH, at a time when Traquair was being praised to the skies.

Entries close next Tuesday for the Grand National Steeplechase, the value of which race has been raised to £3,000, of which the winner will receive £2,300 (besides a "trophy" value £125), while £300 goes to the second horse, £200 to the third, and £75 to the fourth. The race is to be run over the Aintree course on Friday, March 22. The conditions as to penalties have been altered, and very sensibly. In future, no extra weight is to be carried by any horse handicapped at 11 st. or over. The only penalty for the lightly weighted horses is 4 lb., and that is only for winners of a handicap steeplechase of three miles and a half or over.

Malua, who was a terrible failure last season, is quite expected to retrieve his reputation as a four-year-old by winning a good handicap. He was a baby of a horse during the spring and summer of last year, and did not show any approach to respectable form until he ran prominently in the Cambridgeshire with 8 st. on his back.

In the early part of last year I mentioned The White Knight (an animal of whom very little was at that time known) as a three-year-old certain to distinguish himself, and his subsequent career fully justified the good opinion which I then expressed of him. The White Knight's performance at the Newbury November Meeting, when he won the Autumn Cup, was an excellent one, as among the beaten lot was Spate, who afterwards won the Manchester November Handicap, and the Irish colt was giving him 11 lb. The White Knight has good speed, and also plenty of stamina, as he showed when he won the Ascot Vase last year. I expect this horse will distinguish himself as a four-year-old in some of the Cup races, and it is much to be regretted that so few engagements were made for him when a yearling.

The Duke of Portland's horse, Greendale, by St. Simon out of Ismay, has been sold to go to South America. A very high opinion was entertained of Greendale in 1904, when he was a yearling, and he was then entered for no fewer than thirty-nine races, but he proved a shocking failure on the Turf. Greendale has been by no means so successful as his own brothers, Darley Dale and Simondale, as the former was so lucky as to win the Eclipse Stakes, while the latter finished second to Diamond Jubilee for the Derby of 1900.

Meddler is at the head of the list of winning sires in the United States. This horse represents one of the very best strains of the late Lord Falmouth's blood, his dam being Busybody, winner of the Oaks in 1884, while her dam was Spinaway, who won the same stakes in 1875. Meddler is by St. Gatien, who ran a dead heat with Harvester for the Derby in the same year that Busybody won the Oaks. St. Gatien ought to have won easily. In the spring of 1884 Busybody was purchased at Lord Falmouth's sale by Mr. G. A. Baird ("Mr. Abington"), and she ran in his colours at Epsom. He bred Meddler in 1890, and the colt won all his races as a two-year-old with extreme ease. Many sound judges have always believed that Meddler would have beaten Isinglass for the Derby of 1893 if he had started, but he was disqualified by the death of his nominator, and was sold to go to the United States for 14,000 gs. His disappearance from the Turf was very much regretted, and he was an enormous loss to this country as a sire.

Mr. A. Bailey's beautiful filly, Orwell, by Matchmaker out of Queen of the Rivers, will presumably undergo a special preparation for the One Thousand and the Oaks, which are her only engagements of any importance next season. Orwell started as a two-year-old for six races, and she won five of them. She was unquestionably one of the best two-year-olds of last season, and she appeared quite likely to train on all right. She was bred in Yorkshire by Mr. J. S. Harrison, and her present owner purchased her as a yearling at Doncaster in September, 1905, for 590 guineas.

The Duke of Westminster had nine yearlings at Eaton this season, including own brothers to Flying Fox and Cupbearer, filly by Orme out of Rydal Mount (dam of Troutbeck), colt by St. Simon out of Princess May, filly by Flying Fox out of Miss Unicorn, and two animals sired by William the Third, colt out of Profit, and filly out of Gay Rose. The three-year-old brother to Flying Fox (Pipistrello) and the three-year-old sister to Sceptre (Crown Gem) both proved failures, and the managers of the Eaton Stud must surely by this time have been brought to recognise the bottomless and boundless imbecility of the policy of mating a mare season after season with the same horse. The tragical results of the blunder have been seen in the cases of Lily Agnes and Vampire, but the same course has not been followed with Ornament (own sister to Ormonde), the dam of Sceptre. She went to Orme this year, which is exceedingly close in-breeding.

I hear that Weathercock will undergo a special preparation for the Two Thousand, his stable companion, Galvani, not being engaged in that race. Weathercock went off considerably after Goodwood, as he did not like the hard ground, so he was altogether out of form when he ran so badly for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, which was his last public appearance as a two-year-old, but he is said to have been much benefited by a long rest, and to have considerably improved. He is entered for the Newmarket Biennial. Baltinglass might ultimately turn out to be Major Loder's best candidate for the Two Thousand. This colt was exceedingly backward during the autumn, as it had been impossible to gallop him on the hard ground. He is finely bred, being by Isinglass out of Sibola.

Laudatory notices of Perambulator, the King's most promising two-year-old, have appeared in one or two romancing journals. Nothing whatever is known about this colt's merit as a racer, or is likely to be known for several months to come, and after he has won a really good trial it will be quite time enough to indulge in florid gushings over his Majesty's hopeful prospect of winning the Derby again.

It is at once ludicrous and instructive to come across again a paragraph which regularly appears in the press every winter about the King's "splendid lot of two-year-olds." Season after season this same eulogy, obviously founded on the most utter ignorance, goes round many of the non-sporting papers. As the Royal two-year-olds have turned out abject failures season after season, it is evident that no attention need be paid to these laudatory outbursts. Untried two-year-olds often prove mere whited sepulchres—having good looks in abundance, but without any capacity (or taste) for racing.

I hear that it is hoped that the King will be present on one day at the Newbury Steeplechases (February 22 and 23), in order that he may see Nulli Secundus run for the Spring Hurdle Race. His Majesty's horse will probably be reserved for this event.

I hear that Sagamore is expected to turn out the best of Mr. Raphael's three-year-olds, and it is very unlucky that this smart colt has no engagements, being disqualified for the Derby and many other important stakes by the death of his breeder, Sir James Miller. I expect that Sagamore will be entered this week for the Coronation Cup at Epsom and the Gold Cup at Ascot. As to My Pet II., scarcely a week passes but one sees it announced somewhere or other that this colt will be withdrawn from the Two Thousand, in order that he may meet all his French engagements in the best possible trim. It is perfectly harebrained to write of the French three-year-olds as if they were a lot of platers, and that this nonsensical idea prevails extensively is proved by the fact that it has over and over again been stated that if all goes well with My Pet II. he ought to sweep the board in France next season. From all one has heard about this colt, I am disposed to fancy that we shall find that he has been overrated.

Mr. Leopold de Rothschild has sold Bass Rock to go to South Africa, where this horse is very likely to succeed as a stallion. Bass Rock, who is half-brother, by Grey Leg, to Gingal, was a very speedy horse, but he cannot be regarded as a Turf success. He several times disappointed his stable in important races.

Orme's subscription for this season is announced to be full, which is something of a surprise, as he has not been doing particularly well of late, and his name stands low in last year's list of winning sires, for it is not to be found in the first dozen. Pipistrello, the three-year-old own brother to Flying Fox, left the Turf without having won a penny, and Flying Leap, the two-year-old own brother to M. E. Blanc's horse, has done nothing, nor does one hear of him as being at all likely to distinguish himself in the future. Probably Orme's most hopeful three-year-old is Lord Derby's filly out of St. Victorine, who is expected to develop into a racer of high class.

Bachelor's Button has been full for a long time past, and so also is St. Denis, who leaves England at the end of the season. Other horses which are full are Count Schomberg, Desmond, John o' Gaunt (full also for 1908), Missel Thrush, Persimmon, and Robert le Diable.

THE BETTING ACT AND ATHLETIC SPORTS.

A few men have achieved immortality by having their names associated with a Parliamentary statute. The Act is known by their names, and not by its legal style or title. But such popularity is confined to the legal fraternity and for the most part to Chancery men. The achievement of democratic popularity is reserved for the creators of clauses. There is the Cowper-Temple Clause and Kenyon-Slaney Amendment. These legislative efforts are writ large in such of the history of this country as tells how the pious folk furiously raged together over Education Bills. In the new Betting Act there is an amendment, introduced by the Government, but conceived by Mr. Montague Shearman, K.C., and ex-President of the O.U.A.C. The effect of the Shearman Amendment, for as such it should be known, is to prohibit betting at athletic meetings held under Amateur Athletic Association rules. The Act makes it an offence for any person to loiter or frequent any street or public place for the purpose of betting. The word place includes an enclosed place not being a public park or garden to which the public have a restricted right of access, whether on payment or otherwise, if at or near every public entrance there is conspicuously exhibited by the owner or persons having the control of the place a notice prohibiting betting therein. The Amateur Athletic Association already forbids betting at its meetings, and compels those organising meetings to exhibit notices forbidding betting. The power of expelling betting men has also been reserved at such meetings. But in the absence of statutory authority this power has been difficult to enforce. I seem to have seen in some paper that originally all that was asked for in the new statute was the power to compulsorily remove such offenders. But as the Act now stands they will fall under the general law and be liable to be arrested forthwith, and the police will have the power to detain all papers relating to betting found on the persons betting. If under these circumstances either bookmakers or public are foolish enough to transgress they will find themselves liable to severe penalties.

I am very glad that this enactment has been put on the statute roll. It will enable the Amateur Athletic Association to deal drastically with betting men at athletic meetings. There is absolutely no doubt that betting is the curse of amateur running. It is a direct incentive to crooked sport. Men win their heats for a bet, and they lose the final in order to make money out of the winner, because they can get longer odds about him than about themselves. I suppose few straight runners of every position in society have not had overtures made to them with regard to their running. I know of the case of a youngster who subsequently ran for his University. It was his first open meeting. He ran second in his heat for the quarter. He could certainly have run first. But he did not see the good of running himself out before the final, for which he qualified. Some men from his neighbourhood who had seen him training came and rated him right soundly for not winning his heat. He said he would do his best to get home in the final. "That is no good," they said. "We shall get no price about you; run second if so-and-so can win, and we shall have a good day out." He still said he would run to win, and he was in such a social position that they dared not offer him anything to lose. He did win. But he always doubts if he would have finished first if he had run himself out in the preliminary heat. At the same time, if he had known he was carrying his friends' money I am certain he would have done so. Now, I can give chapter and verse for this incident. It was an unwarrantable position in which to place a youngster not yet nineteen years old, absolutely ignorant of betting and its ways. Any handicapper will tell of the difficulties he has to deal with in respect of in-and-out running. He will ascribe practically all his troubles to betting. The majority of athletes competing at these meetings are men of small means. If they can save their entrance fee and pay their railway fares they have had a good day out. I do not blame them if they do this by a little harmless betting amongst their friends and themselves. I am not condemning betting in itself, and within bounds. But give these runners the market that the bookmaker creates, and then their opportunities for making money by not running straight are too much for the ordinary weakness of average human nature. Professional running and sculling have gone under simply because of the inherent weakness of human nature. The men who backed the sport and provided the funds found that they could not get a straight run for their money. In horse-racing there is the man as well as the horse to be taken into consideration. In foot-racing there is only the man. It is because betting in foot-racing begets roguery and rascality that it has to be suppressed. If you could get racing such as there is on the track at the Oxford and Cambridge sports at the Queen's Club, or rowing such as there is in the University boatrace from Putney to Mortlake, or at Henley, where the betting never affects the event, then it might be possible not to worry about the presence or absence of the bookmaker. For instance, I can imagine no finer a race and no more glorious medium for a bet than a race for a quarter between runners like Tindall, Bredin, Jordan, and Fitz-Herbert, all in their prime, and all at their best. But these things can never be. In spite of all teaching, denominational and otherwise, human nature is the same on the track, be the racers horses or men. And that is why I rejoice at the power that has been given to the Amateur Athletic Association.

As I write it looks like thawing. But by the time these lines are in print it may be freezing again. Therefore a hint about a cheap toboggan may be useful. Take a piece of corrugated iron sheeting (vide Mrs. Beeton passim), cut as desired, bolt on a piece of wood for a foot rest, turn up end, and at the rear bolt on a flat board for a seat, with sacking nailed on for comfort. It makes a splendid goer for very little money.

Considering the weather quite a number of football matches took place on Saturday. That people should be willing to look on at a match under such circumstances indicates a genuine love for the game. In the First Division of the League Woolwich Arsenal are making great efforts for betterment. They are only three points behind the leaders and they have a couple of matches in hand. In the Second Division Chelsea are by no means out of the running. They are third on the list; they are only divided by two points from top place, and they have two games more to play than either West Bromwich or Leicester Fosse. In the Southern League Portsmouth are treading on the toes of the leaders, Fulham.

Judging by what took place at the recent meeting at Lord's, there is likely to be an extension of the time for qualifying for county cricket. The whole trend of modern movement is for each county to play men county bred and born.

STOCKS QUIET—CHRISTMAS INFLUENCES.

DURING the past week the Stock Markets were idle, as might have been expected from the season of the year. But conditions as a whole were quite against dealings, and business was poor. Home Railways have continued tolerably firm, but Canadians are rather a weak market. South African Mines should be stronger than they are, but one lives on hope.

MONEY DEAR—YEAR END PRESSURE—POSITION IMPROVED—STILL SOME UNCERTAINTY.

The prospect of a relaxation of the monetary situation generally within the next few weeks is already reflected in a decline in discount quotations. The removal of the uncertainty attaching to a higher Bank rate, too, has served to exert a further weakening influence. This, despite the natural pressure incidental to the turn of the year, the market preferring to take a long view of the position, and in this respect they are emboldened by the receipt of more gold from Paris and the disinclination on the part of New York to jeopardise the position generally by aggressively competing for gold against the Bank of England. The Bank return, too, made a better showing than had been expected, the loss to reserve being £993,000, and the total of £18,719,000 compares with £17,629,000 this time last year, so that the measures of precaution have been attended with some success. It would be too sanguine to say that all the uncertainty attaching to the situation has been removed, but, generally speaking, there is not much cause for apprehension, and, untoward developments excepted, it hardly seems probable that any further measures of precaution by the Bank will become necessary, especially if France continues to render assistance. The Egyptian demand is at an end, according to the general impression, but more gold may be required for South America within the next few weeks, and already £500,000 has been "earmarked" at the Bank for the purposes of the Indian Currency Reserve, which process will no doubt be continued, especially if Lombard Street sails too close to the wind.

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

Consols Marking Time—Money and Holiday Influences—Attractive Stocks—Russians Supported.

The monetary position and the lack of public interest are between them dominating the market in gilt-edged stocks, but though the tone is somewhat sensitive, this is not reflected in any significant alteration in values. It may be said, indeed, that the market is marking time pending some material improvement in the monetary prospects, so that on the whole there is not much ground for apprehension. It would not be too sanguine in these circumstances to expect that as the international monetary pressure gradually relaxes, as it probably will do within the next few weeks, and the situation generally becomes more settled, gilt-edged stocks will before long be established on a higher basis, especially if the public interest in them expands as the holiday influences lose their power. The market, therefore, may be considered attractive to the investor who desires security of the highest class and the possibility of additional profit arising from an appreciation in capital values. For the benefit of those readers who have a predilection towards Colonial stocks I have prepared the following table:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Cape 3 p.c.	85½	£3 10 6
Natal 3 p.c.	84	3 11 6
New South Wales 3½ p.c.	103	3 10 0
Do. 3 p.c.	88	3 8 0
Queensland 3½ p.c.	97½	3 12 0
South Australia 3 p.c.	86	3 10 0
Rand Water	93	4 6 0

In the Foreign market Russians remain most prominent, "wobbling" somewhat erratically, though it is worth while mentioning that the reported famine and the serious outlook in this respct is quite ignored, which would seem to imply that the support forthcoming from the Continent, and especially Paris, is of the usual inspired sort, and, everything considered, I would not be surprised if it is the preliminary to a further loan. As regards Japanese, the satisfactory character of the recent trade returns of the country is not without some sustaining influence upon values, and the investor who requires a good yield coupled with respectable security could with advantage consider these bonds, more especially those that have a long currency, as distinct from the purely war loans.

Home Rails Firm—Pooling of Liverpool Goods Traffic—An Important "Bull" Point—The Holiday Traffic Returns—The Forthcoming Dividends.

Helped by splendid holiday traffics and by the approach of the dividend season, the Home Railway market during the past few days has displayed a good deal of strength, in spite of the fact that the amount of business transacted in this department continues very small. The Heavy stocks have led the upward movement, a good deal of interest being shown by the dealers in the agreement that has been arrived at amongst the railways serving Liverpool to pool the whole of the receipts for freight. During the last few years a growing desire to co-operate with the object of avoiding needless expenditure has been shown by our leading railways, and the latest arrangement is an important step in the same direction, affecting as it does most of the principal lines, including the North-Western, Midland, Great Northern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Great Western, and Great Central. The object of the scheme is to dispense with the rivalry that has existed amongst the companies for the carrying trade from the docks, resulting in light trainloads and cross canvassing. Under the old system, for instance, goods could be consigned by either of these companies from Liverpool to Leeds, and if each obtained a portion of the day's trade each would despatch a train, though the separate loads would not cover the cost to each railway; while now, under the new system, these three separate light loads would make up one heavy train of freight. It is arranged that the rule shall apply to unmanufactured grain and timber, machinery, other than complete machines, and railway materials. There will be no raising of rates from the level to which they were reduced a couple of years back, the intention being to make the traffic profitable by reducing working expenses. Regarding the traffic returns published last week, it will be observed that some of the companies show moderate decreases. The explanation is that a good deal of the holiday passenger traffic has not yet come into the returns because many people delayed going away until Monday of last week, whereas the figures of a year ago, when Christmas Eve fell upon a Sunday, included the whole of the long distance traffic. Accordingly, declines shown in the returns sent out last week, which are given below, should be amply compensated for by the figures now due:—

	Last Week. £	A Year Ago. £
Caledonian	− 1,200	+ 6,0 0
Central London	− 500	− 350
Great Central	+ 1,680	+ 11,400

There is now positive evidence that all the trunk railways will wind up the half-year with more or less substantial increases; in fact, the only group that has not joined in the chorus of traffic advances is the London Underground section, where the competition waged between the various lines and the rivalry of the motor-omnibuses has prevented that expansion in the traffic of the individual companies that might have been looked for as the outcome of the constant growth of the population of London. The dividend season usually begins about the second week in January, and in order to give an idea of when the individual declarations may be expected it will be useful to set out the dates on which the dividends were made known at the beginning of 1906, in respect of the six months to December 31, 1905. These dates were:—January 16, Metropolitan; 17, Brighton, and Great Eastern; 18, Tilbury; 22, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Chatham, and South Eastern; 23, North Staffordshire; 24, Great Central; 25, South-Western, and North-Eastern; 26, Great Northern; February 1, District, and North London; 2, Midland; 7, North-Western; 8, Great Western. The first two declarations are likely to be indifferent, particularly the Metropolitan, which has been suffering severely from the diversion of traffic to the new Great Central and Great Western joint line. The Brighton, too, in common with the other lines that rely mainly upon passenger business, has only done moderately in the matter of gross receipts, but it must remembered that in the case of the "A" stock the full year's dividend will come off the price. The dividends should be specially satisfactory in the case of the North-Eastern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, North-Western, Great Northern, Hull and Barnsley, North Staffordshire, and Great Central. As prices of all railway stocks are still at a very low level, there is reason to hope that the dividends will

AMERICAN RAILWAYS—"PENN'S"—HEAVY FOREIGN BORROWINGS—MORE LIQUIDATION—TRADE CONDITIONS—ATCHISON REPORT.

In Americans during the last few days the dealings have been greatly restricted, and as a rule the movements are not in favour of holders. The death of Mr. Cossatt did not exercise much influence upon Pennsylvanias, and the notification of Mr. J. J. Hill's impending retirement left Great Northern (U.S.A.) stocks pretty much as they were. Business has been left almost entirely in the hands of the professionals, the outsiders leaving the market alone, and from no quarter do I hear of activity. There has been a resumption of liquidation, and the week's record is unsatisfactory. My table below shows movements on balance on the week:—

Trade conditions in the United States continue satisfactory. According to the Iron Age the November output was:—

2,187,665 tons, compared with the record figures of 2,196,808 tons for October. This shows apparently a trifling falling off, but it should be remembered that November contained only thirty days. The rate of production in November was actually larger than that for October, being 72,982 tons per day, as against 70,865 tons. The steel companies as a rule did not equal their production in October, the Pittsburg district in particular showing a falling off, but the so-called merchant furnaces made more iron in the shorter month of November than in October, their total being 776,515 tons, against 744,608 tons. The weekly capacity of the active furnaces, which on November 1 for the first time reached half a million tons (500,580 tons per week) is now up to 514,160 tons. Adding 8,000 tons a month for the charcoal furnaces, which are not included in these figures, the weekly rate of production represents a yearly output in the prodigious amount of 27,250,000 tons. Nevertheless, iron in considerable quantities is coming in from abroad.

Further details have been received of the purpose of the meeting called by the Atchison Company for January 30 to sanction an increase of capital. The proposal is:

to increase the limit of the issue of common stock by $98,000,000, namely, from $152,000,000 (with $101,955,500 outstanding) to $250,000,000, and also to create an issue of bonds for amount of $98,000,000, with the privilege of conversion into common stock. When these propositions shall have been approved by the shareholders, it is contemplated to offer to the shareholders for subscription approximately $25,000,000 of the new stock or convertible bonds. The Norfolk and Western Railway Company is another company that is arranging to raise a large amount of new capital. Shareholders are offered at par $14,576,000 of an authorised issue of $34,000,000 convertible gold bonds. The bonds will carry the right of conversion into common stock at par for ten years from June 1, 1907. The Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Company, one of the properties in the New York Central system of roads, proposes to increase its stock from $10,000,000 to $30,000,000. This Company at the same time announces an increase in its dividend distribution, a semi-annual payment of 6 per cent. having just been declared, as against previous semi-annual payments of 5 per cent. In other words, the rate of the dividend is increased from 10 per cent. to 12 per cent. per annum. Two of the Pennsylvania properties have also announced enlarged dividends.

CANADIAN RAILWAYS—GRAND TRUNK'S NOVEMBER STATEMENT—"CANADAS"—FOREIGN RAILWAYS—MEXICAN RAILWAYS' POSITION—ARGENTINES.

The Grand Trunk revenue statement for November did not please the market. It showed a net gain of £7,800, which was better relatively than the experience of some previous months, but operators had looked for at least twice as much, and as a consequence they were grievously disappointed. The main system and the Western and Detroit branches both show net increases, but, as usual, the Canada Atlantic has to tell of a decrease, this time of £3,700, which increases the fall for the half-year to £24,000. As to Grand Trunks for investment, there is just now little fresh to add. The guaranteed stock has become excellent; the First and Second Preference are very well covered; and as lock-ups the Third Preference and Ordinary issues are among the pick of the basket. It would appear as though the run of Canadian Pacific increases was broken, although the earnings are on a great scale. For the past week the receipts exhibited a shrinkage of £5,000. This can hardly be regarded as in any way significant, and that the position of the Company is good enough is quite clear from the knowledge that for the half-year to date it has a gross expansion of more than £1,137,000. Twelve months ago there was a gross increase of more than £670,000, so that in reality there is little cause for apprehension over the trivial decrease of last week, which, it may be remarked, is generally attributed to bad weather conditions in the west. My table below shows the measure of movements on the week:—

ROMANO'S RESTAURANT, STRAND.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's—I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire, and this opinion is evidently shared by many, for the restaurant was packed, as it deserves to be."

The holidays have interfered with dealings in the Foreign as in other Railway markets, and movements have not been material. Mexican Railway Seconds are good to buy, as I have before said, to put away for a substantial advance; and discerning individuals continue to pick up Interoceanic Preference shares. Argentines are rather out of favour save with the investing group, the rise of the past couple of years having discounted most of the prosperity of which the country has been able to boast. WESTRALIANS FIRM—FINGALLS' DIVIDEND—SONS OF GWALIA—SOUTH KALGURLIS.

Although by no means surfeited with business, the Westralian market, on the whole, is by no means uninteresting, and, collectively, I think that the shares are deserving of more consideration. In point of interest, the reduction in the quarterly dividend of the Great Fingall is worthy of reference at the outset. In discussing the position of the property, I have frequently alluded to the possibility of such a reduction following the lowering in the monthly statement, so that the change can hardly come as a surprise to my readers. The development, it may be pointed out, has been pretty liberally discounted in advance by the depreciation in the shares, and it is worth noting that even on the basis of quarterly distributions of 3s. per share, they would give over 20 per cent. at the ruling quotation. There is, too, always the possibility of the mine opening up in a more promising fashion. As regards Sons of Gwalia, to which shares I drew attention on the recent dividend declaration, it is opportune to mention that development in the lowest level shows considerable improvement, the south reef—for the last 10 ft. driven—giving an assay value of £4 19s. per ton over a width of 9 ft. This augurs well, and I may repeat that the shares appear to make a very respectable holding. There is nothing of exceptional interest divulged in the report of the South Kalgurli, but in regard to ore reserves it is pointed out that some portions of the ore bodies exposed have not been sufficiently developed to warrant their inclusion in the estimate, but as stoping proceeds the tonnage is likely to prove larger. At the No. 6 level a new ore body has been located. The main shaft is down below 1,500 ft., and cross cuts are being put in to open the lode in depth, while arrangements have also been made with the Hainault Company whereby a lode 18 ft. wide and assaying 9 dwts., which enters the South Kalgurli, will be developed from the other property. Deep leads are quiescent and devoid of any feature of interest. Here is my usual table:—

RHODESIANS OUT OF FAVOUR—LITTLE INTEREST ANYWHERE—EXPLORATION ACHIEVEMENT.

The Rhodesian market is quite out in the cold and utterly neglected. Indeed, it could scarcely be more uninteresting, for which condition of affairs no doubt the season is to a certain extent responsible. Before long, perhaps, a greater degree of interest will be evinced in the market following the progress made by the country, not only in respect of the development of its mineral wealth, but also agriculture. This is important in relation to the position of the Chartered Company, and, as I have said before, the report, which is due in about a month's time, ought to make a relatively good showing. To expect that the era of deficits is past would be too sanguine, but an improved showing ought to be made. As regards Bankets, there is still no confirmation of the rumours of good developments, which seems not a little strange in view of the persistency of the whispers. The report of the Rhodesian Exploration Company does not make a very brilliant showing. The profit is under £10,000 for the twelve months, while £110,000—practically the whole amount standing at credit of profit and loss account—has been written off for depreciation. In view of the depression existing in South Africa, it is considered that the operations of the Company could with advantage be extended out of the country, and the shareholders are to be asked to endorse this idea. No hint is given, it may be remarked, as to any scheme contemplated. My usual table follows:—

WEST AFRICANS STAGNANT—COPPER SHARES BOOMING—ANACONDAS' ENHANCED DIVIDEND—ESPERANZAS.

Despite the significance of the reduction in railway charges in relation to the industry, the Jungle continues its customary appearance of stagnation. Of course, it might be argued that the season is against any sustained improvement in the general condition of the market, but for my part I am still convinced that until the industry shows some palpable indications of progress, it is hopeless to expect any material change in the sentiment towards the market. The boom in Copper shares continues without abatement. Rio Tintos are now very near 100, after being about 64 at the beginning of the year, and 59 at one time in 1905. That the price is rather high is beyond question, but the significance of the sustained strength of the metal, and also the prospects, in relation to dividend possibilities, must, of course, be reckoned with, and, everything considered, there is ample justification for the high values ruling for Copper shares. As regards Arizonas, I still consider the shares a promising purchase. It may be noted that the Anaconda dividend is again larger, $1.75 being paid, as against $1.50 in October and 87½ cents a year ago. This in itself is eloquent testimony to the enlarged profit-earning capacity of copper-producing Companies, resulting from the high price ruling for the metal. Siberian descriptions would seem to be quietening down after the excitement of the past month or so, but there are few features that call for any comment. In the Mexican group, Esperanzas remain somewhat depressed, as a result of the uncertainty as to the position of the mine. As I remarked when dealing with the question before, it is not a little anomalous that the shares of a mine showing such large monthly profits and making handsome distributions (10s. 6d. per share being actually included in the existing price) should stand so low. This seems to add colour to the prevailing suspicion that the outlook is not promising, and that the supplies of high-grade ore will not last much longer. A cable has been received from the manager of the Utah Bingham Mining Company to the following effect:—"Have discovered new vein first-class ore two feet in width; assays following." Here is my usual table:—

KAFFIRS BETTER—IMPROVED OUTLOOK—GOOD DIVIDENDS—DE BEERS SHARP RISE.

It is satisfactory to be able to record that a distinct improvement has set in in Kaffirs, and that prices, although leaving off rather below the best, exhibit an appreciable advance. There is no doubt that confidence is being inspired in the ability of the Rand mining industry to work out its own salvation as regards labour and other economic questions, and that the belief that prices have touched bottom is fast gaining ground amongst investors seeking bargains before any considerable forward movement takes place. The past year has been a disastrous one for Kaffir shareholders, but it is to be hoped that the more hopeful tendency which has been in evidence during the last week or two will prove to be the beginning of a brighter era for Transvaal mining. The gold output of that Colony is now at the rate of approximately £26,000,000 per annum, and for 1906 it will probably be found, when the figures are available on the 10th inst., that the production was not far short of £24,500,000. Other minerals, such as coal, diamonds, and silver, will probably add £2,250,000 to the total, so that, on the whole, the Transvaal's mineral production for the year just closed will reach a very high value. Some idea of the extent and importance of the industry may be gathered when it is stated that no less than £5,565,970 was paid in dividends by Rand Gold Companies in 1906, this being the largest sum distributed in any one year since the discovery of the field in 1886. Other Companies, including financial Corporations and diamond and coal mines, have paid out more than one and three-quarter millions in dividends, so that, on the whole, despite the serious commercial depression which has existed, and the difficulties with which the mines have had to contend, shareholders have received some return for their outlay, although they may not consider it adequate, or, at any rate, not so large as would be the case did more favourable conditions prevail. The total amount distributed, however, is enormous, and in the case of the Gold Companies represents not less than 25 per cent. of the production, which, all things considered, is by no means a return to be despised. The best prices touched were not maintained, there being fractional losses towards the close owing to profit-taking, which is not to be wondered at, considering that the Paris Bourse would not open from Saturday to Wednesday (January 2), and that as New Year's Day was a Stock Exchange holiday also, there was not the slightest disposition to enter into fresh commitments until after the reassembling of members for their first business session in 1907. But although quotations closed under the best, the advance has made no little progress, as is evidenced by the favourites, Rand Mines being 6 9-32, East Rand 4 9-32, and Goldfields 4 1-16. Shares of the Goerz group have been in request, and Modders, East Rand Mining Estates, Randfontein, Welgedacht, H.E. Props, Luipaard's Vlei, New Districts Development, Transvaal Gold Mining Estates, and numerous others have participated in the advance. A demand has sprung up for Middelburg Steam Coal and Coke shares on account of the strike on the farm, Vaalhoek, adjoining the Company's 250 gold claims at Pilgrims' Rest, of a gold reef giving an average assay value of 27 dwts. over a width of 5 ft.; while on the Clewer mine, in the incline shaft, at a depth of 340 ft., about 150 ft. vertical, the reef is 12 in. to 6 ft. wide, and assays from 4 dwts. to 70 dwts. In this connection mention may be made of the Transvaal Gold Mining Estates, which owns Vaalhoek, and which can with confidence be recommended as a first-class investment at 36s., to pay 25 per cent. at least on its shares. Very little notice is taken by the public of this Lydenburg property, but it is one of the soundest mining propositions in South Africa. Among diamonds, De Beers shares have been a strong feature, as they had a sharp rise on Wednesday from 23 sellers to 24¼, and they finished the week at about that price, which is nearly £7 higher than a year ago. It was reported that Paris was a big buyer of De Beers owing to the expectation that the dividends for the year ending June 30 next will amount to 70 per cent. Jagersfonteins are also receiving French support, and New Vaal Rivers, after going to 6¼, fell back to 5¼, owing to forced liquidation. Mount Yagahongs have risen to 3s. 6d. and 4s. on quiet buying, due to a cabled report from the manager (Mr. Bawden) that the shaft put down on Barrell's Kopje (a portion of its claims on the Vaal River) is in excellent blue diamondiferous ground, and that on the present appearance and prospects he has every confidence in the mine. In addition to its diamond claims, the Company holds 55,000 shares in the Middelburg Coal Company, which will soon be in a position to declare a dividend, and has a most promising oil property in Inhambane, East Coast of Africa. Coronations have once more come to life and risen to 20s. on account of its prospects in connection with a diamond deal.

BROKEN HILL MINES.

It is possible to create a boom in Mining shares, no matter how flimsy be the pretext, provided the market is engineered properly and opportunely, and the whispered "prospects," a natural concomitant to such a contemplated movement, are exaggerated sufficiently to inspire something resembling confidence. But, as everybody is aware, there is a natural law whereby all things gravitate to their proper level, and, as a rule, manœuvred "booms" of such a nature, being based on nothing substantial, subside even more rapidly than they developed. After digesting the significance of this one must allow that the boom in Broken Hill Mining shares, which has been one of the most conspicuous features of the Stock Exchange during the past year, and which continues with unabated strength, is based upon something solid. As a matter of fact, the shares have responded to the high price obtainable for the metal produced, and the enlargement of their profit-earning capacity thereby implied, and the consequent significance in relation to dividend possibilities. Very remunerative prices of silver and lead have naturally helped to bring the shares into greater prominence, but another important factor contributing has been the discovery of more than one process for the utilisation of what was once practically regarded as waste product. I refer to the methods devised for the profitable extraction of zinc from the enormous quantities of tailings. To give an adequate idea of the value represented by these tailings it is only necessary to mention that whereas between 25,000 and 30,000 tons of ore are treated by the Barrier Mines every week, upwards of 15,000 tons of residues, possessing zinc contents of approximately 17 to 19 per cent., are added to the dumps. These dumps accumulated enormously, and owing to the discovery alluded to now represent an additional source of profit to the mines. The Zinc Corporation, formed with the object of acquiring these tailings and treating them at a profit, has already purchased a large tonnage and contracted for more. It has, too, commenced operations, and as the scheme properly materialises seems to have great potentialities ahead. To return to the metals, it may be said in regard to silver that, owing to various causes, amongst them extensive purchases by the Indian Government necessitated by the prosperity of the country, a resumption of buying by the United States for coinage purposes, and also purchases by the Mexican Government because of its depleted stock of dollars, the price has been higher during 1906 than for about twelve years. The lowest price touched was only 29d. per ounce, so that the average price of the year must prove materially larger than for many years past. As regards lead, which is a more important factor in relation to the profit-earning capacity of the mines generally, it may be noted that it has attained a record high price and is still near the top. This may be ascribed to the fact that the world's production is not keeping pace with the current consumptive capacity. Here is a comparison of the prices of both metals during the past few years:—

	Lead.		Silver.
	Highest.	Lowest.	Highest.	Lowest.
1906	£20 5 0	£15 7 6	33½d.	29d.
1905	17 17 6	11 17 6	30⅛	30
1904	13 3 9	11 5 0	28⅞	24⅛

1902	12 0 0	10 0 0	26¼	21⅛
1901	16 10 0	10 2 6	29⅞	24⅛
1900	18 0 0	15 17 6	30⅞	27
1899	17 15 0	13 0 0	29	26⅜
1898	14 12 6	12 5 0	28⅛	25
1897	14 15 6	11 10 0	29⅛	23¾

As to the Broken Hill lode itself, it is the most important mineral deposit of its class known, and is being exploited by ten Companies. Its value naturally varies at different points, and whereas the vein on the South mine is over 250 ft. wide at its deepest point, and gives excellent assay, the Block 14 has given rather poor results in depth so far. The leading venture of the group is the Broken Hill Proprietary Company, which is capitalised at £384,000, in 960,000 shares of 8s. each. During the half-year to May 31, 1906, the total profit was £232,332, or the equivalent of 20s. 2d. per ton treated. It is a substantial dividend-payer, and with the metals commanding anything like the ruling prices, it is quite obvious that on the basis of the earnings for the half-year alluded to, the ore reserves, estimated at 3,500,000 tons, represent an enormous profit. Indeed, it requires only a simple calculation to discover that, ignoring the odd pennies, the profit in sight on the basis of 20s. per ton would be £3,500,000. It must not be forgotten, of course, that all the metal produced fluctuates considerably in value, and the profit-earning capacity of the mine diminishes and rises accordingly; but it may be remarked that during the period in question the average price of lead was £16 7s. 8d. per ton, whereas it is now £20, and has been maintained near this figure for the past few months. The inference is, therefore, that the profits should show a material expansion. However, a profit in sight of £3,500,000 on a capital of £384,000 is significant enough to require no emphasis, especially as a further material profit from accumulated tailings may be reckoned with. The Block 14 has a capital of £155,000, in 100,000 Ordinary shares of 25s. each and 100,000 6s. Preference shares. In the half-year to September, 32,940 tons of ore were treated, and it is estimated that the ore in reserve amounts to 187,000 of sulphides and 3,000 tons of carbonates. The Broken Hill South has a capital of £200,000 in £1 shares, upon which a dividend of 3s. 6d. was paid for the last quarter about a month ago, as against 2s. 6d. for the corresponding period of 1905. In some quarters the mine is believed to be the best in the field. In depth the mine is opening up in a most encouraging manner, the ore formation being particularly extensive, while the quality is excellent. This is an important point, and it may also be emphasised that above 825 ft. level alone the Company has seven years' requirements of ore in sight. The North Broken Hill is another promising property. Its capital is £140,000 in £1 shares, and since the last accounts were made up the remaining 10,000 unissued shares have been placed at £3 each, thus providing funds for duplication of the plant, etc. At the end of June the ore reserves were estimated at 500,000 tons, and when the work of doubling the plant's capacity to 400 tons weekly is finished, it is safe to assume that there will be a considerable expansion in profits, especially as the Company ought to be able to effect economies in working costs then. The Sulphide Corporation not only works the Central Mine at Broken Hill, but in addition, owns extensive smelting and zinc distilling works at Castle Creek, Lake Macquarie, to the south of Newcastle, N.S.W. The mine has been extensively developed, and possesses large ore reserves. According to the last report, the net profits for the six months ending June last amounted to £94,460, but owing to the serious interruption, to production resulting from a creep, it was not considered advisable to make any distribution on the Ordinary capital. A distribution was possible, but in regard to the future it may be borne in mind that the period of heavy expenditure has come to an end, and within a month or so, with the completion of the new mill, there will be no further necessity to pursue this policy, and materially larger profits will be available for the benefit of the Ordinary shareholders. To indicate the extent of the appreciation that has occurred in the value of Barrier shares within the past nine months, I have prepared the following table:—

	Price. April 24.	Present. Price.
British Broken Hill	34/-	47/-
Broken Hill Prop.	3⅞	5⅛
,, Block 10 (£10).....	4⅜	4¾
,, ,, 14	1½	1½
,, Junction North	¾	1⅛
,, North.....	2⅜	4½
,, South	4½	5⅞
,, South Blocks	1⅞	2½
Sulphide Corporation	15/-	19/6
Zinc Corporation.....	1⅜	3s/-

It will be observed that the advance in the majority of cases is very material, but in relation to this question the significance of the enhanced values of the metals must be considered.

Insurance Notes — The Year's Insurance History: Amalgamation, Legislation, Scandalisation, Conflagration.

Last year's insurance history can be appropriately written in four chapters, which might be headed Amalgamation, Legislation, Scandalisation, and Conflagration. The first of these is the most important, as likely to have the greatest and most enduring effect. The tendency for small Companies to be merged in large ones is becoming more and more strongly marked, while, especially in connection with fire insurance, the combination among the Companies is closer than before and the helplessness of the public is more than ever apparent. In saying this, I am talking particularly of the fire offices and their association in the Tariff Committee. Following the absorption of the Hand-in-Hand came the compulsory retirement of the Westminster Fire and the County Fire. All three were established in the remote past, had a particularly select business in the United Kingdom, and offered exceptionally favourable terms to their policy-holders. It was convenient to the Fire Insurance Ring that they should disappear, and disappear they did. We are consequently face to face with a monopoly in fire insurance—with a Trust which dictates what terms it chooses. I do not pretend that the combined offices abuse their power to any great extent at the present time, but the fact has to be recognised that the Tariff has practically unlimited influence, that it works solely for the interests of the shareholders of the combined offices, that it boycotts remorselessly the few non-tariff fire Companies which hold aloof from the combination, and that for all practical purposes it is in a position to dictate its own terms to nearly every holder of a fire policy in the United Kingdom.

The fire insurance combination shows every indication of extending to that miscellaneous class of insurance commonly called Accident, which includes not only sickness and accident, but employers' liability, burglary, guarantee, and every other insurance liability other than fire, life, and marine business. The Royal, the Liverpool and London and Globe, the London and Lancashire Fire, and the Scottish Union and National have all started accident business in the course of the past year. There are, perhaps, legitimate reasons for this development. The new Workmen's Compensation Act will involve a vast extension of this class of insurance, and it is found by experience that an appreciable increase of business results from the agents of fire offices being able to sell accident policies, and from the agents of accident offices being able to sell fire policies. For the moment there is no tariff for workmen's compensation or other accident risks, and a convenient method of obtaining business is to issue a workmen's compensation policy at a low premium to an employer who is heavily insured against fire; the former policy can be issued at an unremunerative rate in view of the fact that the fire insurance premium is profitable. The tariff regulations are thus adhered to in form and departed from in fact.

With the entry of the big fire Companies into accident business the formation of a tariff for the most important accident risks, especially for workmen's compensation business, becomes highly probable, and there is thus every likelihood that all forms of insurance, with the exception of life and marine, will ultimately drift into the hands of a very few giant Companies possessing absolute control over the rates and conditions of the policies. It is becoming increasingly difficult for small Companies, however strong and however well managed, to hold their own against the modern leviathans, which are always ready to buy the smaller offices at a price which the shareholders would be foolish to refuse.

I suppose these developments are inevitable. There is little doubt that they are profitable to the shareholders, but I have a shrewd suspicion that they are very far from being good for the policy-holders. In this connection it is a significant fact that the big fire Companies, which have long transacted life assurance business, will not for a moment compare as life offices with the Companies which do life assurance business alone. Offices such as the Royal, the North British and Mercantile, and the Commercial Union, which transact a huge fire insurance business, would not be considered for one moment as possible Companies in which to take a life policy by anyone acquainted with the subject who wished to assure to the best advantage. If bigness as a fire Company conduces to inferiority as a life office it is not improbable that it will also conduce to inferiority for accident insurance.

These wholesale amalgamations, and this entry of all the fire offices into the accident field, are to some extent a result of the new Workmen's Compensation Act, which extends the liability of employers to an immensely increased number of servants. This extension is to be cordially welcomed, and was, indeed, inevitable so soon as the original Workmen's Compensation Act was passed. The new Act, however, not only provides compensation for many more people than the original one, but covers trivial accidents as well as serious accidents. Incapacity for seven days now calls for compensation, which is to be made from the date of the accident. There is cause to fear that these new conditions will prove expensive. They make malingering on the part of an injured workman a profitable financial occupation, which was not the case under the old regulations. Personally, I am not afraid of this, because whatever ill effects Acts of Parliament may introduce are usually nullified by the operation of Nature's laws. Workmen's compensation will probably be more costly than formerly, and, as it is a necessary factor in the price of manufactured articles, the wages of workmen will have to be reduced, or at any rate will have to be less than they might be if it is found that goods cannot be sold at a reasonable profit.

The inclusion of domestic servants under the new Workmen's Compensation Act is entirely good from every point of view; it is safe to say that the cost of insuring against the liabilities involved will not exceed 5s. a year for each servant.

I have referred quite recently to the Employers' Liability Assurance Companies Bill, the object of which was to bring such Companies under the same sort of provisions as those which apply to life assurance offices; this was one of the massacred innocents of last Session, and will doubtless be re-introduced in the near future, I hope, in an improved form. I have also referred to the Public Trustee Act, which, comparatively futile in itself, may ultimately do good by leading to the more extensive employment of insurance Companies as trustees.

A feature of last year which will not be readily forgotten was the scandals in the American life offices. Wholly deplorable as an example of methods of management, they were relatively insignificant in financial consequences to the policy-holders, and very distinctly beneficial, inasmuch as they were the direct cause of effective and far-reaching reforms. The searching enquiry which was held in New York had one extremely satisfactory result. It demonstrated in the most conclusive fashion imaginable the absolute soundness of life assurance principles, and showed that even gross mismanagement on the commercial side could not impair the stability of Companies working on recognised principles. Another welcome feature of the inquiry was that, while the business managers and lawyers were found guilty in many respects, the actuaries and the doctors were above reproach. Their salaries were not illegitimately increased, and they had no share in the unsavoury investment transactions in which other officials participated.

Another sensation of the year was the fire at San Francisco. The total loss is estimated at something like £60,000,000, of which £35,000,000 had to be provided by the insurance Companies. The loss to British Companies alone was fully £10,000,000. The American business of British offices has never been conspicuously satisfactory, and it is a sanguine estimate to suppose that it will take the profits of the American business for the next twenty years to recoup the San Francisco loss. The payment of these claims involves by far the biggest call upon the resources of fire insurance offices that has ever been made. All the British Companies, and most of the American offices, have been able to meet their liabilities in full, and to retain adequate funds for the future, unless some other great catastrophe should happen. Apart from San Francisco the year has been a good one for the fire Companies, and even the one big loss has been of benefit to them, since it has demonstrated their financial strength, and has caused them, especially in the United States, to be esteemed and trusted more than ever before. From this confidence a profitable business is likely to result.

"TRUTH" TOY FUND.

The following amount has reached me towards the Toy Fund:—

A. M. Mandeville, Esq. (London and Paris Exchange), £2 2s.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Railways.

Novice, Abergavenny.—1. Buy Brighton "A.," North Easterns, and North Westerns. 2. My best thanks for your contribution to the Toy Fund. Prospector.—Take your profit and be thankful. I do not understand how a man who has made so much out of Canadian Pacifics on my recommendation can write the kind of letter which you have sent to me. Farway.—Try Brighton Railway Deferred.

Mines.

Styx.—1. Hold New Africans. 2. Zinc Corporations and Consolidation Deep Leads are both excellent speculations. 3. I should not hold. Dublin.—Keep your Simmer and Jack shares. The explanation of the drop in the shares is to be found in the generally depressed condition of the Kaffir market. Malay.—Buy Arizona Coppers if you can get them at anything like 7¼s. per share. W. F., Kensington Square.—In the circumstances you have no right to hold speculative shares. Sell out and get into Chinese Fives, Mexican Fours, Japanese Four-and-a-Halfs, or Johannesburg Fours. Appreciative.—Your mine holdings are extremely speculative, and I think you had better realise. B. and W., Arneham.—Labour is rather short, but so far as my knowledge goes, work on the property is increasing. Stuart.—A bonus is probable, but it has not been declared yet, and if I were in your position I should not be too sanguine about receiving it. J. G., Halifax.—You would be well advised to sell out and buy Arizona Coppers. C. J., Hereford.—The three mining shares you hold are likely to give you a good profit on a more active market. Union.—The shares are a very fair speculation.

Mixed Securities.

Rag.—I think you might leave the investments where they stand at present. A. M. F.—1. You can do much better by taking the money out of the Post-Office Savings Bank. 2. Of the three I should prefer the National Bank of India. Foreigner.—1. The shares are a very doubtful speculation. 2. The Company did not suffer heavily through the San Francisco earthquake. 3. Grand Trunk Third Preferred and Ordinary stocks are both promising speculative investments. 4. Try Brighton Railway Ordinary. Exon.—1. You have no reason for fear in connection with either Central London stock or Furness Withy shares. 2. I believe the venture has collapsed; any way, it was about as wild a gamble as a man could go in for. 3. By preference I should select a Home Railway stock, say one of the Heavies or Brighton Preferred Ordinary, or South-Western Preferred Ordinary. Old Lady.—1. I think it would be advisable to sell the shares. 2. Eastman's are good enough to hold for a better profit. Soldier.—1. The shares of the Land Corporation of Canada Company are likely to appreciate. 2. I have for some time past recommended a purchase of Qu'Appelle and Long Lake and SasKatchewan bonds, provided you can hold them for some time. 3. Grand Trunk Second Preference stock and the Canada Company shares. Novice, Kinghussie.—1. It seems to me that you can take your profit on English Sewing Cotton shares. 2. Fine Spinners are a good industrial investment. 3. Choose Boksburgs, and leave the other alone. Mond.—1. The Company is a firm running special brands of tobacco, and has no connection whatever with the mine. 2. Keep the Mexican Railway Ordinary. Porto.—1. I believe both concerns are well reputed. 2. The investments you suggest are promising. Colonel.—1. I do not see any reason to recommend a sale of any of the holdings enumerated in your letter. 2. I am glad that you made a profit out of my advice. York.—1. Grand Trunk Second Preference, Brighton Railway Preferred Ordinary, Lyons Ordinary. 2. I think I should transfer into North Eastern Ordinary or North-Western Ordinary. Guernsey.—1. I am afraid that the top has been touched in Argentine Rails. 2. As a matter of speculative investment I should suggest Grand Trund Third Preference or Ordinary. 3. Buy more to average. Sphynxalix.—As you will see from above, I do not recommend brokers, but the concern you name is, so far as I know, quite reliable.

Miscellaneous.

F. F. M.—Your transaction with the one particular bucket-shop was a gambling one, and you have no redress—it serves you right. F. R. J.—You have been taken in by the old bucket-shop dodge, against which I have been protesting in Truth for many years past. W. S. S. H.—I have warned my readers against dealing with these bucket-shops, and it comes as a surprise to me that I should receive such a letter after all. J. O. H.—The man you name disappeared more than a year ago, and has now reappeared under another name If you will write me again and give me details, I may be able to put you in a position to consult a solicitor. Moorhen.—The concern has a good reputation. W. H. H. B.—If you want to buy Continental Lottery Bonds you can get fair value from Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle Street. *C. D. They charge exorbitantly for the bonds, many of which are undesirable. Fides.—A notorious bucket-shop. Greenbrier, Plympton.—Aërated Breads are worth holding as commercial investments on the strength of the last performance.

Industrials Fairly Active — Anglo "A" Gamble — Breweries' Yields—Lyon's Strong—Dock Stock—Canada Co.—Gas Stocks for Investment—Textiles Prominent—Barnum's Decline.

Notwithstanding the adverse influences of this season of the year quite a fair degree of interest is being evinced in the Industrial market. This is a healthy sign, and would, in fact, seem to imply that the full significance of the recent satisfactory Board of Trade returns in relation to this market is being fully recognised. It augurs well for the New Year, when it is quite possible that a further broadening out of interest may occur unless something untoward develops to check the growth of confidence now in evidence, and with the general range of values still moderate I am inclined to believe that collectively Industrials are deserving of closer attention. One of the interesting features of the moment is the revival of the gamble in Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred stock, which may be ascribed to the approach of the dividend season. The declaration is due some time in February, and in interested quarters they profess to look for a much more substantial payment than that of 1905, when a modest 10s. per cent. was distributed. To justify the existing high price of the stock it would need be more substantial, but for my own part I am inclined to believe that these expectations will not be realised. It is true that the undertaking has enjoyed more prosperity, but, even so, it seems improbable that any substantial dividend on Anglo "A" will be practicable, and everything considered it appears to be very inflated at anything like 27. From the investment standpoint, however, Telegraphs as a group are worthy of consideration, such stocks as Anglo-American Preferred, Direct Spanish Preferred, Direct United States Cable, Easterns, and many others giving quite a respectable return, while at the same time affording good security. The better sentiment in regard to Brewery stocks which has been growing recently is still in evidence, though as a rule the recovery in values is not very material. The knowledge that the trade is participating in the greater prosperity of the country seems to make many of these stocks, especially those of the provincial group, rather attractive, and I have prepared the following table indicating the approximate yields obtainable:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Ashby's, Staines	7½	£9 12 0
Do. Preference	8	5 17 6
Bristol Georges	24	6 5 0
Dartford Preference	3¾	6 17 6
Lassalles, Tichener, Preference	4½	6 6 0
Nalder & Collyer	28	7 15 0
Newcastle Preference	9½	6 3 6
North Eastern	7¼	8 0 0

An interesting feature of the moment is the strength of Lyons shares, to the merits of which as a commercial investment I have frequently drawn attention. So far as "bunshop" shares go they make a very good holding in view of the good management and the progressive nature of the business, and it may be mentioned that the present upward movement is generally ascribed to the large Christmas trade done by the Company. I should imagine, however, that the prospective purchaser would be able to get in rather lower by looking on for a time. There is nothing fresh to add to what I have already said on the subject of Dock stocks, and particularly London and India Deferred. Having regard not only to the achievement of the first half of the year but the postponement of the Port Bill, the existing quotation seems rather inflated, especially as there does not seem to be any great chance of a material increase upon the 1¾ per cent. distribution of 1905. Apart from this, it is problematical what benefit would accrue to the stock by the materialisation of the Port Bill. Hudson's Bays continue to "hang fire," though, as I have pointed out before, the general impression is that early in the New Year there will be a recrudescence of the manipulative activities of the Anglo-American Canadian group who have been responsible for the establishment of the shares at the existing high figure. In view of this, it seems opportune to refer to the achievement of the Canada Company, which announces a dividend equal to 14s. per share for the half-year to January 10, or 3s. more than in 1905-6. It is shown that 5,400 acres were sold, or leased with an option of purchase, at an average of $17.30 per acre, and that 7,900 acres were leased at a rental of $2,400. This compares with 6,300 acres at an average of $13.64 per acre and 11,400 acres leased at $1,400, and represents a significant appreciation in land values. Despite the competition of electricity, gas is holding its own, not only as an illuminant, but for other industrial purposes, and the following table indicates the approximate yield obtainable upon securities of this class:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
British Gas Light	42	£3 15 0
Commercial 4 p.c.	112	4 12 0
Continental Union	129	5 2 0
Imperial	95	4 6 0
Gas Light and Coke	90	4 5 0
Imperial Continental	102	4 7 6
South Metropolitan	100	4 5 0

Considerable speculative interest is being evinced in Textile shares as a result of the statements that the industry continues to enjoy a fair degree of prosperity, and that the prospects generally are encouraging. Cycle and Motor shares remain quiet, with Humbers rather dullish in consequence of the conflagration at the Company's works. What cost this will involve it is, of course, impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy, but the fact that other premises have been obtained, thus enabling the output to be maintained while the original works are being rebuilt seems to be rather encouraging, and altogether the inopportune development is not regarded as being very serious. The uncertainty attaching to Show shares as a holding is testified by the passing of the Barnum and Bailey dividend. Gross receipts were only about £3,000 smaller at £301,548, but the net profit is only £16,500, as against £78,351, and the Ordinary shares, the dividend upon which has been gradually reduced from 10 per cent. to 7½ per cent. a year ago, is now nothing at all.

QUEER STORY.

A RUNAWAY RING.

IT was certainly rather rough on the Rev. Reginald Bisgood that by an act of the purest good-nature on his own part he should have been led into so awkward and distressing a complication.

If anything, he should have been rewarded for his kindness; but, in point of fact, he was severely penalised. However, such is not infrequently the case when we go out of our way to be kind to unworthy persons, and the person to whom the Rev. Reginald Bisgood went out of his way to be kind proved to be most unquestionably of that character.

A very small person it was, too. In fact, a little limb of a boy just five years old. And this is how it was.

The Rev. Reginald had just recently accepted the post of curate at St. Matthew's Church, Tootham, under the Rev. Jeremy Priggleswade, Vicar of that parish. Now a thoroughly typical specimen was this vicar of what may be called conventional piety. No man could have lived more strictly up to the smug standard of moral and social rectitude which obtains among the wealthy and respectable middle-classes of a prosperous country town—that standard which finds a royal road to Heaven, in black-coated and top-hatted propriety, a rigid observance of the letter of the ten commandments, and a righteous abhorrence of Bohemianism in any shape.

The Vicar of St. Matthew's expected to get to Heaven by this means. Incidentally, he also expected a more immediate reward—a desirable piece of worldly preferment, on the way. The very desirable living of St. Peter's, Tootham, the mother parish of the town, had just fallen vacant by the resignation of the Rector. The Rector, being a very old man, his reverend brother of St. Matthew's had for some time past taken the lead in ecclesiastical affairs in Tootham. The Vicar of St. Matthew's had, in fact, long looked upon himself as the future rector of Tootham, and when the old Rector resigned he lost no time in forwarding to the patron an application for the vacant living, accompanied by a sheaf of testimonials from several scores of influential parishioners.

That he should obtain his request he felt tolerably confident, since Mr. Jenkins, the patron of the living, although an absentee who never came near the place (being entirely given up to social life in London), had nevertheless always shown a laudable disposition to fall in with the wishes of the parishioners. At the time when his new curate, Mr. Bisgood, arrived Mr. Priggleswade was still awaiting the answer to his application.

And now for the little episode at which I hinted at the outset.

The new Curate was strolling one morning down one of the residential streets in the town when he saw a very small boy making heroic but vain attempts to reach the big brass handle of one of the front-door bells. Our good-natured young parson at once went to the child's assistance.

"Hallo, my little fellow! Can't reach it, eh? Well, let me ring the bell for you." And, suiting the action to the word, he gave the handle a mighty tug, which set the bell clanging loudly within.

A smile of huge gratification expanded the chubby face of the graceless urchin.

"Now we must cut and run," he lisped. And he was off, like a rabbit scuttling to earth, leaving the astonished and dismayed Curate alone upon the doorstep. The imp had evidently been simply amusing himself with the small boys' favourite pastime of runaway rings.

Before the Curate had time to recover from the shock, the door was opened by a rather flustered-looking maid-servant.

"I—I—ahem! Does—does—Mrs.—Mrs. Robinson live here?" he stammered, mentioning the first name that came into his head, as the best way out of the embarrassing situation in which that mischievous little joker had landed him. But, alas! this device, so far from proving a way out, had the directly opposite result, for, to his intense amazement and dismay, the maid answered:

"Yes, sir. Will you please walk in, sir?"

The Curate was so taken aback, that he complied, and before he knew where he was, found himself standing in the hall.

"What name shall I say, sir?" inquired the maid.

The Curate stammered out his name; the maid showed him into a well-furnished drawing-room, and then went to fetch her mistress. While she was gone, Mr. Bisgood stood on the hearthrug feeling very embarrassed, and trying to evolve some plausible explanation of his visit.

If the house had been in St. Matthew's parish, he might have carried things off easily and naturally enough by pretending that he had called to see the lady in the ordinary course of his professional ministrations. But the house was not in St. Matthew's parish; it was in the parish of St. Peter's; so he could scarcely put forward that pretext. And yet he must say something—and, well, perhaps, after all, as a new arrival in the town he might not unreasonably plead ignorance of parochial boundaries, and——

At that moment the lady of the house appeared. She was youngish, and decidedly pretty and attractive, though perhaps somewhat over-dressed. She bowed to Mr. Bisgood with entire self-possession. He returned the bow.

"Mrs. Robinson?" he murmured, awkwardly.

She smiled and nodded, then looked at him interrogatively, as though inviting him to state the object of his visit.

"I'm the—the—new curate," he began, "and I thought that, as I was passing——"

"Quite so. Pray be seated," interposed the lady, taking a chair herself, and indicating an adjacent ottoman to her visitor. "Very kind of you to call, I'm sure. Do you know, I've been here three months, and you are the first clergyman who has been to see me?"

At this statement the Rev. Reginald expressed much surprise. He felt it, too. A rather susceptible young man himself, he knew that he should certainly not have neglected to call, with proper frequency, on so fair a parishioner, and he wondered why the other clergy in the town had been so backward.

"I don't know how it is," continued Mrs. Robinson, candidly, "but I'm afraid I can't be exactly persona grata in Tootham. Everybody seems to fight shy of me. I'm not aware of having done anything to offend the worthy denizens of this highly respectable place. But such is the fact. I seem to be regarded as a sort of social leper. However, we won't talk about that. Let's talk about something pleasanter and more interesting."

And she at once led the conversation into impersonal channels. She was a good talker in addition to being a very pretty woman, and the Rev. Reginald found her society so agreeable, that he prolonged his visit rather unduly. Indeed, when he took his leave, he was surprised to find that he had been there for more than an hour.

Now, as it happened, his visit to Mrs. Robinson, and the length of time he had remained there, had not escaped the lynx-eyes of a certain highly respectable maiden lady who lived just over the way. This was Miss Letitia Partlett, a veritable dragon of propriety and self-constituted guardian of the morals of Tootham. Before the day was out she put on her best cloak and bonnet—latest examples of the style of the year before last—and flew round to St. Matthew's Vicarage, where she had a long private interview with the Vicar. The result of this interview was, that when the Curate went next morning for his day's instructions, he found himself greeted by his superior in the sternest and most frigid of tones.

"Come in here, if you please, Mr. Bisgood" said the Vicar, leading the way into his study. "I have something very unpleasant to discuss with you."

The Curate, not conscious of any particular delinquency, wondered what on earth was up. He was soon enlightened.

"Be good enough to explain to me," demanded the Vicar, very stern, righteous, and scathing, "how it is that you were seen to go into the house of that bad woman yesterday, and to remain with her for an hour and sixteen minutes?"

"Eh? Bad woman? What on earth do you mean? To whom are you referring?" cried out the Curate, in unaffected astonishment and indignation.

"Don't pretend ignorance, sir. You know very well," retorted the Vicar, witheringly. "Whom should I mean but that abandoned creature who calls herself Mrs. Robinson—a woman whose name is a by-word in the town, and whose house no relf-respecting person would be seen to enter—much less a minister of the Gospel, like yourself?"

The Curate looked as he felt, very much taken aback. Mrs. Robinson a bad character? Impossible! That she was a vivacious little woman and prone to flirtation had been obvious enough to him during their one hour's agreeable tête-à-tête. But that there was anything seriously amiss with her he could scarcely believe. She had not struck him as at all that sort of person.

"I did happen to go and see a Mrs. Robinson yesterday, under rather peculiar circumstances——" he answered.

"Very peculiar, I have no doubt," interposed the Vicar, with biting sarcasm.

"My calling upon her, however, was the purest of accidents——"

"Oh! of course," said the Vicar, more and more sarcastic.

"I beg you will do me the justice of hearing me out," rejoined the Curate, his colour rising. "The circumstances which resulted in my visiting this Mrs. Robinson were as follows." And he told the Vicar the exact circumstances, not omitting any detail.

The Vicar listened with an air of offensive incredulity, now and then shrugging his shoulders as much as to say, "Do you really think it worth while taking the trouble to tell me all these lies?"

When the Curate had quite done, he retorted, scoffingly:—

"A very pretty and ingenious story, Mr. Bisgood. I really don't know which to commend the more—your ingenuity in concocting it, or your effrontery in telling it."

"Do you mean to say you don't believe me?" demanded the Curate, beginning to grow heated.

The Vicar laughed a peculiarly nasty laugh.

"I wasn't born yesterday," he said; "and even if I had been, I should still have thought your story rather thin—especially your hitting on the woman's name accidentally, without any previous knowledge of her. That was so exceedingly likely, wasn't it?"

"Robinson is a common enough name. And, likely or not, it is precisely what happened," answered the Curate, now very indignant indeed.

"Oh! So that is all you have to say?" remarked the Vicar, dryly.

"No, it is not quite all," retorted the Curate, "I have also to say that—even assuming Mrs. Robinson's character to be what you imply—I could not possibly have known anything about it; for, until I saw her yesterday, I had never so much as heard of the woman."

Again the Vicar laughed his nasty scoffing laugh—a laugh that made it difficult for the Curate to refrain from kicking him.

"You must have heard of so notorious a person," he said. "A woman who is constantly visited on Sundays by flashy acquaintances—mostly men—in motor-cars, and who entertains them into the small hours with music and feasting and revelling. Why, Sir, the goings on in that Jezebel's house are the talk of the town. And you expect me to believe that you had never heard of her. No! no! Mr. Bisgood. Try that story on somebody a few years younger than I am."

The Curate was by this time—not unnaturally—in a white heat of passion.

"You're the first man who has ever dared to call me a liar; and by Heaven, I've a good mind to thrash you for the insult, you—you—smug Pharisee!" he cried, in a voice that trembled with perhaps excusable rage.

The Vicar, though endeavouring to sustain a calm, dignified, and contemptuous air, slipped rather hastily round to the other side of his study table, so as to interpose that solid piece of furniture between himself and his Curate. He was not a warrior, except linguistically, and he entertained a wholesome regard for his own skin. Thus entrenched behind four foot of mahogany, he said:—

"You are not improving your position by insolence and blasphemy, Mr. Bisgood. Had you been penitent and contrite, I might have given you another chance. But, in view of the outrageous manner in which you have taken my rebuke, the sooner you leave Tootham, the better."

"I'll go to-day," ejaculated the Curate.

"A wise resolve," rejoined the Vicar. "And—by the way—do not refer to me for a testimonial."

"I would not take a testimonial from you at a gift," answered the Curate.

"You will not have the chance," retorted the Vicar. "And, of course, it will be my duty to report your conduct to the Bishop."

"I hope you will," exclaimed the Curate. "The Bishop, by all accounts, has some Christian charity, and is not altogether destitute of the feelings of a gentleman." And with that Parthian shaft, steeped in venomous implication, he took his departure.

The pious Vicar was so much upset by the outrageous behaviour of his curate, that it was some days before he recovered his equanimity. However, an encouraging letter from the patron of the living of St. Peter's, which the Vicar received on the third day after the Curate's departure, did much to soothe his ruffled feelings. The letter ran as follows:—

DEAR SIR,—Your application for the living of Tootham has been sent on to me by Mr. Jenkins, the gentleman from whom I purchased the advowson some months ago.

Will you, if possible, make it convenient to call on me here the day after to-morrow—any time between two and six in the afternoon—and we can then discuss the matter.—I am, yours faithfully, M. DE BRACEY.

1,001, Eaton-square, S.W., Jan. 15, 19—.

You may be sure the Vicar lost no time in writing to say that he would, with pleasure, run up to London next day and see Mr. de Bracey, as requested. He saw himself already rector of Tootham. It seemed tolerably certain that the new patron would not have sent for him, unless he had serious thoughts of presenting him to the benefice.

When he arrived next afternoon at 1,001, Eaton-square, he asked the butler whether Mr. de Bracey was at home.

"Mrs. de Bracey, sir," the butler corrected him. "There is no Mr. de Bracey; my master has been dead some years. Yes, sir, the mistress is at home. She is expecting you, I think. Mr. Priggleswade, is it not? Will you walk in, please?"

The Vicar walked in, and was shown into the library, where the lady of the house, who was writing at her escritoire, rose to receive him.

The Vicar started. He turned pale. In the pretty woman who stood confronting him he recognised that depraved person, Mrs. Robinson.

"I—I—came to see Mrs. de Bracey," he stammered.

"And I am Mrs. de Bracey," she smiled. "You are surprised, eh?—because you have known me in another name. Well, the fact is this: When I purchased the advowson of Tootham with the knowledge that the late rector contemplated resigning at an early date, the idea struck me that I would come down to the place and live there awhile, in an assumed name, so that I might have a good opportunity of studying and sizing up the local clergy, with a view to seeing whether any of them were deserving to be appointed to the benefice, when it fell vacant."

She paused. The Vicar looked rather blank. He wished now that he had not been quite so hasty in his judgment of Mrs. "Robinson's" character. Further, he hoped, with all his heart, that she had not heard of that little row he had had with his Curate in connection with the latter's visit to her house.

The lady went on:—

"My rather Bohemian way of life appears to have shocked all the good people of Tootham immensely; and I won't deny that, when I saw that, I took something of a malicious pleasure in even going out of my way to shock them further. Still, I hardly think that they—least of all you clergy, who are supposed to be especially endowed with the virtue of Christian charity—need have jumped to the conclusion that I was a bad character."

"Oh, I never thought that—" began the Vicar, in obsequious deprecation.

"No?" she ejaculated, with a slight lift of her shapely shoulders. "Then I wonder why you dismissed that nice curate of yours for the iniquity of merely calling to see me."

"Oh, that was a mistake—an unfortunate mistake——"

"A very unfortunate mistake, Mr. Priggleswade, as you are now to learn. Had you behaved differently, and as a minister of the Gospel ought, I should probably have presented you to the benefice. But, as it is, I have decided to present your late curate, the Rev. Reginald Bisgood."

QUEER STORY PUZZLE.

(TRUTH, DEC. 19.)

NOTICE TO COMPETITORS.

By a regrettable accident, a misprint occurred in the Puzzle Story published in TRUTH of Dec 19. The date of the letter from Amy Beadle to her mother given on page 1517 should have been "January 2, 190-," not "1906" as printed. That "1906" was a typographical error could be seen from internal evidence, and I find that all Competitors whose Solutions have been received up to the present time have assumed it to be so if they have noticed the mistake at all. The misprint does not, therefore, in any way affect the Competition.

The correspondent signing himself "Puzzled," who writes to point out that "all the incidents surrounding the cashing of the cheque are impossible," because "January 1st is a Bank Holiday," is misinformed as to the dates of Bank Holidays in England.

MUSIC.

PARRY ON STRAUSS.

SIR HUBERT PARRY has been expressing his views on Richard Strauss, and the result was bound to be interesting. This was not the first time that the composer of "Job" had discussed the music, so different from his own, which finds shape in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Juan," and the rest. In the last edition of his well-known manual of musical history, published by Messrs. Novello, there is, for instance, a gracefully phrased appreciation of his most remarkable contemporary. Now, it is in his capacity as Professor of Music at Oxford University that he has been, so to speak, dotting the i's and crossing the t's of his earlier estimate by dealing with Strauss's methods in a somewhat more critical spirit. Among other things Parry lays stress on the fact that Strauss, though commonly identified with music of the "programme" order, has really gone beyond this, and given us that of a different kind altogether. The phase in which the whirling fury of the recent advance has arrived (we are told) is that in which the composer discourses to the world of things which have deeply stirred his spirit. "The musician tried to present in a medium which far transcended the possibilities of words, and in phases of feeling which were different from their sphere, the arguments of mood and emotion, condensing, in fact, in a few musical subjects the mental and temperamental state which could only be presented otherwise by volumes of verbal discussion."

Unfortunately, it would appear that in Parry's judgment the attempt has not been attended so far with conspicuous success, and he dwells in particular upon the violence and eccentricity of the methods to which Strauss has recourse in order to achieve the objects of this "post-programme phase of art." Incidentally, by the way, he ascribes the rise of this particular school to the profusion of performances during recent years of Wagnerian excerpts in the concert room, whereby, he suggests, the amateur became familiarised with the notion of listening to music charged with specific meaning to a degree not previously attempted. It is an interesting suggestion, but not all will be prepared to accept it, I fancy, as a quite adequate explanation or true cause of the phenomenon in question. Surely such compositions as the "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies of Liszt, the "Symphonie Fantastique," and kindred works of Berlioz, taken in conjunction, of course, with the general extension of the expressive resources of instrumental music, had more to do with the matter than the mere performance of Wagnerian excerpts in the concert room? Does not Sir Hubert go astray, too, in laying quite so much stress upon what he doubtless regards as the polyphonic barbarities (though he is much too polite to term them such in public) of Strauss? Strauss's polyphony is of a different order, doubtless, but is it in the least degree more complex or involved than that which may be found, not only in the music of the Moors and the Siamese, to whom Sir Hubert drily refers in this connection, but also in the works of the most venerated masters at the head of whom stands Bach himself?

Then again, as to Strauss's melodies. Parry dwells on their awkwardness and lack of spontaneity. "In the first theme of 'Ein Heldenleben' the melodic figures jumped about to all the most startling and unlikely points of the scale in order to arrest attention and suggest exultation and vigour. Such devices were to be met with in every direction, and the extent to which they had permeated Strauss's terminology was shown by the fact that similar selections of extreme melodic progressions were manifested in his operatic works." Are not these criticisms, however, such as are invariably preferred in the case of all music really new and different from that which has been known before? Strauss's tunes often wear, no doubt, a rather unprepossessing aspect at first, but who has not realised with astonishment how their asperities disappear with closer acquaintance? Moreover, whenever the question of his powers as a melodist is under discussion the incontestable loveliness of many of his songs can never be overlooked.

One conclusion, at any rate, irresistibly suggests itself on any general survey of the work of Strauss considered as typical of the music of to-day; and this is the tremendous earnestness and intensity of purpose which it reveals. In this he is certainly the child of his age. Reger is another who immediately comes to mind in this connection. Concerning him that highly competent critic, Moritz Rosenthal, has, I notice, been expressing himself recently in outspoken fashion:—

> We don't mind the thorns if there are roses too, but to tear your fingers on the thorns and then find no roses—that's the way with Reger. In a piece of his music there is usally no settled tonality. Three or four times in a single measure the key may change. The result is like asking a question in Russian and answering it in Japanese. His music is a kind of harmonic lottery. Such a man I cannot regard as an influence, or otherwise than as an abnormal sideshoot of the great musical stem.

That is Rosenthal's opinion, and he is to be commended for expressing it. But it does not necessarily dispose of Reger. It merely goes to show that his music, like that of Strauss, is new and individual. Whether it is also a thing of beauty and of lasting worth time will tell. In any case this at least may be said with confidence, that it will be a sad day for music when composers who excite the animadversions of even their most enlightened contemporaries cease to exist.

The most interesting musical event of the near future will be the opening of the season of German opera at Covent Garden, which starts on Monday, January 14, with a performance of "Tristan," conducted by Herr Nikisch. It was reported some time ago that Herr Nikisch was not likely to come after all, but Mr. Van Dyck has since stated that he will positively appear. The interesting announcement has also been made that if the coming season succeeds it is the intention of those behind the venture to make it an annual affair, and in future years to extend the length of the season. It rests with the public, therefore, to bring this about and to ensure thereby virtually opera all the year round in London. In future years, too, it may be hoped that it may be possible to employ many more native singers than have been engaged for the forthcoming season. There seems no reason, indeed, why, in time, the bulk of the performers should not be English-speaking, with just a stiffening of imported "stars." This would not only encourage native talent, but materially reduce expenses. Also, it would mean, in most cases, infinitely more agreeable voices than Germany is usually able to send us, and incidentally might pave the way for the more liberal employment of native artists in the grand season. But this is looking ahead. At present the main thing is to make a success of the season shortly to be begun; and that this result will be attained there seems every reason to anticipate.

Great things are being done just now in New York with a burlesque of "Lohengrin," in which three performers, well known in London, Mme. Lilian Blauvelt, Miss Cissie Loftus, and Mr. Maurice Farkoa are taking part. From the accounts to hand it does not seem to be a particularly brilliant affair, but perhaps that is why it has proved such a success. A musical parody which would really appeal to the cultivated musician would be over the heads of the average audience. Yet there ought to be plenty of scope for clever productions managing to hit the happy mean. Attempts in this direction have, however, been curiously few. Musicians in general have strangely neglected the possibilities of parody and caricature. "Burning to Sing," which is one of the attractions of the Empire just now, is an amusing skit on opera in general, and most of the Gilbert and Sullivan series may be regarded, of course, in the same light; but works of this order by no means exhaust the possibilities of the case. Let one of our clever young musicians think the matter over, therefore, and give us a lively parody of Strauss or Debussy. Unfortunately most of those at present before the public seem to find the penning of dirges, odes to death, and the like, more congenial.

Recent allusion to what a writer, greatly daring, ventured to dub the "musical and intellectual snobbery" of the Joachim Quartet audiences, who flock to the Joachim concerts, but leave all others of equally high class severely alone, has called forth, I notice, various comments, some approving and some critical. One writer attempts a defence of the accused audiences, which I am afraid is not very convincing:—

Numbers of Joachim's admirers and friends (he has a great many in London) make a point of attending his concerts partly for the sake of "auld lang syne," partly because they feel that in spite of his diminished powers of execution he can still give them what no other violinist can. Many of them are those whose chief delight is in chamber-music, who have quartet parties at home, and who hear as much music as they want in that way. When professed concert-goers neglect concerts of the highest class, which would do their minds good, and flock to others merely to have their ears tickled—there have been instances of this—they may reasonably be blamed. But it is going too far when the rod is applied to such harmless folk as those who subscribe to the Joachim concerts.

This is all very well, but I confess I find it difficult to believe in so many hundreds of earnest amateurs all curiously enough wrapped up entirely in chamber music and finding all their normal wants supplied by performances in private. Certainly it affords an inspiring conception of the extent to which the art is cultivated in private nowadays, and I only wish I could believe that the theory bore any relation to the actual facts of the case.

I have vivid recollections of a particularly striking contrast afforded a few seasons back when, concurrently with the Joachim concerts, at which Beethoven's posthumous quartets were the chief attraction, a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D (under Weingartner) was given at Queen's Hall. The Joachim concerts were, of course, thronged, while that at which a superb performance of the Mass in D was given was half-empty. Is it really possible to believe in amateurs so curiously constituted that, whereas they revelled in the quartets, they with one accord found no attraction in the Mass? The real explanation was, I fancy, much simpler. Then, as still, it was the thing in certain circles to be seen at the Joachim concerts, whereas the performance of the Mass enjoyed no such adventitious help. In other words, Joachim was fashionable; mere Beethoven was not.

On the subject of Handel's borrowings, a correspondent (Mr. P. Robinson, Rusholme, Lancs.) writes:—

May I be permitted to point to the following facts:—

1. That of the larger borrowings which are certain, those from Muffat, Clari, and Habermann, seem to have been derived from printed and published works.

2. That if the organ canzona was contained in Kerl's original "Modulatio Organica," it also had been printed at Munich in 1686.

3. That Carissimi's "Plorate," used in "Samson," had, so it is said, been printed in Kircher's "Musurgia."

4. With regard to the other certain case of importance, the borrowings from Graun's "Brunswick Passion," it may be noted: (a) That Brunswick is only thirty miles from Hanover. (b) That George II. and his suite stayed at Hanover from May to October, 1735. (c) That Handel's use of Graun dates from the beginning of 1736. (d) That nearly all the first instances were in connection with music written to celebrate the wedding of Prince Frederick, Handel's old enemy.

5. That Bach's borrowings do not seem to have been recorded in his MSS., and may equally be said to have been unacknowledged.

Mr. Robinson's theory, as I understand him, is that Handel's borrowings were all perpetrated in an open and above-board fashion, because the works from which he borrowed were in print and available to the whole world at the time. I have not studied the matter sufficiently to be able to offer any opinion as to the accuracy of my correspondent's statements, but it would require very powerful argument to convince the average man that most of Handel's appropriations could conceivably be regarded as the legitimate adoption of other men's ideas in the sense that Mr. Robinson would appear to suggest.

The whirligig of time! In the account of a new composition recently produced at Paris one reads, "The work is rather reactionary, because the composer has not scrupled to use Wagnerian effects of strings, whereas the newest tendency here is anything but Wagnerian." Thus it is seen that the composer of "Tristan," who is still regarded as a dark and dangerous revolutionary by the members of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, is already outmoded and voted a fossilised old fogey on the banks of the Seine. But this is no new thing, of course. Do they not talk already in Germany of a post-Strauss school?

Mr. W. Wolstenholme, the well-known blind organist, has found it necessary, I note, to issue a formal contradiction of certain imaginative statements which have recently been issued concerning him. Thus he is not a Doctor of Music, Sir Edward Elgar did not hear him as "a poor Blackburn lad" play the organ, Sir Edward was not responsible for his education, and he did not make the arrangements with the Oxford authorities whereby Mr. Wolstenholme was enabled to take his University degree. On the contrary, he was educated at the College for Blind Sons of Gentlemen at Worcester, and it was the late Headmaster of the College, the Rev. S. T. Forster, M.A., who directed his studies and arranged matters at Oxford. Elgar at the time taught the violin at the college, and that was how he came to make Mr. Wolstenholme's acquaintance. Subsequently, also, he did act as has often been stated, as Mr. Wolstenholme's amanuensis at Oxford, and otherwise helped him, and Mr. Wolstenholme refers gratefully to his many acts of kindness; but not unnaturally he objects to such nonsensical statements about himself as have recently been circulated.

Mr. Algernon Ashton's latest—or one of his latest—is truly magnificent. It appeared in a recent issue of the Star, and must really be given in full.

SIR,—You say that I have "unkindly" omitted the name of "Shakespeare" from a list of the ten greatest Englishmen because I do not for one moment believe he wrote the great plays. You then go on to ask:—"Does it not occur to Algernon that somebody may one day propose to omit him from a list of the ten greatest letter-writers on the ground that he did not write the great letters?" No, this did not occur to me, for the simple reason that I know exactly what I am—not a "great" letter-writer, but merely a voluminous one. On the other hand, it is quite certain that if, long after I am dead and gone, a list of the ten greatest English composers should ever be drawn up, the name of Algernon Ashton could not possibly be omitted.—Yours, etc.,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

The world knows nothing of its greatest men, but Algernon is clearly of opinion that this is not a desirable state of affairs.

Concert-goers will read with something like consternation that an entirely new and original method of teaching the violin has been invented, whereby, one is given to understand, Kubeliks and Marie Halls will be turned out like shelling peas. A Mr. Ostrovsky accepts responsibility for this appalling discovery, his method being based, it seems, upon a careful preliminary diagnosis of the fingers, hands, wrists, and arms of each individual pupil, who is then set to correct his or her particular defects and disadvantages by special gymnastics. Afterwards, the most exacting passages of Ernst and Paganini become the merest child's play. The announcement opens up a fearsome prospect. If someone would only devise a means of making it more difficult to play the violin, he would be a real benefactor of his species.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM.—You have often noticed on the stage how a man's dress emphasises, and is probably meant to emphasise, the femininess of the figure of the girl who assumes it. Similarly, it seems to me, our Suffragettes in the hysterical clamour of their claims for masculine rights emphasise their feminine unfitness for the exercise of such rights. "A Revolutionary Princess" (1), e.g., an ardent advocate of the intellectual equality of the sexes, showed conspicuously in her masculine rôle of agitator for the freedom and unity of Italy, all the distinctive weaknesses of her sex. Certainly the impression this interesting memoir of the Princess leaves upon you is rather that of "Daniel Stern" than of Heine.

"Yours," hysterically writes Heine to the lady, "is the most complete personality I have found on earth. Yes! Before I knew you I imagined that persons like you, endowed with all the perfections of body and mind, existed only in fairy tales or in the dreams of poets. Now, I know that the Ideal is not mere chimera: That a Reality corresponds to our most sublime Imaginings. When thinking of you, Princess, I sometimes cease to doubt another Divinity, which I was also prone to relegate to the realm of my dreams."

That is the view of the lover and the poet, and, I might almost add, to complete the Shakespearean trio, of the lunatic lover and poet, "of imagination all compact." Now let us see how the Revolutionary Princess looks to a lady, not under the glamour of her sex, beauty, and rank, by the "dry light" of common sense.

"Never did a woman," writes Madame d'Agoult ("Daniel Stern") "more fully understand the art of effect than did the Princess Belgiojoso. She searched for and found it in everything; to-day in the form of a negro and the study of theology; to-morrow in the Arab whom she paraded in her carriage in order to intrigue the frequenters of the Bois. Yesterday she found it in conspiracy, in exile, in the very shells of the omelette she herself prepared over her fire at the time it suited her to feign ruin. Pale, thin to emaciation, with eyes of flame, she cultivated the aspect of a spectre or a phantom. Readily, also for the sake of effect, she gave credence to certain rumours which put into her hands the cup and dagger of the Borgia."

The Princess, in a word, was a consummate poseuse. It would, no doubt, be too much to say that her revolutionary principles were donned as an effective dress; but she certainly changed them like a garment, favouring whichever party of patriots it suited her best to favour. The frontispiece of the memoir represents the Princess as she appeared at the head of her Falstaffian regiment of Neapolitan volunteers, whom she described as belonging mainly "to the highest society of Naples," and to whom she distributed brevets of rank thus royally:—"We, Princess Christina di Belgiojoso, do hereby name and appoint, etc." But the end of these braves was also Falstaffian. "I have led my rascals," cried Falstaff, "where they have been peppered. Out of the one hundred and fifty but three are left alive, and they to beg at the town's end for the rest of their days." But Falstaff's ragamuffins at least met and fought the foe, whereas these Neapolitan gentry, according to Hübner, had to be exterminated, like wolves, by the side they had come to help!

These budding young heroes were put on the train at the Porta Tosca station and despatched to the seat of war. Three weeks later a score of poor devils in rags could be seen begging alms in the streets of Milan. This was all that remained of the Neapolitan braves. They never saw the enemy, but committed such depredations of all kinds that the exasperated peasantry more or less exterminated them.

Far from the least characteristic freak of the Princess was the embalming of the corpse of a consumptive young fellow who fell dead in her presence. Why, with her horror of death and her terror of ghosts, she should have kept the embalmed corpse in a bedroom cupboard. is a mystery; but that she did so is implicitly admitted, while being explicitly denied by her biographer.

Fantastic as were all her vagaries, the hypothesis that she caused the corpse to be concealed in a cupboard in her own house during all these weeks is too preposterous for serious consideration.

Yet on the preceding page you read —

For reasons unexplained, she took steps to have the body partially embalmed, although within three days the coffin (containing a log of wood) was interred with all religious rites.

Why embalm a body that was to be buried in three days? And if the body was embalmed by her order, it is to be presumed it was by her order a log of wood was substituted for it in the coffin. Probably many of the eccentric or irresponsible acts of the Princess were due to her ill-health as a confirmed epileptic. No doubt to it was due the icy coldness, underlying a seemingly sympathetic exterior, which Alfred de Musset ungratefully satirised in his poem upon her "Sur Une Morte." Ungratefully, for during the poet's illness she visited and ministered to him continually, guaranteeing life to him by her mere presence! "One day," writes the poet's brother and biographer, "when he was feeling particularly ill, the Princess remarked with the utmost assurance: 'Calm yourself. No one ever dies in my presence.' When she promised to return on the morrow it was in perfect sincerity that he whispered: 'Then I shall not die on the day.'" In reading Miss Simpson's "Occasion's Forelock" (2), I recalled Bacon's comparison of the way of fortune to the milky way—"a knot of a number of small stars, not seen asunder, but giving light together. So there are a number of little and scarce discerned virtues that make men fortunate." You do not quite know why the hero of "Occasion's Forelock" should be so fortunate, or indeed, for that matter, why he should be the hero instead of the chivalrous Hugh Harwich. However, the men of the book do not matter so much—in spite of its being a political novel—for the women are excellently imagined and described, especially the aunt of the heroine and the girls of the Oxford College. The main defect of the novel as a story is that your sympathies throughout grate against those of the author, whose hero, Eustace Gleig, blocks the course and wins the race against your hero, Hugh Harwich. Eustace's single Quixotic act of chivalry is, besides, too improbable for belief. "The Heart that Knows" (3) is a most interesting New Brunswick story of a girl left derelict by her sailor lover through the jealous and Machiavellian machinations of her rival. Her son (and his) resolves to avenge his mother's ruined life and all the insults her ruin brought on her and on himself, upon his own father; but when son and father meet, unconscious of their relationship, they become mutually devoted, while the discovery of their relationship is speedily followed by the discovery of the treachery to which the whole trouble was due. The village life and the persecution to which the derelict heroine and her fatherless boy are subjected are admirably described, and, indeed, the whole story grips you from the first page to the last. In Mrs. Clifford's collection of short stories, "The Modern Way" (4), you are more interested in the characters than in the incidents, since the author is a master of the art of making bricks with little straw and of any clay. Perhaps the grim "The Heart of the Wood" is the most original and fascinating tale in the collection, and "The Bread-snatchers" the most instructive. It certainly went straight home to my own business and bosom. The preface to "A Woman" (5) declares it to be "a record of actual experience," but it is the terrible experience "of a woman steeped in the poisonous juices that distil from the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge—an abnormal, a decadent, a 'sport,' even." For my own part, to borrow the language of the grim record, I found in it "the fume of a sewer—the opening of a drain," mixed with a scent which tries to overpower it—of patchouli.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Mr. B. L. Putnam Weale has written a book entitled "The Truce in the East and the Aftermath," which forms a sequel to "The Re-Shaping of the Far East," published a year ago. As the title indicates, the main point of the new book is to show that the present condition of affairs in Manchuria and Korea offers little prospect of permanent peace. Mr. Weale has travelled through the country a good deal since the war. His work, which will be illustrated from photographs, will be issued by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.

Mr. Murray will have ready this month Lord Dunraven's book, "The Outlook in Ireland," in which he sets out "the case for devolution and conciliation."

"A new thrill of the supernatural" is promised in a novel by Mr. Arnold Bennett, entitled "The Ghost," which Messrs. Chatto and Windus are to publish. It deals with the operatic worlds of London and Paris, and is another of the series of fantasies on modern themes which the author began with "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

The new novels to be issued this month by Messrs. Methuen include "Temptation," a story of mediæval

Italy by Mr. Richard Bagot; "A Midsummer Day's Dream," by Mr. Marriott Watson; and "A Blind Bird's Nest," by Miss Mary Findlater.

The fifth volume of the late Sir Walter Besant's "Survey of London" has just been published by Messrs. Black. Entitled "Mediæval London: Ecclesiastical," it deals with the religious life of the period and the growth and domination of the vast number of monastic houses, now so wholly vanished that a name here and there, applied to a very different institution, such as St. Martin's-le-Grand, alone remains to remind us of their whereabouts.

Mr. Harry de Windt's new book, "Through Savage Europe," is an account of a tour in the Balkans and a study of the affairs and people of those parts. It will be published by Mr. Unwin.

Mr John Lane has taken over the publication of the Independent Review. It is stated that the proprietors, while maintaining the lofty ideals of cultured Liberalism that have always distinguished this magazine, will make every effort to increase its influence; and, as hitherto, articles of general appeal will be inserted, irrespective of political interest.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

A year ago the editors of the peerages and other books of reference were placed in an awkward fix through the change of Government and the accompanying bestowal of honours, at the very moment when the annual volumes were being published. However, they now have their reward, especially the editors of the peerages, inasmuch as the 1907 editions embrace so many new names and so much new information that previous issues are entirely obsolete. It is long since there has been such a profuse distribution of honours as has taken place during the past twelve months. The total number announced, including the "resignation" and "appointment" honours, was 640; and of these thirty-one were new peerages and thirty-two new baronetcies. Consequently an exceptionally large number of persons now for the first time enjoy the distinction of figuring in the stately volume of "Burke's Peerage and Baronetage" (Harrison and Sons, 42s. net), a work which under the skilful editorship of Mr. Ashworth P. Burke fully maintains its high reputation for the amplitude and accuracy of its genealogical and heraldic records. Burke still retains as one of its principal features that wonderful guide to relative precedence, in which every one with a title is classified and numbered according to his or her degree. The present is the sixty-ninth annual edition of Burke; but it is quite a youthful publication in comparison with "Debrett's Peerage" (Dean and Son, Limited, price 31s. 6d.) which is now in its 194th year. Not that there are any signs of old age about Debrett. On the contrary, it is a vigorous and flourishing publication, carefully compiled, conveniently arranged, handsomely turned out, and in every respect a model of what a "Peerage" should be. "Lodge's Peerage" (Kelly's Directories, Limited, price 21s.) has now reached its seventy-sixth annual edition. It is a thoroughly comprehensive work, particularly noteworthy for the fulness of its information with reference to collaterals. Henceforth, by the way, "Lodge's Peerage" will be under the editorship of Sir Arthur Vicars, Ulster King of Arms.

For people who do not need the elaborate genealogies of the larger works, "Dod's Peerage" (Whittaker and Co., price 10s. 6d.) is an admirable handbook. It compresses a great amount of information about the titled classes into a volume of moderate size, and its arrangement makes references to it extremely easy. "Whitaker's Peerage" (12, Warwick-lane, E.C., price 3s. 6d.) is a smaller work, also remarkable for its facility of reference. The distinctive feature of "Walford's County Families" (Spottiswoode and Co., price 50s.), is, of course, its inclusion of the untitled as well as the titled aristocracy, so that for many purposes it is even more useful than a peerage. Another work of a wider scope than the peerages is "Kelly's Handbook to the Titled, Landed, and Official Classes" (Kelly's Directories, Limited, price 16s.).

To the vast majority of Londoners, at any rate, whether they belong to the classes or the masses, the most familiar and the most indispensable of all the books of reference is Kelly's "Post Office London Directory." The directory is now in its 108th annual edition, but old though it is, it remains absolutely unrivalled. Nobody ventures to challenge the supremacy of Kelly, whose work is as nearly perfect as it is possible for anything of the kind to be. Despite the adoption of many ingenious space-saving devices, the directory, including the suburban sections, now makes a prodigious volume (price 40s.) of no fewer than 4,680 pages, without counting advertisements. Any one who thinks it too big in this form—and certainly it is rather heavy to handle—can, however, purchase it in two volumes, while several different sections are also issued separately. "The Royal Blue Book" (price 5s.), another of Kelly's publications, gives, in addition to a great deal of Court and official information, the customary street and alphabetical directory of the names and addresses of those whom the preface describes as "the better-class private residents" in a district stretching to Hampstead in the north, the Chelsea reaches of the Thames in the south, Finsbury-circus in the east, and Hammersmith in the west.

As a biographical annual "Who's Who" (A. and C. Black, price 10s. net) still holds a unique position among books of reference. Everybody has a place in its pages; perhaps a captious critic might say that some are there who are nobodies, or who at least occupy more room than they are worth. One rather wonders, for instance, why an American meteorologist should be given as much space as the Prime Minister, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. John Burns put together. Still, "Who's Who" is an invaluable annual, and its offspring, "The Who's Who Year Book," also has the recommendation of containing much information that cannot be so readily procured elsewhere.

"Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities" (Chatto and Windus, price 1s. 6d.) is a compendium of information collected for the guidance of the benevolent in the bestowal of their benefactions. It has the merit of setting out the names, addresses, and other particulars relating to the charitable institutions of London in a very handy form. "Whitaker's Almanac" (12, Warwick-lane) is such a well-established institution that it is scarcely necessary here to do more than mention the appearance of the issue for 1907. It retains all its familiar features, and in the way of new matter gives articles on Army reform and the growth of travelling facilities in London.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—You can scarcely imagine, even with your vivid fancy, the beauty of the scene in the Palm Court of the Carlton Hotel on Christmas Eve. The floor was covered with a thick white carpet, resembling snow in its softness, into which the feet sank, as well as in its colour. In one corner stood a Swiss chalet, snow-covered and sparkling with ice. Round it were fir-trees, their branches laden with snow. The whole scene was carried out in the same illusory way, the admiration of the grown-ups who were present and the intense joy of the children. Crackers and other gifts were bestowed with a liberal hand. The whole thing was M. Jacques' idea, and created quite a sensation. It was amusing to hear the exclamations of joy and wonder as each fresh party entered. The Christmas tree proved sufficiently attractive to draw some 700 persons to tea, and the restaurant was packed for the later and more important meal, for which many visitors remained.

The beautiful presents in the Palm Court were distributed by Father Christmas, who led a donkey whose burden of crackers did not seem to distress it much. The glee of the children ran mountains high, and it is nice to know that the children of the poor were not forgotten. Parcels of good things and toys were sent to several children's hospitals and institutions.

London has no use for snow! It is merely an incumbrance and a nuisance, and directly it arrives upon the scene it is the aim of everybody to get rid of it as quickly as possible. The exquisite white flakes falling so silently and gently are treated with scant civility as they accumulate. We so seldom have dry, thick snow that our chief apprehensions were of the black mud that would ensue. But the snow lay, and the silence that it spread was, perhaps, a relief to the nerves in one way, but a great strain on them in another. A motor-'bus would slide quietly out of the obscurity without so much as a cough, and, like Kipling's liner in a Channel fog, "hoot down the back of one's neck." A frightened squeal would be the first announcement that a lady found herself embracing a cab-horse. It was a commentary on all the complaints of "noisy London" that when not a sound could be heard the grumbles rose higher than ever! The authorities had cleared the deeper snow with only intermittent intelligence. For instance, at the corner of Upper Baker-street, where all the motor and horse omnibuses stop, there was a mound of snow nearly three feet deep between the roadway and the pavement, and this continued unbroken as far as the eye could see. There were some funny sights here. "Surely you cannot expect me to jump?" inquired a stately lady of a most amused conductor. "Just as you like, mum," said he. She preferred to walk. A man strode valiantly over the obstruction, unhampered by petticoats, and then turned to his wife with a "What are you waiting for?" "Help—or trousers!" said she, with some acidity. Then they both laughed, and he lifted her over. Nor was the "Irate Ratepayer" wanting. "In all the course of my experience," said he, looking at the mound from the step of the omnibus he was leaving, "it has never been my lot to observe anything so flagrantly neglectful of the comfort of the ratepayers. I shall take steps to lay it before the authorities. I pay £30 a year in rates, and here I cannot get off an omnibus!" The conductor was impatiently waiting to get rid of him and ring his bell. "Oh, yes you can!" he said. "It's a penny extra beyond this corner," he added, to the world in general; and the indignant gentleman made shift to leap across to the pavement. Further up the road, where a blank wall runs along for some distance, we noticed no fewer than three breaks left in the snow for foot-passengers! Such are the wonderful workings of municipal brains.

I have just spent twenty minutes over the fascinating pages of Liberty's Winter Sale catalogue. The feminine creature dearly loves a bargain, but I, for one, am not at all infatuated with it, when it means merely something cheap and nasty. Here, however, everything is but too tempting; the incomparable velveteens, silks, soft satins, cashmeres (ideal for winter wear, so warm and yet so fine and supple), all marked down to most tempting prices. Send at once for a catalogue and judge for yourself. Just look at the very first page with its list of silks at 1s. and 1s. 6d. per yard, and then muse over the remnants of the velveteen at eighteen pence a yard (usual price 3s. 11d.). But do not muse too long, for if you do you will be late with your order and all those thousands of yards will be already gone. The floral flannels, too, will tempt you. It is a lovely material with a pretty sheen on it. But even more than any of these is the double cashmere attractive in its exquisite softness. It is to be had in twenty colourings besides black and white.

Now is the time, too, to buy the dainty muslins and lawns for which this house is famous. There are linens, cotton voiles, and dress canvases, to say nothing of blouses at far less than half the usual prices in silk, washing or otherwise, floral flannel, linen, cotton velveteen, many of them beautifully embroidered. Do tea-gowns tempt you? Here you are, then. Some are in velvet richly embroidered in jewels and silk, others in crêpe-de-chine in a variety of delicate colourings with pearl and silver trimmings. The delightfully cosy wadded Japanese dressing gowns and jackets are not forgotten. What should we do without them on these wintry mornings?

I must skip the jewels, handkerchiefs and ties, scarves and fans, pincushions and lampshades, and get on to the very inexpensive tapestries, cretonnes, chintzes, curtains, carpets, wallpapers, and furniture. There are fascinating Kashmir embroideries, wool on white cotton for cushion squares, table covers, and curtains, and thousands of Indian palampores hand-coloured in characteristic native designs in finely harmonised colours, and suitable for bedspreads, sofa covers, and loose covers for arm chairs. Do you want a Turkey carpet? Here is your chance to get one for very little over half price. Many of them have medallion centres and the colours are of great beauty and variety. I shall never forget one I saw there once with red in the centre and a cream-coloured border. Many other sorts of carpets and rugs are in the list, including the English pile squares, ready for immediate use, thick and closely woven and at very little over half price. The feet sink into their luxurious softness and the word "cheap" seems anomalous in connection with them; a very agreeable anomaly!

Mim let her house furnished while she was on her voyage round the world, and took possession again just before Christmas. The tenants had been of the objectionable order, dealing destruction's devastating doom to almost everything in the place. There was not a fragment left of Mim's pet Imari tea service, and just three saucers of her breakfast service survived the drastic treatment of the apparently Cyclopian domestics. A handsome jardinière of Linthorpe pottery, particularly valuable as that sort of pottery is no longer made, had utterly disappeared. Tables were smashed, legs of chairs off, bedsteads broken, crockery broken, and not a key left in any door! Even the chimney-pieces were torn from their fastenings and left hanging loose, or else marked with a hammer or chopper. Mim calls that family the Gorillas. She declares that human beings could not possibly have wrought such havoc.

Worst of all, to her ideas, they allowed the moth to get in her velvet drawing-room curtains and in her beautiful Jaeger blankets, one of the joys of her life in winter weather. She was matching a scrap of them to wool to have them darned with when we met her in Robinson and Cleaver's—one of the best "matching" places in London, by the way.

We wanted to hear all about her adventures in going round the world, but her grievances about her house were in the foreground of her mind and likely to remain there for some time, I fancy. She was conspicuously unfortunate in her tenants. There is Naneen, who let her flat furnished for two whole years, and found it as perfect in every detail as on the day she had given up possession. Now that all the world lets its houses, from dukes downwards, it is as well to realise that tenants are as much a lottery as marriage.

A very great lady who let her splendid house many years ago to a foreign royalty has never got over their treatment of her property. Their carelessness was almost beyond belief. The fine library was almost ruined by them. Of books, rare and costly, in three volumes, one volume would be missing, perhaps two. Pages were gone from other books, and a catalogue that had been laboriously compiled was not to be found anywhere. This was worse than Jaeger blankets! But in this case, too, neglect had opened the door to the ravages of the silver-winged little moth—carpets, furniture, curtains of magnificent old brocade, and even bed-hangings were riddled with holes made by the small marauders. The lady whose property was allowed, in this way, to go to rack and ruin never calls the royalties in question by any other name than "those people." This is quite as severe from her as "The Gorillas" from Mim.

It was a happy thought of Mr. Carl Hentschel to organise a Savoyard celebration dinner by the O.P. on the revival of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas, with Mr. W. S. Gilbert as the guest of the evening. We were pleased to receive invitations, and looked forward to seeing so many celebrated persons. There never was anywhere a more genial evening, and for once our expectations were far more than realised. The speeches were as excellent in quality as the food, which is saying everything, for the banquet was held at the Hotel Cecil. Fun and humour characterised whatever was said, as might be expected on such an occasion, but "there was rosemary" as well. Those who have gone were not forgotten. Though there was no set speech in memoriam, yet a word here and there showed that hearts were stirred, old memories awakened. As Mr. Sidney Dark, the President of the O.P. Club, remarked, it was a historic banquet, celebrating a combine that is unequalled in the history of music, and expressing gratitude for the many golden hours we owe to Gilbert and Sullivan. It was good to hear the fervent applause with which every word was received, and to see the enthusiasm with which the veteran dramatist's health was drunk. There were several of the old Savoy company present, and many of the new ones, and when Mr. Gilbert rose to speak the silence for which the toastmaster had asked was conspicuous by its absence. Never was a warmer reception, and when he spoke of his "dear old comrades of long ago," and his pleasure in meeting them, and recorded his joy in them as a zealous, conscientious, hardworking, and effective company, the audience showed its appreciation by shouts. He referred to the "rift" in his relations with Sir Arthur, but said he was glad to remember that their friendship for some years before his death had been of the most intimate and cordial description.

There was an entertainment consisting, most appropriately, of selections from the Savoy operas sung by members of the companies, new and old.

So many interesting people were at this banquet that our heads kept turning almost quite round on our shoulders in the effort to identify them. Near us was Miss Liza Lehmann, the composer, in a charming Empire gown of soft muslin, with long bands of pink silk. Mrs. Henry de la Pasture, a dark-haired lady with a rather foreign look, was an object of much interest as the author of so many delightful novels, and of the successful play, "Peter's Mother." Mr. Hayden Coffin joined lustily in the chorus of Mr. Rutland Barrington's song from "Pinafore," whence comes the world-known query, "What, never?" in response to the Captain's observation that he never says a big, big D. I believe Mr. Gilbert himself joined in this chorus. The programme is worth keeping. Beautifully got up, and containing portraits of the principal Savoyards, it gives a complete list not only of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas, but also of Mr. Gilbert's works, about seventy in number, and the dates and theatres where they were produced. It was a delightful occasion, and the guest of the dinner remarked that it had been the happiest evening of his life.

Unfortunately, Mrs. D'Oyly Carte was prevented by indisposition from being present.

I have received the following from Mona:—

MY DEAR MADGE,—You ask about plants for brightening the conservatory when flowers are scarce. Among the most effective, I think, are those that bear ornamental fruits. The scarlet-berried solanum, of course, you know. It is grown in enormous quantities for Covent Garden, and at this season excellent specimens may be obtained very cheaply. The only objection to the solanum is the fact that it is very liable to be attacked by aphides, but such attacks may be prevented or cured by occasional vaporisation. When the berries begin to shrivel and drop off the plants should be pruned rather closely, and then placed in a warm moist atmosphere to induce them to make fresh growth. They are, however, often thrown away, new stock being raised every year, which may easily be done by sowing seeds in heat in March. Another attractive scarlet-berried plant, not so well known, is Rivina humilis, sometimes called the bloodberry or rouge plant. As the berries are borne on arching shoots, often two feet in length, it is excellent for grouping with dwarfer plants. A native of the Caribbee Islands, it requires rather a high temperature, but after the fruit is coloured it may be introduced into the conservatory. It may be propagated by seeds, like the solanum, or by cuttings.

But if I were asked to name the best of the class, I should certainly say Ardisia crenulata, though, strangely enough, it is comparatively rare. Its clusters of rose-coloured flowers, borne in June, are not unattractive, and when they have developed into coral-like berries, it is perfectly beautiful. They remain on the plant for many months—indeed, for nearly a whole year, until the appearance of the following crop, if it is not kept in too high a temperature. As a rule, it is grown in the stove, but that is a mistake; it does very much better in the greenhouse. If left to itself it will in time grow to five or six feet high; but it then is apt to straggle and lose its lower leaves, which spoils it for house or conservatory decoration, except where a tall plant for the back of a large group is wanted. When it is rather over two feet high, therefore, it is generally cut down almost to the level of the soil, and after new shoots have started from the base the roots are shortened and the plant is placed in a comparatively small pot. In this way it may be grown for many years and yet kept dwarf.

The orange is another plant largely grown for its decorative fruit. In its cultivation one important point to remember is that the fruit takes a long time to mature—nine or ten months—so if you want it in winter you must have flowers early in the year, not later than February. For this reason the plants are best grown in the stove. At any rate, the temperature should never fall below 50 degrees, and should rise to 60 degrees at the flowering season. If it should go higher no harm will be done. There are, unfortunately, many insects which attack the orange, but if you keep the foliage clean by syringing or sponging occasionally with soapy water, and afterwards with pure water, you are not likely to be troubled with them.

I think this nearly exhausts the list of the best fruit-bearing plants suitable for the conservatory. There are a few others, such as Callicarpa purpurea, with purple berries, and Psychotria, cyanococca with blue; but these are not very remarkable unless it be for their names. There are two things badly wanted in the horticultural world—a properly graduated colour card to serve as a standard for all nurserymen, so that mauve and magenta may not be called blue, and so forth, and a simple system of nomenclature which can be "understanded of the people." David has once or twice tried his hand at writing labels, and I shall never forget the trouble we had in attempting to decipher them. Some are mysteries to this day.

Of course, in any decorative scheme for winter you must make large use of foliage plants, and of these there are a large number suitable for the purpose. Among them I shall put the poinsettia first. You might perhaps call them flowering plants, but the flowers are comparatively insignificant; they owe their beauty entirely to the brilliantly-coloured bracts which surround the flowers. They require to be grown in a fairly high and even temperature, with even conditions of moisture. Any sudden change—any check, whether due to exposure to draughts, too much or too little water, or any other cause—is apt to make the bracts fall prematurely. Poinsettias are usually raised annually by means of cuttings, but the old plants may be grown into large specimens if desired. Why the bracts have usurped the functions of petals I do not know, but the purpose of their red colouring is evidently to attract insects to the flowers, which are so small and inconspicuous that they would otherwise be liable to escape notice.

Then there are the crotons, many of them extremely handsome, but requiring careful management and stove treatment to keep them in good condition. They might be used occasionally for a short time in the conservatory in winter, but it would not be safe to keep them there long. The same must be said of the dracænas, though they are perhaps a little hardier. Some of them are magnificent, notably D. Victoria, with its fine leaves edged with broad yellow bands. D. Sanderiana is rather similar, with white instead of yellow, and very much smaller in every way. The variegated form of Pandanus candelabrum is another extremely handsome plant, but it does not grow very rapidly. With these and palms, of which there are hundreds to choose from, it would not be difficult to make a conservatory as attractive without flowers as with them. I must tell you, however, that large plants of the kinds I have mentioned are expensive. The demand for them is comparatively small, so nurserymen, to remunerate themselves for the time and money spent in growing them, have to charge rather a large price.—Your affectionate cousin,

Mona.

This poulet à la Milanaise will make a nice change after Christmas fare:—

Chop a young chicken into neat pieces, and sautez them in a stewpan with salad oil and chopped shalot. When the chicken is a golden colour, dust it with flour, pour in a pint of stock, a gill of tomato purée, and a dozen chopped white mushrooms, from which the underpart has previously been scraped. Simmer the chicken for an hour, ascertain that it is nicely seasoned, dish it on a fried croûte, and garnish it with rings of fried bread.

Salmon salad:—

Have ready as much salmon as you require, nicely flaked. Form a heap of salad upon a dish that has been lightly soused in oil and vinegar sweetened, around the lettuce make a wall of nicely boiled green peas cold, but mix them while warm in heated butter. Take half lemons larded with cayenne, and squeeze the juice over the peas, place on the salmon flakes upon the lettuce over-lapping each other; send to table a French mayonnaise in small cups, allowing one for each guest.

Try this glace Nebraska:—

Dissolve 1 oz. of chocolate in half a pint of milk, and convert it into custard with 2 eggs and 1 oz. of sugar. Meanwhile, boil 4 oz. of sugar with a little water until it turns a pale caramel, add 2 oz. of chopped and browned almonds, turn it out on an oiled slab, and when it is cold pound it very fine and add it to the chocolate. Mix it with half a pint of whipped cream and freeze it. Line a plain mould with ratafias, using a little white icing to make them adhere to each other, and dry it well in the screen. Fill the mould with the ice, turn it at once out on a fancy paper, put a little whipped cream on the top, and sprinkle it with chopped and browned almonds.

Œufs en surprise:—

Boil six or eight eggs for ten minutes, immerse them in cold water, and remove the shells. Cut off each end and take out the yolks with an apple corer, chop the yolks, mix them with three or four ounces of finely-chopped cooked turbot or sole and a few chopped shrimps. Add sufficient sauce to bind it, and the yolk of a raw egg, fill the eggs with the preparation, roll them first in bread crumbs, then in beaten egg, and again in bread crumbs, fry them in a stewpan of hot lard. Dish them in an upright position in two straight rows on a thin layer of mashed potato, and pour nicely-flavoured white sauce round them.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

THE BATTLE OF TSU-SHIMA

Between the Japanese and Russian Fleets, fought on the 27th May, 1905. By Captain VLADIMIR SEMENOFF (one of the Survivors). Translated by Captain A. B. LINDSAY. With a Preface by Sir GEORGE SYDENHAM CLARKE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Sir George Clarke says truly in his preface to this fascinating little book that the navy which is able to draw the most accurate conclusions, technical as well as tactical, from the experiences of the battle of Tsu-shima and to apply them in terms of policy and of training will secure a marked advantage over its rivals in the future. It is therefore of the utmost importance that naval experts should read with the closest attention any impartial narrative by a competent eye-witness, and both these epithets may be applied to this one. . . Captain Semenoff's narrative is by no means only for the expert. It is one of the most thrilling and touching records of naval warfare that we have ever read, and its very simplicity and lack of literary ornament make it the more impressive. We start with the doomed fleet on its last voyage out of Shanghai on May 25. We share the emotions on board, feel the nervous thrill behind the gallant spirit and the cheerful countenance. On the second day the fleet passes into the danger zone, through a fog which it prays may last. Its enemy is invisible, but it begins to pick up the wireless messages passing between the Japanese ships. If anything were needed to add to the last creepy touch to the night before a battle, it must surely be these ghostly signals between invisible foes. Then the dawn comes, and the fog, unhappily, clears away, and the enemy is discovered."—The Westminster Gazette.

THE WORTH OF CLOTHES

The Worth of Clothes is not just the price you pay for them. A suit is worth just so much to you as what you consider the value of what it does towards making you look well-dressed. That—taking into consideration its Wearing quality. Thus, it is possible that a suit for which you paid fifty-five shillings may be worth more than one for which you paid four guineas.

. . . Material does count, but the Work in making it up . . . the careful building up . . . the little taken here and the little given there . . . Master-work—that is what tells—that is what makes a suit worth much. If the Work is good the result is a suit which was plainly made for you with all carefulness . . . a good suit . . . a suit worth more than you pay for it.

. . . Mr. Bult's tailoring makes for the production of clothes of Worth, for its guiding principles are . . . personal work . . . personal supervision . . . careful attention to those details which make for differences . . . the building of a suit instead of the manufacturing of one.

. . . The "BYSTANDER" says: "There are few places where the man of average means can get the same quality, style, and fit in his clothes as at Mr. Bult's."

. . . The following prices will give a good idea of the general charges: Dress Suit (Silk-lined) from 84s.; Frock Coat and Vest from 63s.; Lounge Suit (Tweed, Serge, etc.) from 55s. Patterns, Illustrated Price List (and Self-measurement Form, if desired), will be sent Post Free on application.

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividingthe above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner'slear name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,458.

Exception has sometimes been taken by ultra-Puritans, on religious grounds, to the names of those months in the Calendar, which are called after Heathen Gods or Heathenish Roman Emperors; while certainly to the names of the last four months in the year, objection might, more reasonably, be raised on arithmetical grounds. It is not, of course, in the least likely that the names of the months will ever be altered, however obsolete or inappropriate. But supposing such a step were contemplated, it would certainly require some thought and ingenuity to devise appropriate substitutes. Now, I think it might be both interesting and amusing to invite readers of TRUTH to exercise their inventiveness in this direction, so, this week, I am offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that Competitor who shall:

SEND IN THE BEST LIST OF SUGGESTED NEW NAMES FOR THE TWELVE MONTHS IN THE CALENDAR—EACH SUCH NAME TO BE IN SOME WAY DESCRIPTIVE OF THE MONTH TO WHICH IT IS APPLIED.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor should send in more than one list of twelve suggested names.

(ii) All lists must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, January 14, 1907, at latest.

QUEER STORY PUZZLE.

The attention of those who may be competing for the above is called to the correction of a printer's error, which will be found at the foot of the "Queer Story" in this issue.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 I have received the following amounts towards the Toy Fund:—Farway, 1s.; Redder, 2s. 6d.; Rhody and Spartan, 2s. 6d.

I may take this opportunity of thanking various Correspondents for their kind seasonable greetings, and of wishing them, as well as Competitors generally, the happiest of happy New Years.

HEMLOCK, MORIARTY, SOLMES.—Your nom-de-plume is quite in order. The "Queer Story" Puzzle is a special Competition, to which the ordinary rules governing our Puzzles do not apply. For the same reason, you were quite right in not sending your real name, thereby conforming to the special regulations laid down on p. 1517 of TRUTH, December 19 last, by which alone this particular competition is governed.

All further Answers to Correspondents are unavoidably held over to next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,455.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

BEST SUGGESTION FOR A REDUCED SENTENCE ON STOKER MOODY.

I beg to solve Puzzle No. 1,455 by suggesting that six days on a lightship (equivalent, in my opinion, to solitary confinement for life at Wormwood Scrubs or Dartmoor) should amply meet with the requirements of justice re Stoker Moody.—Yours truly, Heja.

When it became known that Stoker Moody had been sentenced to five years' penal servitude, the general feeling throughout the lower deck of the Navy, as well as of the public, was that he had been somewhat harshly dealt with. Whilst bearing in mind that Moody's crime is considered a very grievous one in the Navy, and not forgetting his former indifferent character, and putting the welfare of the Navy before public opinion, I suggest that two years' penal servitude, and to be discharged from his Majesty's Navy as undesirable, at the expiration of that term, would have been more fair and reasonable.—An Able Seaman.

A reasonable sentence for Stoker Moody would be seven and a half months' imprisonment.—Tony.

To reduce Stoker Moody's term of five years' imprisonment to twelve months, and his chance of promotion to be put back three years, with the understanding that at his next offence he will be dismissed from the Navy.—Bobbin.

Stoker Moody's insubordination having followed upon an order so misapplied as to be offensive to any member of a race whose cult is freedom, he should be immediately liberated and reinstated. Moody's recent record not having been satisfactory, however, any real breach of discipline committed by him in the future should be visited with the most rigorous punishment consistent with the offence.—Jean Qui Rit.

Eighty-eight days.—Corncrake.

The sentence on Stoker Moody to be reduced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. The sentences on the other offenders to be reduced also in proportion to that awarded Stoker Moody.—Zumerzet.

Stoker Moody need not have been sentenced to any penal servitude. A caution as to future conduct would have met the case in the opinion of "Klondyke."

I think six months would be fair.—Raspboy.

A year and a half.—Ox Short.

Six months' imprisonment (without hard labour).—"Never Despair."

Stoker Moody should be reprimanded only, the same as Lieut. Collard. Because not only was Moody "collared," but Collard has been "Moody" ever since."—Dullard.

Nine months' imprisonment.—Crank.

Six months' imprisonment.—Diana.

Six months' hard labour.—Thersites.

I should think that a sentence of twelve months would, under the circumstances, meet the case.—Verbum Sat.

Eighteen months.—Biscuits.

Fifteen months.—Wiltie.

Ten months.—Faulty.

One year.—Van Daub.

I consider that eighteen months would have been a fair sentence in the case of Stoker Moody.—Staffa.

That it be reduced to one year, and he begin again amongst the stokers of the Navy.—Bucks.

That the sentence be reduced to two years' penal servitude, and he be given a chance on its completion of regaining his character in the Navy.—Dorset.

In large bodies like the Navy, where discipline must be strictly enforced, a crime like Stoke Moody's must be punished, but still, I think six months' imprisonment would have amply met the case.—Porthos.

I beg to suggest that the sentence on Stoker Moody be reduced to fourteen months.—Blanche Howe.

Eight and three-quarter months.—V. Knowles.

Nine and a quarter months.—Balmoral.

The Lords of the Admiralty, knowing al the circumstances, have reduced the term of punishment from five to three years. The Premier has also stated that three years' penal servitude are less severe than two years' hard labour. And that there was a possibility of still more lenient treatment. I do not presume to differ from such authorities.—J. McGrigor Allan.

I consider Stoker Moody's sentence should have been one year instead of five years, as he was acquitted of endeavouring to make a mutinous assembly, and convicted only of inciting others to mutiny.—Game B.

My idea is that the case was never fully proven against Stoker Moody. Therefore, nine months would have been sufficient.—Mrs. Game B.

Taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, I think the sentence of five years' penal servitude passed by the Naval Court Martial on Stoker Moody might be reduced to eighteen months' penal servitude, which severe sentence would satisfy all the claims of justice, and be a salutary warning to all future offenders against strict Naval discipline, which must at all costs be maintained.—Puck.

In my opinion the fairest and most reasonable way of dealing with Stoker Moody—fairest and most reasonable for the man himself and in the interests of the British Navy—would be for the Admiralty to make no order of reduction of sentence for a period of twelve months. At the end of that time let the man be quietly released and the public informed by means of a simple minute of the Admiralty that the remainder of the sentence (five years' penal servitude) is remitted. In one year's time the whole affair will be practically forgotten, and the decision of the Admiralty to reduce the sentence after the lapse of that time would not have the bad effect upon discipline that it might possibly have if published now, while the matter is still fresh in the public mind.—Steam-Pipe.

Six months' imprisonment.—Etwall.

Stoker Moody's offence is not worth more than six months' hard.—Wurzel.

Let me suggest a sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour for Stoker Moody's indiscretion.—Northlander.

With reference to your Stoker Moody Competition, I beg to suggest that the sentence be reduced to one of thirteen months.—Henry Howe.

Considering the extreme provocation in addition to the (now proved) illegal order, which Stoker Moody received, I think one year's imprisonment an ample sentence, for his most human insubordination.—Keith.

Should be reduced to one year's imprisonment.—Neale.

Three years' penal servitude.—Renoops.

Two years' hard labour.—Lydd.

In view of the revised sentence on the above man, viz., three years' penal servitude, and the subsequent punishment of the officers. I would suggest that Stoker Moody should be dealt with in the following manner. He should be offered a full and complete pardon and a fresh start if he agrees to the following:—To tender an ample apology for his conduct, to serve the first year of the three years on ships undergoing speed trials, and the subsequent two years on a despatch vessel on foreign service; each month of good conduct to reduce his sentence by a similar period. This form of sentence would return him to the Service instead of branding him for ever a criminal. Any dereliction of duty to be followed by a return to prison for the period of his unexpired sentence, and to be dismissed the Service.—Service.

When Stoker Moody's antecedents are taken into consideration, and the necessity for strict discipline in our Navy, as has been observed from time immemorial, and anything approaching a mutiny must be sternly dealt with, the punishment prima facie scarcely appears too severe, but the order, "On the knee," which ought to be expunged, being so objectionable, and the circumstances under which the order was given so aggravating, it is thought by many that some leniency might be shown, and perhaps the sentence might be reduced by half. Still, it is evident that such an unsatisfactory character as Moody should not only be removed from the Service, but should be rigorously punished by way of example, as a few pernicious members contaminate the whole body, and sharp diseases require sharp remedies. "Ense recidendum, ne pars sincera trahatur."—Simplex.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,456.—A FEW ASSORTED SPECIMENS.

BEST ORIGINAL PARODY OF CAMPBELL'S FAMOUS LINES ENTITLED, "A THOUGHT SUGGESTED BY THE NEW YEAR."

The more we live, more wild appear
The channels which we swim in;
The queerest tide of all the year
Was surely "Votes for Women."

If daily papers tell the truth
(Some steal across the borders),
I never heard in all my youth,
Of such unique disorders.

While men were fighting in the van,
Elections epoch-making,
Uprose a woman like a man,
And started "gingham"-shaking!

No trace of gin upon her breath,
And yet intoxicated
With thoughts of fighting to the death
For what was not debated.

'Twas all so strange, so out of range,
This female suffrage-pleading,
That out she went, all torn and rent,
Dishevelled, bruised, and bleeding!

Some say ejectors used their strength
With questionable neatness;
Perhaps they held her at a length (?)
Proportioned to her sweetness!

Walfred.

THE SUFFRAGETTES.

The more we live, more strange appear,
Woman's progressive stages,
By leaps and bounds more change each year
Than man in his "seven ages."

The heedless current of her youth,
Ere passion vet disorders,
In mimic sports of man uncouth,
On indecorum borders.

But as the care-worn cheek grows wan,
And as the waist grows thicker,
Ye stars! when measured still by man,
The pace becomes much quicker.

While man for votes will spend scant breath,
And deem their charm as vapid,
Will woman brave scorn, prison, death,
In direful sequence rapid.

It may be strange, yet who can change
Her course to slower speeding,
Our charming friends to gaol have gone,
And left policemen bleeding!

Heaven gives them in the place of strength
A (two-fold!) mental fleetness,
They hence "do time" of seeming length,
Proportioned to their sweetness.

Trebor Nitram.

THOUGHTS ON SUFFRAGETTES.

The more they try, more vain appear
The hopes of suffering "sisters."
The goal they seek, is distant far,
A "vote" still but for "Misters."

They'd weary struggles through this year,
When statesmen would not hearken,
And legislators made a vow,
Their doors they should not "darken."

Appeals were vain, policemen firm,
The "House," too, unrelenting;
Why, as they reached its portals stern,
Were they turned back lamenting?

Last week in prison they felt sad,
As Christmas fare was lacking,
The "powers that be" then set them free,
And soon they all were "packing."

It may be strange, but who would change
Our "Law of Manhood Suffrage?"
Yes, "suffragettes" may shout in vain,
Until they reach their dotage.

Heaven send them more of mental strength,
And less of wild self-seeking,
So let us have no more next year
Of their misguided shrieking.

Aralc.

The more we live it doth appear
That parliamentary sages,
From all important topics steer,—
Leave them to fate and ages.

The objects of our gilded youth
Are place, preferment, orders,
To swim with tide that's running smooth,
And shun its dangerous borders.

Let cranks and faddist's lead the van,
O'er trifles carp and bicker,
As "women's rights," "one vote, one man,"
"Pure beer," not doctored liquor.

When these have lost their bloom and breath
In disputation vapid,
Imperial needs of life and death
Will pass with comments rapid.

It may be strange—yet who would change
What new and old year teaches?
No member really cares a —— jot
To practise what he preaches!

Heaven grant as fades their youth strength
They may not rue, that heedless
They maundered through each session's length
In talk, obscure and needless.

Zumerzet.

When we have lived for many a year
(Which seemed, in passing, ages),
How thin and poor to us appear
Each morning's printed pages!

Oh! for the "good old times" of youth,
Ere papers went demented,
And with the good old Times and TRUTH
We all were quite contented.

Alas! the good old Times is doomed,
And bound in Yankee fetters.
Ye Stars and Stripes! By you 'tis boomed,
As well as "country" letters.

Its pars have lost their bloom and zest,
And each edition's vapid.
And as it nears its final rest,
Its downward course is rapid.

Ah! yes, 'tis strange! and such a change
O'er "Thunderer's" course impending,
Warns other powers (when thunder lowers)
Of "mending" or of "ending."

The House of Lords has many lives,
And doubtless feels their sweetness,
But when all peers have Yankee wives
It will expire with fleetness.

Sartor.

THE EDUCATION BILL KILLED BY CHRISTIANS.

"Direct war once more between Church and Chapel, over the bodies and souls of the children."—TRUTH, December 26.

Not long before the closing year,
The Bill passed through its stages;
The Commons found it just and clear,
The wisdom of the ages.

The Lords received with flout and jeer,
But trying to amend it,
They made it look so very queer
As if they'd rather rend it!

Prelates with Peers combined to mar
What might have made contention cease,
Thus stirring up religious war—
O wond'rous ministers of peace!*

Of Christ who said:—"I came to send
A sword—not peace—division, fire."
Foreseeing truth with falsehood blend,
And what He taught, and liv'd, expire.

Thus wrangling about "the letter,"
"The spirit" is quite mistaken;
Men fail to make the world better;
The faith of Christ is forsaken.

Until they drive the State to say:—
"About the Bible, Church and Creed,
Rave on among yourself you may,
Your feuds no longer we will feed."

J. McGrigor Allan.

* Honourable exceptions:—The Primate, and the Bishops of Chester, Hereford, and St. Asaph, voted with the Government.

DISPELLED DELUSIONS.

The more we get, more griefs appear,
However high our wages,
We find the task to live severe
In these high-pressure ages.

In the departed days of youth,
When all did seem in order,
We thought life's tide would be quite smooth,
While on its early border.

When maid and lover ere made one
Expenses will grow thicker,
And e'en one youngster only born.
Makes money go the quicker.

Then care emits a chilling breath,
And like a body wrapped
In leaden sheeting after death—
We're dismal, drear and vapid.

And yet we feel we would not change
Our life—for when unheeding
As boys and girls, we hoped to range
With pockets full, not bleeding.

Yet now this truth of greatest strength
Has dawned, with sudden fleetness.
"Grief has no days of endless length;
Nor riches lasting sweetness."

Dick Maisch.

The more we learn, more Truths appear,
For life's progressive pages
A day at Yuletide seems a year,
And years are mystics—ages.

Flash through those stinging times of youth.
The doll's hall, that embroiders
Gifts, slumbering in the heart of TRUTH
Light up those cheery borders.

Not as the care-worn cheek of Pan,
For dolls and toys grow thicker.
Ye children are life joys of man
Your need, makes pulses quicker.

When dolls have lost their bloom and health,
And dress itself is vapid,
Why, hands that clasp the toys of TRUTH
Feel they their life more rapid.

It may be strange, yet who would change
TRUTH'S course to slower spending,
When one by one dolls clothes have gone,

The threshold of their feeble strength,
Indemnifying meekness,
And those of dressing dolls of length,
Proportioned to their sweetness.

The Handy Home Remedy.

A box of BEECHAM'S PILLS should always be kept in the house, as, like a "stitch in time," they may save much future worry and expense. On the first sign of any derangement of the system a dose should be taken, and they will invariably have the most beneficial effect. "Prevention is better than cure," we are told. Next time you feel "out of sorts," just take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS, and so prevent a seemingly small ailment growing into serious trouble. BEECHAM'S PILLS prevent illness as well as cure it. Most people take them to keep themselves in good health. These are wise and happy ones—they hardly ever know what ill health is.

There is no medicine in the world to compare with

BEECHAM'S PILLS

They will not harm the most delicate—and the strongest will benefit by using them. They are a tried remedy—the trusted friend of thousands of families all over the world.

Women especially suffer from headache, backache, loss of energy and spirits, Nervous Dyspepsia and many other ailments which make life almost unbearable. Every woman can be immediately relieved of this suffering if upon the first sign of derangement she will take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1567. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, January 9, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, *which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. ENTRE NOUS.

TWO State Balls will be given at Buckingham Palace next season—one in May, while the King and Queen of Denmark are in London; and the other early in July. I understand that the State Concerts have been permanently discontinued.

The King was out shooting on two days during his visit to Chatsworth. On Thursday the battues were in the Hare Park, Buston Paddocks and other preserves between Edensor and Baslow, and the bag was a record for Chatsworth, ten guns having killed nearly 2,000 head of game. On Friday his Majesty shot at Birchill, near Bakewell, but birds were not nearly so plentiful as they had been on Thursday, and about eleven hundred head were killed. On Saturday the King and Queen motored to Rangemore, Lord Burton's place in Staffordshire, near Burton-on-Trent, a distance of over forty miles. There were four motor-cars, and the Chatsworth party lunched at Rangemore, and afterwards went out into the famous gardens. Lord Burton drove sixteen miles to meet their Majesties at a point near Derby.

The King is expected to rejoin the Queen at Sandringham to-morrow or on Friday. His Majesty came to town from Chatsworth, instead of returning direct to Sandringham, in order that he might see the Duke and Duchess of Connaught before their departure for the East. There is to be pheasant and wild-duck shooting at Sandringham on three days next week to finish the season, the annual big battues in Wolferton Wood being intended to take place on Monday. The King and Queen will probably leave Sandringham on Friday, the 18th, for Windsor Castle, where they are to reside until the end of the month, and they will then come up to Buckingham Palace for the season.

His Majesty will not return to Sandringham again this winter after his departure for Windsor next week, but the Queen intends to make the Hall her principal residence during February and the early part of March. Her Majesty will merely come to town for a day or two when Parliament opens and for holding the two early Courts.

The King is not going to Plymouth for the opening of the Keyham Extension Works, but his Majesty will be represented by the Prince of Wales, who is to be accompanied by the Princess. The ceremony will probably take place on Thursday, February 21. It is now probable that the Prince and Princess of Wales will be conveyed from Portsmouth to Plymouth and back in the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, in which case it is expected that they will remain in the Sound for two days, and they will be entertained by Lord and Lady Mount Edgcumbe at Mount Edgcumbe, and by Sir Reginald and Lady Beatrice Pole-Carew at Antony.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to leave Sandringham for the season next week, when they will proceed to Windsor for a short residence at Frogmore Lodge, after which they are coming up to Marlborough House for the season. The Prince shot last week at Houghton with Colonel Vivian, and he had some good sport in the outlying preserves on the Royal estates, and at Hillington, between Sandringham and Lynn, where the shootings are rented by H.R.H. from Sir William Ffolkes.

The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha are expected to arrive in England early in May on a visit to the Duchess of Albany at Claremont Park, and they will probably stay in this country for about a month. On their journey from Coburg to London the Duke and Duchess are to spend a few days in Holland with Queen Wilhelmina and the Prince Consort of the Netherlands, who will receive their visitors at The Hague.

Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck have been staying for some time at Claremont with the Duchess of Albany, who is this week on a visit to Lord and Lady Derby at Knowsley Park. The Duchess is going to Cannes about the middle of February, and she will reside until after Easter at the Villa Nevada.

Princess Henry of Battenberg will probably abandon her projected visit to the Riviera, in which case she will go direct to Biarritz on leaving London, in order to spend a few days with Princess Frederica of Hanover before proceeding to Madrid. Princess Henry is to reside in the Pardo Palace, near Madrid, until after the accouchement of the Queen of Spain, which is expected to take place about the middle of April. El Pardo is the favourite Royal country seat near Madrid, and it has fine gardens and an immense park. The house was built early in the seventeenth century by Philip III., and was enlarged by Charles III. There is some superb tapestry in this palace, and in the chapel is a copy of Ribalta's representation of Christ bearing the Cross, the original of which is at Oxford in the chapel of Magdalen College.

A correspondent writes:—

It is correctly stated in Truth that two ex-Mistresses of the Robes are living—the Duchess of Devonshire and the Duchess Dowager of Roxburghe. It might be added, however, that the Duchess Dowager of Northumberland refused to accept this office when it was offered to her by Lord Derby in March, 1852. The "Duchess Eleanour," who is a sister of the late Duke of Westminster, was married in 1842 to Lord Prudhoe, who succeeded his brother in the dukedom in 1847, and he died in 1865. This was "Duke Algernon," who was universally known in Northumberland as "the good Duke."

Lord and Lady Aberdeen return to Ireland shortly, and will take up their residence at Dublin Castle for the beginning of the season, which starts more than a week earlier than usual with the Castle seasons of late years. Their Excellencies will have many parties of visitors at the Castle, and many entertainments of various kinds will be given, balls and dances naturally predominating as the most universally popular. The first Levee of the season will take place on the 29th inst.; on the following Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Courts, practically like those of Buckingham Palace, will be held.

Mr. Bryce, though his tenure of office was so short, as Chief Secretary in Ireland, made many friends in the country, where his departure is much regretted. His personal charm and amiable manner made the Ascendancy party in society overlook the fact that he was a mere man of culture and literary genius, with high ideals of patriotism in no way associated with Jingoism.

Lord and Lady Grenfell were at the Royal Hospital for Christmas week. They afterwards went to Rockingham, and entertained their last shooting party previous to moving to Dublin for the Castle season. They take up their residence at the Royal Hospital during the month, and will give a large ball "to meet their Excellencies" on the 29th inst., the date of the Levee at Dublin Castle. The great hall at Kilmainham is one of the best ballrooms in Ireland. Curiously enough the chapel opens directly out of it, at one end. This chapel does not belong to the Irish Protestant Church, but to the Anglican, the case being otherwise with the Castle chapel.

In Memoriam:

ANGELA BURDETT-COUTTS.

'Tis only meet her dust should grace
The fane, 'neath whose historic shade
So many England's great are laid
In their last honoured resting-place.

'Tis meet, for though to her befell
No leading part in public life
Nor social glory's jealous strife—
She served her generation well,

By turning what has ever stood
For all a snare, for some a curse,
The plenty of a boundless purse,
To the rare use of perfect good.

'Tis easy, we may well believe,
To give with lavish hand and free,
But lavish still, yet wise, to be—
This needs true greatness to achieve.

She held—and sure, her view was just—
That what had been on her bestowed
Was not her own to spend, but owed
To One who'd lent—a sacred trust.

So made her aim, through life, to be
No random spender of her pelf,
Nor one who gave to please herself,
But Him for whom she stood trustee.

More splendid fame have others won,
Of those who there beside her rest;
But not the greatest and the best
Have more deserved their Lord's "Well done."

Mrs. Josephine Butler, who died last week, in her seventy-eighth year, was a very clever woman, with the highest ideals. She was a vigorous agitator at one time, but she was always thoroughly feminine, and escaped any touch of the "platform taint." She married in 1852 the late George Butler, then a tutor in Durham University, and afterwards, between 1852 and his death in 1890, a tutor at Oxford, Vice-Principal of Cheltenham College, Principal of Liverpool College, and canon residentiary of Winchester Cathedral. Butler was an intimate friend of J. A. Froude, who described him as "the most curiously gifted man in body and mind that I ever knew." The Butlers were enthusiasts on all moral questions, and they headed the agitation against "the State regulation of Vice," which ended in the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act, after a fight of fifteen years. Mrs. Butler was a woman of fine culture, both in literature and art, and she wrote several excellent biographies, besides a number of controversial works. She was a daughter of Mr. John Grey, of Dilston, Northumberland, who was well known in the north, both as an enterprising agriculturist and as a keen Liberal.

Mr. Thomas Lawrance, of Hacconby Hall, Lincolnshire, who died last week, was the oldest magistrate in his county, and he had entered upon his ninety-eighth year. He farmed on a large scale formerly, and with great success, his flocks and herds being among the finest in this part of England. He was a keen rider to hounds for more than half a century. Mr. Lawrance for a long time took an active part in county affairs and in all local business, and for nearly forty years he was chairman of the Bourne Guardians.

Mr. George Pitt-Lewis, K.C., who died last week, was a very able man, and he enjoyed a considerable practice at the Bar, until a breakdown in health a few years ago practically ended his professional career. Directly after he had been called to the Bar (in 1870) he obtained an extensive junior practice, both in London and on the Western Circuit. He was the author of several legal publications which acquired considerable popularity. Mr. Pitt-Lewis obtained some distinction at the General Election of 1885, when he won for the Liberals a seat in the House of Commons which had always been regarded as a safe Tory preserve. He represented the Barnstaple district of Devon until 1892, having been again returned in 1886, as a Liberal Unionist. If Mr. Pitt-Lewis had kept his health he would certainly have been made a judge.

Many people will learn with regret that Cavendish House, Clapham, with its grounds of nearly ten acres, has fallen a prey to building operations. This place was the residence of Henry Cavendish, who earned enduring fame by his experiment for ascertaining the earth's density. Henry Cavendish, the great chemist and philosopher, lived at Clapham for many years in complete seclusion. His cousin, the late Duke of Devonshire, wrote of him as having "buried his science and wealth in solitude and insignificance at Clapham." However, the result of this quiet system of life was satisfactory to his relatives in the long run, as he left a fortune of considerably over a million to be divided among them.

The long-standing dispute as to the ownership of the valuable tapestries and old furniture in the Hereditary Keeper's apartments at Holyrood House has just been terminated by a decision in favour of the Crown. This property was claimed by the trustees of the late Duke of Hamilton, the Hereditary Keeper of the Palace, and the case was ultimately referred to the arbitration of Sir Herbert Maxwell. There are ten pieces of tapestry, some being French and the others Flemish, and they are of considerable size and in good preservation. They represent State ceremonials and battle pieces. It has been suggested that these tapestries should be hung on the walls of the picture gallery at Holyrood, which are now covered with supposed portraits of the Kings of Scotland, which are either absolutely fictitious or copies. These pictures are known to have been painted by James de Witte, a Flemish artist, who resided at Edinburgh during the closing years of the seventeenth century. Every day during the summer hundreds of tourists waste their time in inspecting and discussing this immense collection of bogus portraits, which was bitterly criticised by Sir Walter Scott, who desired to know why these Kings "should each and every one be painted with a nose like a door knocker"!

A contemporary appears to suppose that the rooms of Mary Queen of Scots are still to be seen at Chatsworth. The old house was entirely swept away during the reign of William III., by the first Duke of Devonshire, who then built the present mansion, with the exception of the long wing which was added by the sixth Duke between 1836 and 1840. The addition of this wing detracted considerably from the simple and dignified appearance of the house before it was thus enlarged. Chatsworth House is crammed with pictures, tapestry, drawings, engravings, sculptures, carvings (the finest work of Grinling Gibbons in England), and all kinds of valuable and beautiful objets d'art. The library contains one of the finest private collections in the world, including many books of the most extreme rarity.

I suppose that as one grows older it is natural that the rest of the world should appear to grow younger; but I am amazed at the exhibition of youthful greenness in the columns of some of my contemporaries over Mr. and Mrs. Zancig. I have even wondered whether it would not be more creditable to the press to assume that the whole is simply "put up" for the purpose of advertising a showman's performance, rather than that a number of gifted journalists, who aspire to instruct the public on matters of vital importance—such as the fiscal question or the Channel Tunnel—are in the state of intellectual development which Mr. Verdant Green had reached when he first went up to Oxford. But I suppose we must take it that the last alternative is the correct one.

The Zancigs are a very clever pair of performers in their line, but they do nothing that those of us whose memories run back a few years have not seen done before, probably more than once. I am told, though I have not had the opportunity of verifying the fact, that Mr. Devant is giving at the present moment an exhibition of conjurer's "telepathy" in some respects more puzzling. The Zancigs have been giving their performance in other places, but it does not seem to have struck the world as anything miraculous until the greenhorns of the London press began to make copy out of it; on the contrary, I read in the Daily Chronicle, which has been giving the public some useful information on the subject, that the two wonder-workers of the Alhambra went all through the United States without creating any particular sensation.

A few months ago, I saw at the Empire a thought-reading dog. His owner went round among the audience while this intelligent animal stood before a row of movable cards with numbers on them. The audience confided to the master their ages, or any number they liked to think of; I showed him the number of my watch. He then talked to the dog precisely as Mr. Zancig talks to Mrs. Zancig, and the dog walked to the cards and turned up the right figures. Although the dog only dealt in figures, considering the difference between his intelligence and that of a human being, the performance was far more wonderful than the Zancigs', but no dabbler in the occult pronounced the dog to be a "sensitive" possessed of mystic powers, nor did any journalist, either in or out of his teens, suggest that anything else was at work than a clever showman's trick.

Mr. Stead, as usually happens at these times, has made one of the most illuminating contributions to the controversy. While convinced by his own experiments that Mrs. Zancig is highly telepathetic, he does not question that a code of signals may be used in the Alhambra performances; and he defends the use of it because to rely on telepathy would involve too great a strain on Mrs. Zancig. In other words, Mrs. Zancig, though highly telepathetic, is not sufficiently so to do the Alhambra feats, which is all that concerns those who only know the lady through those feats. Apparently, if a performer professed to fly across the Alhambra, while in reality supported by an invisible wire, and if in Mr. Stead's private sanctum the man had jumped over the table, Mr. Stead would consider the use of a wire in the flying performance legitimate, because to jump across the Alhambra would involve too great a strain on the performer.

I do not mean that I fail to see Mr. Stead's argument, or that it has not some bearing on the case. Granting that the transference of ideas from one mind to another by a process of telepathy is possible, it is obviously a thing that can only be done under very special circumstances. For example, the learned in such mysteries have always told us that the mental impression that is to be conveyed must be a very deep one; or that the mind which is to be read by another must be deeply concentrated upon the subject which is to be read in it. There can be no pretence of anything of the sort in a performance at a big music-hall. Mr. Zancig goes about in the auditorium like a butterfly; objects are offered to him on all sides, watches, pencil-cases, notebooks, season tickets follow one another in rapid succession; he is generally chattering nearly all the time; and as soon as one article has been named by the lady, she is asked for the name of the next. I gather that Mr. Stead considers it impossible that telepathy could be performed under these conditions, and the process be repeated a dozen times in the course of a few minutes. And so do I.

The battle of the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos continues to be vigorously fought, and the manifestoes of both parties have been issued. The non-placets are led by Dr. Routh, and the placets by Sir George Darwin. It is now quite certain that the strongest opinions in Cambridge in every branch of education are in favour of the proposed reforms. The Bishops of Winchester and Ely (both of whom have been Presidents of Queens') support the placets, and so do eight Heads of Houses, all the Mathematical Professors and Lecturers, and nearly thirty Professors on other subjects.

In reference to last week's notes on the late Principal Rainy, I have received the following letter from "A Glasgow Graduate":—

Sir,—It is unusual, I admit, to find Truth guilty of ill-informed comment, but as a humble member of the United Free Church, I must protest against your editorial remarks in last week's issue on the late Principal Rainy and the "more bigoted and intolerant section" of Presbyterianism, of which he was the leader for so many years. It is surely unjust thus to stigmatise a Church, distinguished for its scholarship, which has incurred the odium of all the reactionaries on account of its advanced theology. No British denomination has fought better or longer for theological liberalism. I think it probable that more bigotry and obscurantism will be found in a single parish of the Church of England than in the whole of the United Free Church of Scotland.

In the second place, the union negotiations were not carried through "tactlessly." Formally and informally the question of union had been discussed for nearly forty years, and it was by a miracle of persuasiveness and tact that Dr. Rainy reduced the opposition from a considerable minority to a mere rump, the importance and composition of which has been vastly over-estimated south of the Border. Scottish criticisms of Dr. Rainy's policy have taken quite different grounds, for, as his adversaries sadly admitted, his name was synonymous with tact.

The Archbishop of York has appointed the Rev. T. E. Lindsay, who succeeded Bishop Blunt as Vicar of Scarborough in 1905, to the Archdeaconry of Cleveland, the stipend being £200 a year. The new Archdeacon has been working in the diocese since 1888, and from 1893 until 1905 he was Vicar of St. Paul's, Middlesbrough. The Archdeaconry became vacant by the resignation of Canon Hutchings, rector of Kirkby Misperton, who was lately collated to a residentiary stall in York Minster.

Glastonbury Abbey is for sale, and a Bishop proposes that the property should be purchased for a missionary college, the price (about £40,000) being raised by public subscription. It is quite inconceivable that this scheme will come to anything, for it is most improbable that any such sum will be contributed in order to buy this property at a fancy price, which has presumably been fixed in view of the historical and sentimental value of the Abbey ruins. There are already an over-ample number of missionary colleges, which have a hard struggle to exist, and there is certainly no need whatever for another, as any further addition to those now working would mean a crash for one or two of them.

Canon Bailey, who has just died at the age of ninety-two, was best known as the very successful Warden of St. Augustine's Missionary College, Canterbury, an office which he filled with complete efficiency for twenty-six years, and he was really the creator of the system which is followed there. Canon Bailey was a fine scholar, a very able organiser, and a man of much tact and common sense, qualities which were eminently required at St. Augustine's, when High Churchmen were pulling hard in one direction while Evangelicals were dragging with equal vigour at the other end. Archbishop Tate entertained a high opinion of Canon Bailey, and in 1878 he presented him to the living of West Tarring, Sussex, which he held for fourteen years. He was a great favourite wherever he was known, as he was celebrated for his good talk, and he was the most genial and courteous of men, having the fine manners of the old school. Canon Bailey was collated to an unendowed prebendal stall in Canterbury Cathedral nearly forty-seven years ago by Archbishop Longley, who, as Bishop of Ripon, had ordained him in 1841.

Dr. Baring, who has died at the age of ninety, was a great-nephew of Mme. d'Arblay, of whom he had many interesting stories to relate, and he had known a remarkable number of notable people, including the celebrated President Routh. He was beneficed in Essex from 1845 until 1870, when Bishop Claughton presented him to the important living of St. Mark's, Surbiton, which he held until 1905, when he resigned. Bishop Thorold appointed him in 1879 to the Archdeaconry of Kingston-on-Thames, which office he resigned in 1904. Dr. Baring was an excellent parish clergyman, and he was beloved by all classes of his neighbours. He was frequent in visitation, most kind and generous to the poor, very hospitable, and munificent in his charities. He was emphatically a wide-minded man, and he carefully held aloof from Church politics, his own views being those of a High Churchman of the old school. His church extension schemes were sensible and practical, and were successfully carried out.

I publish the following letter with reference to the case of Canon Hawkins, in justice to my original correspondent, who seems to have good grounds for the view he took of the facts. As I said last week, I do not know that, so far as Canon Hawkins himself is concerned, the appointment is open to criticism, and my correspondent is apparently of the same opinion. But if the facts are correctly stated below, this seems certainly to be an instance in which the episcopal authority has been exercised without much regard to the opinions of other people than the bishop:—

SIR, Your correspondent, "Sacerdos," states that Father William Hawkins "owes his promotion to his brother Canons, and not to the Bishop." I am assured, on good authority, that the real facts of the case are as follows: Three names have to be selected by the Chapter. For this purpose three separate scrutinies or elections were made by the Chapter. Each name, by adding up the votes, must have a "complete majority of the votes of those present." That is to say, if eleven are present, the majority must be six. In the first scrutiny held, a priest of some thirty years' standing in the diocese received the majority of votes. In the second scrutiny the R.C. Rector of Grimsby (brother of the Rev. W. Hawkins) received the majority of votes. In the third scrutiny, after a deal of skirmishing and evident and prolonged reluctance on the part of the Canons, a majority was reached in favour of the Rev. William Hawkins, of Glossop. The result of the three scrutinies was as follows:—

Scrutiny I.—Rev. Frederick Kind.
" II.—Rev. Joseph Hawkins.
" III.—Rev. William Hawkins.

As required by Canon Law, the above names were then submitted to the Bishop. The Bishop passed over the evident feeling of the Chapter, as manifested in the order of the scrutinies, and took the third scrutiny. Thus again, as on a previous occasion in connection with the appointment of an administrator of the Johnson Fund, Bishop Brindle shows his extraordinary preference for the Rev. W. Hawkins.

I do not wish to cast any slur or innuendo upon Canon Hawkins. His case was introduced simply to show the contrast between Bishop Brindle's treatment of two of his priests. In Bishop Brindle's opinion Father William Hawkins was the best man available in the diocese for the vacant canonry. I am fully cognisant of all the facts of the slander action in which Canon Hawkins was involved, and I think "Sacerdos" would be extremely ill-advised in making that case the subject of a public correspondence.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A ROMAN CATHOLIC LAYMAN OF THE DIOCESE OF NOTTINGHAM.

Two or three more letters in reference to the affairs of Nottingham diocese have reached me, but I regret that I am unable to find room for them this week.

For many months past the Irish newspapers have been publishing a long and remarkably worded advertisement imploring Catholics to cast a sympathetic and pitying eye on the efforts of Father Gray, of Fakenham, Norfolk, "to establish an outpost of the Catholic faith in that —so far as the Catholic faith is concerned—barren region." Father Gray represents that his "struggling infant mission" has "no endowment except hope," and that mass is said in a garret rented at a shilling a week. The scale on which his begging campaign is conducted suggests, however, that in spite of the poverty of the mission the reverend gentleman is in a position to incur a considerable expenditure on newspaper advertising—indeed, a correspondent has estimated that his expenditure in this direction must amount to some hundreds of pounds a year—and for this and other reasons his appeals seem to have made a somewhat unfavourable impression on a good many Irish Catholics. It would be interesting to learn whether Father Gray's advertisements really have the approval of the Bishop of Northampton, whose name he uses, and whether he renders any account—and if so, to whom —of the money that he obtains.

I have to acknowledge the following contributions towards the Toy Fund:—

Cuthbert B. Camm, £5; John Reid, £1; Mrs. F. Green, £1; Captain St. Leger Glyn, £1 1s.; A Friend, £5; Tom Nissed, 2s. 6d.; Y. Z., the second 5s.; G. J., £1 1s. I have also received £1 from The Men's Canteen of H.M.S. Argyll for a Poor Children's Dinner Fund.

"TRUTH" will be sent weekly to any address in the United Kingdom for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or 28s. for 12 months. The subscription for all countries included in the Postal Union is, 3 months, 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; 12 months, £1 10s. 8d. All subscriptions are payable in advance, and cheques and P.O.O.s should be made payable to the MANAGER, "Truth" Buildings, Carteret-street, S.W.

I seem to have been about right in what I said last week about officers' messes and "marriage fines." A retired officer tells me that in his regiment—a famous cavalry regiment which, I suppose, would be called a "crack" one—the system was in full force down to 1901, but stopped then altogether. If this is true of such a regiment, I suppose it is true of all. The scale of "fines" in this particular case was pretty stiff, too—£100 for a subaltern and £50 for a captain. This ought to be enough to promote celibacy, but my informant, who incidentally mentions that he himself paid "costs on the higher scale," states that to his knowledge the mess had received £300 from this source in the four years before he succumbed to temptation. It is wonderful what men will do in their salad days when there is a lady in the case.

A Service friend, after reading my paragraph on this question last week, remarked to me that he did not see how the abolition of "marriage fines" tended to keep down officers' expenses. He thought it might be the other way about. I recognise that if you could keep officers out of matrimony altogether this would be true. But to gain that end your tariff must be "prohibitory." The example of the gallant—too gallant, possibly—regiment alluded to above shows that the most drastic efforts in that direction may be ineffectual. I fear the truth is that when a man, soldier or civilian, has once determined to take the plunge, a hundred pounds or so more or less will be no impediment to the rash act.

I would once more respectfully beg the Army Council to take into their consideration the grievance of those married officers who are unable to draw lodging allowance when there are quarters for unmarried men at their disposal in barracks, and who, furthermore, have to pay hire for furniture in such quarters, although both quarters and furniture are useless to them. I am beginning to feel this grievance personally, because so many men communicate with me on the subject. It really cannot be denied that the grievance is a legitimate one, and the War Office has no excuse for allowing it to continue if the professed anxiety to save officers unnecessary expense is really sincere. The last victim from whom I have heard reckons that the present regulations represent all round an unnecessary charge of £40 a year on married officers. I say "unnecessary," for though I am a taxpayer myself, I cannot see any justification for it.

A certain gallant commanding officer in India has added greatly to my weekly labours by a recent order requiring that, in view of numerous cases of soldiers being bitten, all dogs are to be destroyed except such as can be recommended by officers commanding companies as being valuable, or valuable companions to their owners. A limit of twelve dogs per company is fixed, and the C.O. expresses a hope that officers commanding companies will reduce the number as much lower as possible. The effect of this order on the doggy men of the regiment has been something like that of Mr. Long's muzzling orders on the dog owners of England. They assert that the number of bites is exaggerated, and that with one, or at the outside two, exceptions the regimental dogs stand acquitted on the evidence, the guilty parties being pariah dogs. I can understand that it is necessary to keep down the establishment of dogs in any military unit, and the limit of twelve per company does not look unreasonably small; but I should have thought that if men can manage to keep their dogs somewhere outside the regimental lines, there is no great necessity for interfering with them; and certainly no necessity for it in one regiment more than in any other.

We have heard a good deal, among the "lessons of the war," about the value of dogs as sentries. Could not any commanding officer who considers his regiment too doggy turn the evil to account by insisting on a certain proportion of the animals being put through a course of military training? I have not heard as yet that any attempt to utilise the "dogs of war" has been made in the British Army, although in Germany and other Continental countries the military value of the animals is practically recognised.

My humble desire for enlightenment as to how Volunteers and Militia can be amalgamated without altering fundamental distinctions between the two classes of troops, has brought me some information which, I confess, is both new to me and goes directly to the point. In regard to pay, it appears that while it may be true in theory that Volunteers are not paid individually for training, in practice the theory has been altogether abandoned in most regiments. This is proved by an official scale of daily pay in force in one battalion for any rank from lieutenant-colonel to boys, and a remarkable feature about it is that below the commissioned ranks a separation allowance for married men is provided for, ranging from 1s. 1d. to 2s. 1d. a day. Under this scale Volunteers must actually draw more than Army rates of pay, a married private getting 2s. 4d., and the highest non-commissioned rank 6s. 1d. daily. On inquiry of a gallant warrior on my own staff, I learn that though his battalion—being, I suppose, a "classy" one—did not actually draw pay while in camp, taking it out in superior rations instead, nearly all others encamped beside it did so. So I suppose the practice may be taken as pretty general.

As regards the other point, namely, liability to foreign service, my instructor observes that neither Militiamen nor Volunteers enlist for service abroad, but in the only serious war which we have had since the Volunteers were first raised they offered themselves in as large numbers as the Militia—70,000, to wit. It is one thing to accept men for foreign service when they volunteer for it, and another to impose liability to it, and we must remember that in 1900 the strength of the Volunteers was more than double that of the Militia. But in view of the scale on which the Volunteers offered themselves for service in South Africa, I suppose we may take it that the effect of removing exemption from foreign service, whatever it might amount to, would not be felt in the Volunteers more than in the Militia. At any rate, when one's knowledge is thus brought up to date, it must be confessed that the distinctions in point of pay and liabilities between the two forces do not amount to much, and that the Volunteers have practically come to be a sort of Militia, with easier terms of training. The problem of amalgamation is to that extent simplified. Of course, we can never afford to send all our troops abroad, and I suppose that in the projected "national" or "territorial" army there is no reason why there should not be two categories of troops, one enlisted for home service only and the other for service anywhere—I mean, of course, in time of war.

Some very high-handed proceedings on the part of the officer commanding the 3rd Battalion Jersey Militia—Lieutenant-Colonel T. Nock Bagnall—have just been the subject of an action in the Royal Court. The plaintiff, a private in the battalion, sued the officer commanding, and also a functionary styled the Vingtenier Militaire, and an N.C.O. for damages for wrongful arrest and imprisonment. It seemed that the plaintiff returned his rifle to the arsenal in a rusty condition, and the O.C. directed that he should pay 2s. 6d. for the cost of cleaning it. The Jersey Militia law provides that in such a case, in default of payment, the adjutant shall sue the militiaman for the amount in the Petty Debts Court. Lieutenant-Colonel Bagnall determined to take a more drastic course. Though the plaintiff was not at this time amenable to military law, he was ordered to attend at the arsenal in reference to the claim, and when he failed to do so he was illegally fined 5s. On his refusing to pay this fine, he was arrested and condemned by the O.C. to twenty-four hours' imprisonment. On his release he received yet another unlawful order, and for declining to comply with it he was re-arrested and sentenced by the O.C. to ninety-six hours' imprisonment.

For this series of illegalities the Court awarded the plaintiff £5 damages against Lieutenant-Colonel Bagnall, £1 against the Vingtenier Militaire, and 1s. against the N.C.O., the three defendants being also condemned in costs. No doubt it may be very irksome to a colonel of the Jersey Militia to discover that he cannot compel a private to pay for repairs to his rifle without having recourse to a civil tribunal. He must, however, find it far more humiliating and distressing to be cast in damages at the suit of the private for exceeding his lawful authority. The procedure that was adopted in this man's case was extremely arbitrary, and it suggests that the lesson which the Royal Court has administered was badly needed.

In Truth of December 26 some account was given of a case in which a lance-corporal serving at Bodmin Depot was alleged to have been unreasonably refused a furlough for the purpose of being medically examined for employment under the Midland Railway Company on discharge. I mentioned that I had not got the facts first-hand, but that I believed them to be correct. However, I find that this was not the case. The railway company did not require the man's immediate attendance for examination, but on the contrary had informed the Depot authorities that it would be sufficient for him to attend for that pupose on his discharge from the Army; and further, that they had not made any definite promise of employment, but were merely prepared to register his name for consideration if he appeared suitable for their service. As in addition to this it appears that the man would have received a furlough in the ordinary course in January, it is obvious that the authorities were perfectly right in refusing him a furlough under such circumstances, and I must apologise to all concerned for having suggested anything to the contrary.

Several interesting points in relation to the medical services of the Army and Navy are dealt with in an address of Sir Lambert Ormsby to the Meath Hospital Medical School, which has been reprinted in pamphlet form. I am interested to note that it refers to a number of grievances of the naval medical service which have been at different times noticed in Truth. For example, the naval doctors, like their army colleagues, complain of the capricious way in which foreign service is apportioned. No regular roster seems to be kept, and there is a complaint that the most desirable shore appointments are monopolised by a few men, who are less remarkable "for conspicuous ability than for conspicuous influence." Among other matters mentioned by Sir Lambert Ormsby are (1) the lack of control over the sick berth staff by medical officers; (2) that medical surveys, for purely medical purposes, are presided over by captains or commanders who can, and often do, overrule the views of their medical colleagues on professional questions; (3) that medical officers are not eligible to sit on courts-martial upon their own comrades; (4) that they do not get the consideration that is due to them in the allotment of cabins, and so on. It is quite time that the Navy followed the example of the Army in all matters relating to the status and authority of medical officers, and the efficiency of the Service will be served thereby quite as much as the professional amour propre of medical men.

The Walmer lifeboat crew, in a letter signed on their behalf by Messrs. Parker and Heard, coxswain and second coxswain, have expressed their thanks to me for the article relating to their grievances which had the effect of bringing about the inquiry held last week by Lord George Hamilton. I am very glad to have been of service to the men. Their case was taken up in Truth because it seemed to me that they had been treated unjustly by the Committee of Management of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, and the accuracy of the statements I made was fully borne out by the evidence given at the inquiry. It was shown that the launch on April 3, with which the dispute originated, was in the circumstances a perfectly justifiable launch, and in the report that they have now presented Lord George Hamilton and Captain Acton Blake, who assisted at the inquiry as nautical assessor, recommend that the crew shall receive the customary payment, hitherto refused by the authorities of the institution in spite of the advice of their local representatives. This vindication of their position in the matter is, of course, entirely satisfactory to the men. With regard to the local regulations under which launches of the lifeboats at Deal, Walmer, and Kingsdown are made, Lord George Hamilton and his colleague recommend the withdrawal of the impracticable condition as to the windward boat, a very important amendment in the direction desired by the men. It is proposed that the rule in which this condition appeared shall now read simply "in fine weather the boat in the most advantageous position having regard to the wind, tide, and distance from the casualty, is the only one to be launched;" and it is to be hoped that this will work out satisfactorily.

There ought to be some inquiry, independently of the coroner's court and the National Lifeboat Institution, into the capsizing of the Ryde lifeboat on the evening of New Year's Day. A good deal has been heard at different times about the liability of these boats to capsize, and the efficiency of their self-righting properties, and the matter was discussed some years ago in TRUTH without any very definite conclusion being arrived at. The Ryde lifeboat was admittedly not of the self-righting type, presumably because very heavy seas are not to be expected on the north side of the Isle of Wight; but that only makes it the more necessary that the boat should be sufficiently stable for such seas as are likely to be encountered off Ryde pier. According to the evidence the boat must have been close to the pier-head at the time when she capsized. It also seems rather extraordinary that an accident of this kind should have happened off Ryde pier at eight o'clock in the evening, and that no assistance should have been rendered to the crew clinging to the boat until she drifted ashore at Southsea six hours later.

The Shipping Gazette published the other day a statement which seems to require some explanation from the Elder Brethren of Trinity House. The Zeeland Steamship Company are said to have written to the Trinity House pointing out the value of submarine signals when fitted to lightships, and offering to instal such an apparatus on the Tongue lightship, and to keep it up at their own expense until Trinity House should be satisfied of its value, or the reverse, at the same time fitting two of their own ships with receiving apparatus, and reporting the result of the experiment to Trinity House. The offer was declined off-hand. It is pointed out by the Shipping Gazette that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have fitted a submarine signalling apparatus on one of their own lightships which has been of the greatest value to shipping in the Mersey, and there cannot be any reasonable doubt that it would be equally valuable at the entrance to the Thames. I have long had an impression that it is about time that the Elder Brethren made way for some of the younger brethren, and this impression is deepened by the foregoing incident.

An Engineer officer, R.N., argues that the admiral whose letter I published last week must have been mistaken as to Stoker Moody's connection with a strike of stokers on the Ophir, because, judging by the date when he joined the Navy and the age at which men are eligible for enlistment, he must have been too young to have taken any leading part in such a movement at the time of the Ophir's voyage. This would not be conclusive against direct evidence to the contrary. But I am more interested in my correspondent's observation that he quite agrees with me that more care should be exercised in excluding and getting rid of undesirable characters. He remarks that the desired result would be quickly attained if the same trouble were taken in obtaining stoker recruits as is taken in getting recruits for the marines. It was pointed out in TRUTH not long ago that twelve officers of Royal Marines are employed in recruiting duties and not a single Engineer officer.

The latest of the many growls in connection with the report of the Indian Police Commission comes from the inspectors of the Madras Presidency Police. These officers were among those recommended by the Commission for an increase of pay, and it is understood that the proposal was practically sanctioned by the Secretary of State a year or so ago, but up to the present it has not been carried out. The lower grades of the force have received an increase of pay from January 1, 1906, and two or three weeks back the superior officers were granted an increase with retrospective effect from April 1. It is not easy to perceive why the inspectors should thus have been left out in the cold while those ranking below and above them have been dealt with. Probably, however, the turn of the inspectors will come in time, and when it does their increase of pay, like that of their superiors, ought to be made retrospective.

There has been extraordinary dilatoriness on the part of the Board of Inland Revenue in announcing the results of an examination of assistant surveyors of taxes which was held on July 10 last year. They were examined on the law and practice relating to income-tax for the purpose of testing their fitness for appointment as surveyors of taxes when vacancies arise. Usually the results of such a departmental examination have been declared in less than three months, and the candidates on this occasion are naturally impatient and aggrieved at the delay in making known their fate.

The following story of a poor old pauper's death and burial reaches me from a resident at Great Chesterford, Essex. On the afternoon of December 24 William Turner, aged seventy-two, was discharged from the Linton Union Workhouse in order that he might spend Christmas with his relatives at Great Chesterford. The old man started to walk there, but he appears to have lost his way. His dead body was eventually found in a field near Great Chesterford Common. The body was taken to the village, and, as none of the relatives of the deceased would give it shelter, it was placed in a barn belonging to one of the overseers of the parish. There it remained uncoffined for five days. Meanwhile the coroner had been communicated with, but he decided that an inquest was not necessary. The body was then dumped into a coffin, put on to a cart, and driven round to the undertaker's shed, where it was left till the funeral took place. No doubt it was very thoughtless of William Turner to die inopportunely during the festive season; still, the manner in which the old fellow's corpse was treated hardly appears creditable to those concerned. The coroner presumably was satisfied that the death was due to natural causes, but, considering the circumstances, it was clearly a case in which an inquest should have been held.

Not for the first time, the City of London Guardians have come in for a scathing censure from Alderman Alliston on account of their treatment of children taken to the workhouse by the police. In the most recent case a constable found a little boy of seven, hungry and shivering, searching for scraps of food in the gutter and the street orderly bins. The constable very properly took him to the workhouse, and next day he was brought before the Alderman at the Guildhall on a charge of vagrancy—the charge being made, of course, as a matter of form in order that it might be ascertained who was responsible for his miserable condition, and what should be done with him. When found in the street this wretched waif had neither hat nor boots nor stockings. On fetching him from the workhouse the constable asked that he should be supplied with boots and stockings, but the reply of the officials was that they had none for such a purpose, and so, as he was not fit to walk through the streets in the inclement weather, the boy was driven to the Guildhall in a cab.

It was stated that in other districts the Boards of Guardians provide clothing for children in cases of this kind. In spite, however, of the remonstrance of the magistrates, the City Bumbles refuse to do this, their excuse being that the parents may afterwards pawn the boots which are given to the child. As a matter of fact, the boots usually provided are scarcely worth pawning; but surely it would be better to run the risk of such things being occasionally misappropriated by the parents than to commit the cruelty of sending forth poor little children into the streets bare-legged and barefooted in the depths of winter. In the present instance it was eventually discovered that no blame for the boy's condition attached to the father and mother, who were in the direst distress. It is reported, however, that owing to their resentment of the magistrate's criticisms the City Guardians will now refuse to give shelter at all to juvenile vagrants arrested by the police, leaving the latter to make some other arrangement for dealing with them. Probably this would be better for the children, for the police are a good deal more humane in such cases than these Guardians of the Poor.

A LESSON IN LAW.

Bumble, as you remember will,
Once as a "hass" the Law described;
And, though a "hass" himself, yet still
'Twas with some truth the Beadle jibed.

For scarce goes by a single day
But some example plain it brings
Of how the Law still pegs away
At doing idiotic things.

The latest case occurred last week,
When we a half-starved woman saw Brought up before a London "Beak"
To satisfy the outraged Law;

And all because (her husband sick,
Her children crying out for bread),
The woman's heart, to pity quick,
Had put it in the woman's head

To borrow from a friend some pence,
Therewith a few cheap toys to buy,
And, going where the traffic's dense,
A gutter merchant's trade to ply.

It didn't seem so very wrong
That she, in pressing need of pelf,
And moved by natural feeling strong,
Should thus essay to help herself;

And yet the Law, to paupers stern,
Esteemed her conduct shocking bad,
Because, when trying food to earn,
The wretch no hawker's licence had.

A constable majestic came,
Her little tray of toys to raid,
Demands, in threatening tones, her name,
And confiscates her stock-in-trade.

And this enough, you might have thought,
To vindicate our law sublime.
But no! The criminal to court
He haled, to answer for her crime.

The crime of having scarce a friend,
The crime of being abject poor,
The crime of struggling hard to fend
The wolf from her domestic door.

The wicked, monstrous crime—oh, fie!
Of daring through the streets to roam,
When she a licence couldn't buy,
A-selling toys to save her home.

The magistrate—a worthy chap,
Humane, no doubt, in private life—
Would lenient treat, you think, mayhap,
This brave, self-helpful, loving wife.

Not so. The feelings of the man
The magistrate mayn't override,
Nor claims of outraged justice can
In Justice's temple be denied.

"Five shillings fine you'll pay." Oh, what Grim irony was here unfurled!
Five shillings! When she hadn't got—
He knew it—fivepence in the world.

And so, instead, to gaol she went,
To expiate her shameful crime,
And there, in durance seven days pent,
Learnt to respect our Law sublime.

Although the property qualification for county J.P.'s has now been abolished, those who are appointed to this coveted office very soon find that they are still regarded as persons of means. One newly-fledged magistrate tells me that he was called upon to pay £2 2s. for fees, £5 5s. as a subscription to the Justices' Wine Fund, and £1 1s. as a subscription to the Justices' Plate Fund. I do not know whether similar charges are levied in other counties, but wherever the practice prevails it will have sooner or later to be abandoned. Under the old order of things it could safely be assumed that every J.P. was in a position to put down his £8 8s. Under the new Act men may be appointed to whom—though they are well fitted to act as magistrates—such a payment as this would be a rather serious tax.

It is doubtful, I should think, whether fees to the amount of £2 2s. can be legally exacted; and the subscriptions to the wine fund and the plate fund are obviously optional. But the presentation of such an account by the Clerk of the Peace must have the effect of embarrassing the poor J.P., who does not care to signalise his elevation to the Bench by refusing to comply with one of its customs, and for this reason the system ought to be stopped. In other directions also, the J.P. discovers that he is expected to pay for the honour that has been conferred upon him, for he at once becomes a target at whom all sorts of organisations, public and private, shoot their appeals for financial assistance. This, however, is an inevitable penalty of his greatness, which he must meet as his inclination prompts him, or his resources will permit.

A correspondent writes as follows on the question of the appointment of J.P.s:—

> The letter of the Lord Chancellor, in reply to the Liberal M.P.'s is thoroughly sound reasoning. Nevertheless, if the Liberals are not to consider politics in such appointments, and the Conservatives when in office are to continue to do so, it is obvious that there will always be a great many more Conservative than Liberal magistrates. It seems to me that the proper solution would be to have some sort of Board of Inquiry, and for the Lord Chancellor only to appoint those who are recommended by this Board, due regard being paid to bringing about an equality of numbers between Liberals and Conservatives on each Bench. It is, however, more easy to find fault with the present system than to suggest a perfect remedy.

The last remark rather confirms me in the opinion given last week that the best way out of the difficulty is to get rid of the amateur magistracy altogether. No reader of Truth needs to be told that the Lord Chancellor's troubles are not the only reason for this course.

Apropos of what I said in favour of the universal employment of stipendiary magistrates, I have had a letter gravely arguing that the appointment of one of these functionaries in every borough and every petty sessional division would entail an enormous expenditure. No doubt it would; but who has ever proposed that we should have a stipendiary for every borough and every petty sessional division? Certainly I have never contemplated anything so extravagant. What I have more than once pointed out is that there might be police court circuits just as there are county court circuits. In the vast majority of county divisions the petty sessions are held only once a fortnight, and in a considerable number only once a month. There would not be the least difficulty in arranging for one stipendiary to cover several neighbouring county or small borough courts—indeed, this system is, to a certain extent, adopted already in the cases of two stipendiaries in Staffordshire. The Great Unpaid would still be required (as they are now in London) to perform various non-judicial duties of the office, and perhaps to dispose of minor cases. But with a properly qualified lawyer on the Bench to deal with all important matters, it ought not to be necessary to have another highly-salaried lawyer to act as clerk, and savings might be effected in this direction which would largely reduce the cost of the appointment of stipendiaries.

Another correspondent, in advocating the appointment of stipendiaries, alludes to the danger of local amateur magistrates being influenced by feelings of friendship or by business considerations, especially in such matters as the administration of the licensing laws. He asserts that in a borough with which he is acquainted about half a dozen of the magistrates do a good deal of business with the principal brewer, who is also a member of the Bench, though he does not, of course, adjudicate in licensing cases. One J.P. is a builder who is frequently engaged in putting up new public-houses or altering old ones for the brewer; another does all the printing for the brewery; a third supplies fodder for the brewery horses; and so on. All these worthy men may be desirous of acting on the Bench with perfect impartiality, but still, it is possible that even unconsciously their judgments may sometimes be biassed when they have before them a question affecting the interests of a very good customer; and it is clearly far better that this risk should be avoided by the employment of a paid magistrate independent of any kind of local associations and prepossessions and prejudices.

It is to be hoped that the Departmental Committee on Bankruptcy Administration will have furnished the President of the Board of Trade with materials for a radical bankruptcy reform during next session, and that among such reforms something will be done to provide for the cheaper administration of small estates. The grievances that arise under this last head are again illustrated by an indignant letter from a West-End firm, creditors of a Mr. Burkinshaw, whose estate has just been wound up in the Hanley County Court. The net realisations in this matter were £102 14s. 10d. What the liabilities were I cannot say, nor is it worth while inquiring, for the creditors do not get a halfpenny out of the estate, the trustee's final statement showing that the whole of the £102 has been swallowed up in costs. It is the sort of statement, scores of which have been given before now in Truth—Board of Trade and Court fees to the amount of £30 all but a few pence; law costs to more than £30; £20 for trustee's remuneration; and half-a-dozen smaller items to account for what is left.

Cherry Whisky Fremy Fils (Chesky). Beware of Imitations.
Cherry Whisky Fremy Fils (Chesky) Sold Everywhere.

When £80 out of £102 go to the Court, the Board of Trade, the lawyers, and the trustee, it necessarily follows that the creditors are "left in the cart"; and apparently this state of things is more or less inevitable under the present system. No one supposes that bankruptcy business can be done for nothing; and when a bankrupt is only worth £100 or less, creditors cannot possibly expect to get much. But what seems to me monstrous is that after the Board of Trade and the Court have levied toll on an estate to the extent of 33⅓ per cent., the creditors should still have to pay the trustee, the lawyers, the auctioneer, the "person appointed to assist debtor," and half-a-dozen other incidental expenses of administration. The first charge is presumably by way of payment for the official machinery. Why, having paid for the machinery, should the creditors then have to pay for doing all the work?

In a letter to a local newspaper the senior practising solicitor in High Wycombe makes a spirited and much-needed protest against the practice of appointing a son in the place of his father whenever a vacancy arises in certain public paid offices. Recently four public appointments in High Wycombe—namely, Registrar of the County Court, Clerk to the Borough Justices, Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes, and Clerk to the Charity Governors—became vacant through the death of the holder, and each of these appointments has now been bestowed upon a son of the deceased. Nor is this an exceptional preceeding in High Wycombe, for during the past quarter of a century every other paid public office held by a solicitor in that town has become vacant, and (with one small exception) has been filled up by the election of a son of the former holder. There are not, perhaps, many places in which the principle of heredity in these matters has been observed so strictly as in High Wycombe, but the practice is undoubtedly much too prevalent.

It is not only unfair to those members of the legal profession who are outside the charmed circle of the favoured families, but distinctly injurious to the public service that such appointments should be passed on as a matter of course from father to son. Very likely the son is sometimes as good a man for the berth as any other applicant. It is notorious, however, that not unfrequently he is appointed solely because he is the son of his father, in preference to more experienced and better qualified candidates. One hears continually of cases in which competition for public offices of this description is only invited for the sake of appearances, the appointment of the son of the late official having been practically settled beforehand without regard to his merits in comparison with those of the rest of the competitors. The system of hereditary clerks to courts of justice or public bodies is as stupid and indefensible an anomaly as the system of hereditary legislators.

Apropos of defaulting solicitors, one of my legal readers calls attention to a point which was made in TRUTH by a correspondent a few months ago—I think the same gentleman. It is that a great deal of dishonesty among solicitors has resulted from a clause in the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1886, authorising any solicitor who can produce a deed executed by a client to receive the purchase money without further authority. I quite agree with my correspondent that it would be better to insist that the purchase money, if paid under such circumstances, should be paid by a cheque in favour of the vendor only, and crossed. But even if as many solicitors as my correspondent asserts have been led astray through non-observance of this precaution, I can hardly believe that they are any large proportion of the total number of wrong-doers, or that the scandals in the profession would be greatly diminished by an amendment of the practice on this point.

The jury at the Devon Quarter Sessions last week came to the conclusion that Miss Lake, the matron of a children's home at Exmouth, was not guilty of the charges of assaulting one child and neglecting and ill-treating others which were preferred against her. Miss Lake is to be congratulated upon her acquittal. At the same time, in view of the evidence which was given, I think many friends of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will expect to hear that the Society will not again entrust any children to Miss Lake's care. In the case of assault, it was shown that the child, a girl of thirteen, had thirteen or fourteen bruises on her body. The defence was that she had been properly punished, and that the punishment was not excessive; but though the jury endorsed this view, it is open to question whether the patronage of the N.S.P.C.C. should be bestowed on a home where such a method of dealing with a refractory child is adopted.

As to the charge of neglecting the children, a medical man and other witnesses deposed that they were badly nourished. Medical and other evidence to a contrary effect was given for the defence, and this seems to have made the deepest impression upon the jury. It was, however, admitted that the children's diet was purely vegetarian, with very little milk, and I very much doubt whether a purely vegetarian diet, with very little milk, is suited for children, particularly when it is remembered that the majority of those in this institution were weak and neglected children who had been rescued by the N.S.P.C.C. from cruel parents. I do not know whether the officials of the Society were aware of the nature of the diet the little ones received. If they were it seems to me that they were to blame. The vast majority of the subscribers certainly would not approve of the little ones being put on a vegetarian diet, and it is to be hoped that after this case no further experiment of the kind will be permitted.

Happy is the lot of the wife-beater at Gloucester, if the decision recorded in my Legal Pillory this week may be taken as a fair sample of the tenderness with which he is treated by the Solons of the City Bench. At a very trifling expense he can not only thrash his wife, but follow up this exercise by striking and kicking another woman. The Bench were constrained to remark that the conduct of the defendant was cowardly and brutal. Hard words, however, are not likely to make any impression on a ruffian of this type unless they are enforced by a term of hard labour, and it is perfectly preposterous that such an offender should be let off with a fine of ten shillings and costs. Some further noteworthy instances of misguided leniency in cases of violence and cruelty are given from Bootle, Lincoln, Southend, Glasgow, and the West Riding Quarter Sessions. But, as will be seen from the contrasted sentences, however absurdly indulgent the magistracy may be in dealing with offences against the person, they are always ready to inflict a severe punishment upon the petty thief, the poacher, or the homeless and penniless wanderer who is guilty of the enormity of sleeping out without having visible means of subsistence. It will be noticed that one of the poachers sent to prison at Worksop was a first offender:—

West Riding Quarter Sessions, Sheffield. Wm. Taylor, charged with unlawfully wounding William Meek. They were sitting in a public house when the prisoner, without any dispute arising, struck the prosecutor on the left temple and cheek with a pint pot, inflicting a serious injury. Fined 20s.; in default, one month.

Southend Police-court. Joseph W. Jones, charged with cruelty to a horse. The police found the horse lying on its side in an open space at the rear of the defendant's stables. Its hind legs were tied together, and it was evidently in a dying condition. In its struggles on the ground it had severely injured itself. The animal was subsequently shot. Fined 20s. and costs.

Bootle Police-court. James Lovatt, charged with assaulting a policeman. He butted the officer in the chest, struck him in the mouth, knocked him down, and knelt on him. This was the fourth time he had been charged with assaulting the police. Fined 20s. and costs.

Lincoln Police-court. Before Alderman Wallis and other magistrates. John Wilson and James Wilson, charged with assaulting Charles Martin. They made an unprovoked attack upon complainant, striking him, knocking him down, and kicking him so brutally that he was confined to his bed for four days. A constable said that he found complainant lying in the gutter and thought at first that he was dying. John Wilson fined 20s. and the other defendant 30s.

West Riding Quarter Sessions, Sheffield. Harry Silvey, charged with stealing a woollen shirt. Twelve months.

West Riding Quarter Sessions, Leeds. Herbert Heathcote, charged with stealing an overcoat. Three months.

Glamorgan Quarter Sessions. Julius Anderson, charged with stealing a pair of trousers, a shirt, and a pair of stockings. Five years.

Southend Police-court. Before Alderman Brightwell and other magistrates. Alfred Whitehead, charged with stealing two fowls. One month.

Southampton Borough police-court. Before Messrs. J. E. Le Feuvre, F. Beresford Turner, W. Wright, W. J. Atkins, and other magistrates. Thomas Costello, charged with wandering abroad and sleeping out, having no visible means of subsistence. Fourteen days.

Sharnbrook Divisional Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. L. Stileman-Gibbard, W. Hipwell, M. Townley, H. B. O. St. John, and Colonel Jackson. Frederick Reynolds and Charles Westley, charged with trespassing in search of game. Fined £2 7s. 6d. each; in default, one month.

Dorchester County Police-court. Before Messrs. H. B. Middleton, H. J. Groves, A. Pope, E. W. Floyer, R. Hayne, A. R. Pope, H. P. Bond, and Lieut.-Colonel H. S. Williams. Owen Critchell, charged under the Poaching Prevention Act with being found with three rabbits in his possession. Fined £5.

Weymouth County Police-court. Before Dr. Laurie and Messrs. J. Lane and O. Warner. Wm. Stone, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Samford Petty Sessions. Before Mr. C. H. Berners and Captain A. H. Morse. George Hazlewood, charged with assaulting Henry Jennings, an elderly man. Complainant, who had offered no provocation, was struck in the face, thrown down and kicked in a brutal manner. The police described defendant as a very quarrelsome man. Fined 10s. 6d. and costs.

Gloucester City Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Bruton, H. K. Butt, and J. Ward. Samuel Knight, charged with assaulting Elizabeth Moseley. Defendant was beating his wife, who had a child in her arms, and who fell to the ground. Complainant went to pick her up, and defendant thereupon gave her a severe blow in the eye, knocked her down, and kicked her in the mouth, splitting her lip. The Bench said he had committed a cowardly and brutal assault. Fined 10s. and 9s. costs.

Glasgow Southern Police-court. John Dunlop, charged with assaulting a man in the street. The accused was one of a gang of four or five roughs who attacked the complainant without the slightest provocation, striking him on the face, knocking him down, and otherwise ill-treating him. Dunlop had been previously convicted. Fined 30s.

Isle of Ely Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. A. J. Bell and other magistrates. John Beales, charged with stealing two fowls. Three months.

Derby Police-court. Before Messrs. G. Frost and W. Richardson. James Sims, charged with wandering abroad and having no visible means of subsistence. Ten days.

Worksop Police-court. Before Colonel G. Foljambe, and Messrs. H. V. Machin, J. Thornton, and S. A. Jowett. Thomas Wilkins, Thomas Spencer, and Reuben Elms, charged with poaching. None of the prisoners offered any violence to the keepers who captured them. Wilkins, three months; Spencer, two months; and Elms (not previously convicted), one month.

Wokingham Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor. Edward Fredk. Wise, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days Dronfield Police-court. Before Dr. Rooth and Dr. Fletcher. Herbert Cutts and George Pell, charged with stealing two fowls. Two months each.

Scarborough Police-court. Herbert Nicholson, Charles Braithwaite and James Carlisle, charged with poaching. Braithwaite fined £5 or two months, and the other defendants £2 each, or one month.

Chesterfield County Police-court. Charles Newns, charged with assaulting Martha Ackville, a domestic servant, who said that he came up behind her and tried to throw her down. When she screamed he put his hand over her mouth, but after a struggle lasting five minutes she succeeded in getting away from him. The defence was that the accused was not sober at the time, and that he only attempted to kiss the girl. Fined 5s. and costs.

Not a few of the rural magistracy seem to think that the mere fact that a man is known as a poacher is in itself a sufficient reason for convicting him of any offence against the Game Laws with which he is charged. At Albrighton (Shropshire) Petty Sessions last week one Bryan was summoned under the Poaching Prevention Act. The only witness for the prosecution was a gamekeeper, who said that he followed the defendant and another man for some distance and that he saw the defendant "take off his coat and waistcoat and pull off his back a long rabbit net." From this it is a fair inference that Bryan was starting on a poaching expedition. But the Poaching Prevention Act, in spite of its title, does not apply to a case in which it may be reasonably suspected that a man is going poaching. It is limited to cases in which there are good grounds for believing that the accused, when found on the highway with game or poaching implements in his possession, was coming from land where he had been unlawfully in search of game. Judging from the report Bryan was entitled to an acquittal. The Chairman of the Bench, Mr. G. Butler Lloyd, seems to have been aware of the flaw in the evidence. "The case," he said, "had not been put before them very perfectly, but defendant had a bad record and he would be fined 10s." In other words, the defendant was not properly proved to have committed an offence this time, but he had been guilty on previous occasions, and so he was again convicted! Such is Justices' justice.

Some rather bitter comments are made by one or two correspondents on a case at Marlborough-street

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

Police-court last week, in which a young woman from Winchester was charged with stealing silk blouses from a shop in Oxford-street. One newspaper report described the accused as a photographer's assistant, others suggested that she was a rich young lady moving in "the best society" in her native city. My correspondents make the latter statement the basis of an attack upon the magistrate for letting her off with a fine of £5 for unlawful possession of the stolen goods, instead of sending her to prison for theft. It is suggested that she would have been sent to prison if she had been a poor girl. Possibly she might have been, but in that case I should have held—and so, I presume, would my correspondents—that the sentence was harsh. It certainly would not have been less harsh because she happens to be rich, or at least well-to-do, and I therefore have no sympathy with these criticisms of the magistrate's decision. The prisoner was a first offender, and in the circumstances of the offence, whether she was rich or poor, it was only just and reasonable that she should receive lenient treatment.

In alluding last week to a welshing transaction by the betting agent trading as "A. J. Bee and Co.," Craven House, Kingsway, W.C., I anticipated that his description of himself as a member of the Beaufort Club would be contradicted. This proved to be the case, the secretary having written to tell me that no member of the Beaufort Club is connected with the firm of "A. J. Bee and Co." It might be worth the while of the police to consider whether the use of this false pretence as to his membership of the club does not bring "A. J. Bee and Co." within the reach of the criminal law.

The sharks of usury are, as usual, particularly busy just now, when an offer of financial assistance is exceptionally tempting to people embarrassed by the demands of the tax-gatherer and the rate-collector in combination with the Christmas aftermath of tradesmen's bills. Most of the circulars that have been sent on to me emanate from old acquaintances in this line, but there are one or two new names in the collection. I have not previously heard, for instance, of a philanthropist signing himself "L. Hignett," of 56, Cicada-road, Wandsworth Common, S.W., who intimates that he "immediately cashes I.O.U.s, promissory notes, cheques, etc., at long or short periods, quite privately." "I am not," he adds, "a loan bank (public or private) nor a moneylender. I warn you against such, however artfully disguised." If not a moneylender himself—and on this point at least I dare say he speaks the truth—"L. Hignett" must be one of those still more dangerous birds of prey, a moneylender's tout. He merits the attention of the police as an offender against the Moneylenders Act, for though his circular obviously brings him within its provisions, he is not registered at Somerset House.

"S. Turner," who begs respectfully to inform you that he has taken offices at 14, Dover-street, Piccadilly, is a provincial recruit to the ranks of the West End usurers. Saul Tumim is his real name, and he hails from Manchester, where he has an office at 2, Pall-mall and an abode at 385, Bury New-road. Formerly Tumim also carried on usury-shops in Rochdale and Halifax. Abraham Lazarus, alias "A. Masters," 33, Brook-street, W., is specially circularising the secretaries of commercial and other companies in the City and West End, whom he will wait upon "with the cash" if they are misguided enough to apply to him for an advance. For a usurer to make such overtures to persons in places of trust is a doubly reprehensible proceeding, but it is precisely what might be expected of this bloodsucker, Lazarus, who has over and over again shown himself to be utterly unprincipled. Other members of the same tribe whose pernicious activity is being daily brought under my notice are "H. Bowen" (alias Samuel), 18, Hart-street, Bloomsbury; "H. Passmore" (alias Henry Phillips), 8, Red Lion-square, W.C.; and S. Arons, 37, Stoke Newington-road, N., who, unlike most usurers of the same persuasion, sticks to his own name.

To the list of moneylenders whom I have gibbeted for circularising railway stationmasters I now have to add the name of Nathan Cohen, alias the "Yorkshire Advance Office," The Chambers, Park-square, Leeds, and 2, Westgate, Barnsley. It was at Barnsley that Cohen began his nefarious business, but some time ago he established his headquarters in Leeds, where he lives at Grove Lodge, Harehills-lane. By seeking to enmesh such persons as railway stationmasters, he writes himself down a rascal.

My ignorance in supposing that slate club savings are dissipated at Christmas is rebuked with contempt by a reader who professes to know all about such clubs. He informs me that they also assure to their members benefits in the event of sickness and death. Very likely some may do so, but certainly not all, for I have known more than one which offered nothing of the kind, and I believe I am right in saying that "sharing out" at Christmas is a feature common to all of them. I happen to know two young persons, male and female, who were subscribers to the Tooting Club, and both were disappointed of the money which they were reckoning upon for their Christmas festivities. They had subscribed for no other purpose. As to the business hours of the Post Office Savings Bank, I had forgotten when writing that a few years ago they were extended to 8 p.m. to meet the convenience of working-class depositors. But 8 p.m. is not late enough for everybody, as we know at election times, when working-class electors are frequently unable to get to the poll by that hour.

Anyhow, there can be no question that slate clubs need to be put under some sort of supervision which will protect the depositors; and the more they appeal to the thrifty by offering insurance benefits, the more necessary this becomes. What could show the necessity more clearly than the ingenuous confession of the mysterious Mr. Baker?—

> As the Slate Club funds came in they were used by me for the other branches of the Institute, I having in reserve investments which, I believed, would be sufficient to cover the money so used. When I went up to my brokers on the Friday before the break I confidently expected to receive £2,000. I found that the securities were practically worth nothing. The £2,000 was what was to be used for the share-out of the Slate Club.
> My own money was invested in the same securities, and I lost that at the same time. I did not know what to do, and I went away because I could not face it.

Apparently he found on reflection that he could face it, so he came back again. His proceedings and his story are absolutely incomprehensible, in view of the fact already known that the Governors have put down among them £7,000 to cover the deficit in the Institute funds generally. Did Mr. Baker put another £5,000 of the Institute funds into securities which suddenly proved to be valueless, besides the £2,000 mentioned in the above statement? Anyhow, here we have a slate club whose treasurer by his own account has expended £2,000 of the club money as it came in for purposes with which the club had nothing to do, relying on having the like amount invested in securities of such a class that when they have to be realised they are found to be worth nothing at all. What the stocks can have been Heaven only knows—something worse than Kaffirs evidently, for even a man whose Kaffirs were worth £2,000 a few months ago would not find them absolutely worthless to-day. Not less amazing than the fluctuations of these mercurial stocks, which Mr. Baker had selected as suitable for a trust investment, is the fact that these fluctuations should have gone on without his having the slightest suspicion of it. He had evidently looked upon the money as though it were in Consols, and he went up to his broker's to sell at a moment's notice, only to find that the stock had gone down to zero. I suppose the company is going to be reconstructed.

In this curious story, not the least curious feature is the behaviour of Mr. Baker's Bible class, who greeted their teacher with enthusiastic cheers on his return from his Continental trip, causing him to weep copiously. These disciples, I should guess, are not depositors in the slate club, and their enthusiasm for the master must have reference to his gifts of biblical exposition rather than his qualities as a financier or a trustee. Outside the Bible class, at any rate, it must be recognised by everybody that it should not be possible for any trust fund to be managed by such a man or by such methods; and means ought to be taken at once to put all these clubs on a more business-like footing.

While the Government legislation for the next Session is being planned out, Mr. Lloyd-George, or one of his colleagues, might with advantage turn his attention to the discussion that has been going on in the Times, namely, the unsatisfactory working of the present system of arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act, particularly in regard to the evidence of surveyors. As everybody with experience in such cases knows, when the value of property which is to be compulsorily acquired has to be assessed, the owner produces an array of experts in support of any fancy valuation that he puts on his property, while the would-be purchaser produces an opposition array of similar experts to testify with equal confidence that the market value is but a quarter, or a tenth, or even less, of the valuation on the other side. As the gentleman who first raised this question in the Times points out, the "experts" engaged in this line of business are a small ring, who understand all the tricks of the business, and when an arbitration takes place before two professional arbitrators and an umpire, the umpire, being an expert himself, is able to form a pretty accurate estimate of the true value by his own knowledge and experience.

But when, as very frequently happens, the arbitration is held before an under-sheriff and a jury, the case is very different. The jury are simply fogged by the contradictory evidence presented to them, and, being totally without knowledge of their own to guide them, can only adopt the happy-go-lucky process of "splitting the difference." In other words, they generally add the valuations on each side together and divide them by two. Justice cannot be done by this process. Mr. C. C. Macrae, writing from long professional experience, mentions a case in which the vendor valued his property at £100,000, while the intending purchaser valued it at practically nothing. The arbitrator awarded £100. Had this case gone before a jury, the probability is that the vendor would have got something like £50,000 for property which is found to be practically worthless. This is only an extreme example of what is always happening.

The remedy suggested for this state of things is that the trial of such questions before juries should be abolished altogether, and that the expert witnesses as to value should be limited to one on each side. It is also suggested that the representation of parties by counsel should be abolished, but that is a matter open to difference of opinion. The cost of counsel is a comparatively small matter, and it may be that experienced professional advocates assist between them in the elucidation of truth. What chiefly requires to be remedied is the opening for gross injustice which arises when the two sides appear before a jury with a long array of expert witnesses on each side to testify to hopelessly irreconcilable propositions, between which a jury have no personal qualifications for deciding. The cost of these experts is enormous; and whether or not the longest purse always gets the advantage, there must always be a costly competition between the two sides in presenting a mass of evidence which is intrinsically worthless, because it is notorious that all these witnesses simply swear what they are paid to swear. Public authorities, like the London County Council, suffer heavily by the system, the burden being borne in this case by the ratepayers.

The whole system of arbitration rests on the principle that the owner of land may be expropriated on payment of just compensation whenever his property is required for public purposes, whether by a public authority or a quasi-public corporation like a railway company; and it seems to me that the most sensible way of assessing the compensation in such cases would be to transfer them to a special court or commission presided over by public functionaries. Even the plan of having an arbitrator appointed by each side, and an umpire chosen by these two, is clumsy and futile, for in all such cases the arbitrators are necessarily partisans, and therefore fill no function but that of advocates or witnesses, which means that the decision really rests with the umpire. It would be far better that this personage should be a public official than that he should be thus appointed "ad hoc" by a cumbrous process of indirect election.

At the head of a column of press extracts in the Daily Mail having reference to the Channel Tunnel, I was proud to see a quotation from Truth; but I feel bound to say that the passage selected for this distinguished honour by no means accurately indicates my general opinion on the question. I have always looked upon the opposition to a tunnel as essentially irrational. Among civilians it is founded on the nervousness, prejudice, and incapacity for seeing to the bottom of complex problems which are our national characteristics. Among military men it is much the same, the result being accentuated by that distrust of itself which is characteristic of the British Army—possibly not altogether without reason. The only practical objection that I see to making a tunnel is that while the civilian mind is in this unreasoning condition, and the military mind throws its weight on the same side, the existence of such a tunnel would furnish our panic-mongers, already too potent, with a new bogey, and possibly lead to increased armaments and profitless expenditure of public money.

The weakest part of the opposition to the proposal is that the tunnel would be of no practical use if made. If it is worth while to construct a bridge over the Tay or the Zambesi, or a tunnel under the Severn or the Alps, it must be infinitely more so to construct a railway between England and France. Seventy years ago plenty of people saw no good purpose in a railway between Manchester and Liverpool or London and Birmingham. If you have an objection to a railway on other grounds than those of utility, you can always persuade yourself that it will be of no use.

I wonder whether the opponents of the Channel Tunnel grasp the significance of the establishment of the White Star line at Southampton, and the probable adoption of the same course by the Cunard Company. What is the meaning of these steps? Simply that traffic between the Continents of Europe and America is vastly on the increase, and naturally tends towards the westernmost Continental ports. Hence the growth of trans-Atlantic services from Cherbourg and Havre. With a good service from such ports there is no reason why Continental passengers (or goods) should be shipped first to England, carried across England by rail, and reshipped from Liverpool. The French have taken advantage of this, and the Germans still more. The Liverpool lines are now seeking to compete with them on their own ground. But if there were a through line of rail from the Continent to Liverpool, Liverpool would compete for Continental traffic on equal terms with Cherbourg, if not better; and if the railway line could be carried through to Queenstown or Galway, a great part of such traffic would be transferred to those ports.

THE JEALOUS SURGEONS.

A Nobleman, of high Estate,
But Constitution delicate,
Had once—so cruel Fates betide—
A Tumour in his—hem!—Inside;
Which, to remove and save his Life,
Required forthwith the Surgeon's Knife.
Then called he in, without Delay,
The four chief Surgeons of the Day,
Who met, in solemn Consultation,
To carry out the Operation.
But though, consenting, all agreed
On the Operation's urgent Need,
They fell to Disputation warm
Re who that Office should perform;
Since, jealous, each chirurgic Elf
Demands the Honour for himself.
This Question, all-important rated,
So long those Surgeons four debated,
That, ere they could the Point decide,
The hapless Patient sank and died.

SCRUTATOR.

THE ONLY WAY IN THE EDUCATION DIFFICULTY.

LIBERALS must keep steadily in mind that the real issue between the Lords and Commons is not so much the merits and demerits of the Education Bill, or of the Plural Voting Bill, as the question whether the Lords are to retain the power that they now possess to veto the decisions of the elected representatives of the entire country on important issues. The only justification for such a right is either that the Lords are endowed with some mysterious sixth sense which enables them to know better what is the real wish of the country than its elected representatives, or that they may forbid anything of which they do not approve, like despotic monarchs who reign by right divine. But if either of these dogmas be true, it is self-evident that we ought to do away with the House of Commons, and to look to these specially gifted beings to rule over us. To have an Executive selected from the majority of the Commons, and to subordinate their action to the good pleasure of the Lords, is a state of things which must necessarily render General Elections a waste of time, and reduce the Executive to ridicule and contempt.

I never particularly admired the Education Bill. In its general intention it was a vast improvement on Mr. Balfour's Act of 1902. But it extended to all schools except those coming under Clause 4 the system of official religious instruction provided for Board schools under the Act of 1870, though supplemented by such special denominational teaching as the owners of Church schools might provide at their own expense on two days a week. For all but a few exceptional schools, therefore, an official religion was to be provided, subject only to the right of withdrawing children from all religious instruction under the conscience clause, which few parents have ever cared to exercise. This official religion has always seemed to me a mere vague hazy recognition of Christianity, without dogma and without any admission that it is a supernatural revelation to mankind, and it was to be taught by men who might or might not themselves be Christians. The absurdity of the play of "Hamlet" being acted with the part of Hamlet left out, is proverbial. But this would be wisdom compared to calling such teaching Christianity. With us there are many sects of Christians, and many who are not Christians. Attendance at school is rightly made obligatory during a certain number of hours in each week. The reason for this is that a certain measure of education is necessary if the rising generation is not to sink into barbarism, and if this country is to hold its own with others in the ever-increasing international competition. This secular education is provided by the State, and in it should be included the ethics which go to make good citizens. Here the duty of the State ends, and the teaching of the particular religion of the parents of the children should be left either to the parents or to the pastors of the sect to which they belong. This is a comprehensible scheme, as was the idea entertained by Philip II. of Spain and many others in his day, that the State religion in its entirety should be taught to all, and that any one who declined to accept it should be burnt at the stake.

It is often asserted that the country is determined that religion—or what passes for religion—shall always form part of the national scheme of education. I greatly doubt whether this be so. The working men are the majority of the electors, and every working-man's representative who sits in the House of Commons is opposed to any religion being taught at the public cost. The Conservatives, and the Bishops of the Church of England have declared that Cowper-Templeism is a mockery of Christianity, and that they would prefer the teaching of no religion to its being taught. They prefer this to being prevented from teaching their own particular views in regard to religion in State schools. If there were a General Election to-morrow, before which the present Government were to announce that they would, should they secure a majority, bring in a Bill which would secularize all public instruction by the State, the working men would vote for the Government candidates. What could the Nonconformists do? If there were no Liberal majority, the Conservatives would be able to keep alive the state of things established in 1902. Would Nonconformists not prefer Secularism in education to this state of things? In the main I believe that they would, and that, seeing that they cannot have exactly their own way, but have to choose between Secularism and Denominationalism, they would support the former, all the more as, were they not to do so, they would put in office a Conservative Administration with all its attendant evils. Nonconformists have done good service in the past in the cause of religious and civil liberty. But in matters of religion they are exceedingly narrow-minded—or, rather, perhaps it is more correct to say they allow themselves to be led by those amongst them who are narrow-minded.

Dr. Clifford has announced that the campaign of passive resistance is to recommence. He would have all Nonconformists refuse to pay the school rate until our entire educational system is put on the footing that finds favour with him. He seems to imagine that the imprisonment of a number of Nonconformists would arouse such a storm of indignation that the country would insist on the Nonconformist views being incorporated into the law of the land. My impression is that the contrary would be the result. This sort of cheap martyrdom, as a means to direct attention to some particular issue on which men differ, is silly nonsense. I have no more sympathy with an imprisoned Dissenter, because he will not obey the law, than with an imprisoned female Suffragist. Whether some saint of old was right or wrong as to his opinions, one cannot help admiring a man who allowed himself to be boiled in oil, or put to death in some equally unpleasant manner, rather than surrender them. But to prefer a short imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant to paying legal rates because there is an objection to the manner in which the money thus obtained is in part spent, and to secure a little personal notoriety by so doing, is a very different matter. Moreover, I have never understood why Dr. Clifford and his friends should haggle over rates and swallow taxes, although both rates and taxes are employed in providing funds for our schools. Why, then, have a conscientious objection to pay the one and be ready without even a protest to pay the other? Nonconformists are always airing their consciences as though they had in some peculiar way a monopoly of this inner member. If they are to be judges of when they have the right to pay rates and taxes, I presume that they recognise the same right in others. Take for instance this question of education. I object to any public funds being expended on teaching religion in schools. I regard it as a gross injustice to many, and I believe that it is fatal to any sound scheme of education being possible. Does Dr. Clifford hold that I, and those who think with me, have a right to refuse to pay either rates or taxes, and that rather than do so we ought to allow ourselves to be sent to prison? Had I accepted imprisonment as the only conscientious alternative to paying, would he regard me as a martyr to conscience, even if I had paid the tax and refused to pay the rate? So, too, with the opponents to Mr. Birrell's Bill. Had it passed, does he consider that the Bishops of the Church of England ought to have accepted imprisonment? Their consciences disapprove of the teaching in schools which the law would have provided probably as strongly as Dr. Clifford approves of it. Where, indeed, is this right of an individual only to pay his share of the public burdens, when national or local funds levied by law are expended in what he regards a proper manner, to end? I regarded the Boer War as a crime. Ought I, then, to have declined to pay taxes because a portion of their proceeds was expended in this abominable war? This is, to my thinking, a denial of the primary idea of all self-governing communities. The decision of the mode in which taxes are to be spent must rest with the majority of citizens, unless each man is to obey only the laws of which he approves.

Dr. Clifford would, perhaps, say that on this education question the views of the majority have been set at naught by the action of the Lords. In this I agree with him. But the Lords have a constitutional right to throw out any Bill, and there are constitutional methods to put an end to this right. His right mode of procedure is, therefore, to insist on the House of Commons sweeping away the Lords' veto on any Bill that has passed the Commons. If the representatives of the nation elect to establish the scheme of education that he approves of, I, and those who think with me, would recognise the obligation to conform to the law, and we should endeavour to alter it in our sense by legitimate agitation. If the representatives of the nation should in their wisdom prefer the secular solution, we should expect him to act in the same fashion. I have no special prejudice for the views either of the Pope of Rome or of our Nonconformists. I leave sects to wrangle over matters which seem to me of very minor importance. I would give each sect the fullest liberty to teach what it pleases. But just as Dr. Clifford objects to a State Church supported with public funds, so do I object to State schools where any religion is taught, not because I think that religion should be ignored in education, but because there is no consensus of opinion as to what religion ought to be taught, and any attempt to smooth over differences by Cowper-Templeism or such-like "religions" will leave our schools the battle-ground of conflicting sects, or reduce religion to a mere official farce.

THIRTY YEARS IN "TRUTH" OFFICE.

With the present issue Truth enters on the thirty-first year of its existence. It seems only the other day that I endeavoured to entertain my readers with a résumé of "Twenty Years in Truth Office;" but, alas! ten years have elapsed since that article appeared, and in the general process of stock-taking that goes on with the beginning of a new year, I am tempted to reckon up what Truth has done during those ten years to justify its existence. Few mortals looking back over so long a period can discover nothing to regret in their conduct, and still fewer journalists. I find that since January, 1897, I have made one or two more or less serious mistakes, and have had to pay for them. Doubtless there have been many smaller mistakes, for which I may or may not have had to pay. But on the whole, when the balance is struck, I hope that it will be found well in my favour. Looking through the files of Truth for the time in question, I think I can easily show that the paper has done a great deal of good; and I doubt whether anybody can show that it has done any serious harm. Considering that it is published primarily with the intention of speaking its mind plainly, without regard to any interests which may be affected thereby, remembering also that no man living can form an opinion on any subject without liability to error, it is something to be able to say so much with a clear conscience.

I suppose that the part of the work of Truth Office which most interests the public, as well as the Editor, relates to the exposure of swindlers and imposters, and the ventilation of abuses of all sorts. In reviewing what has been done in these directions even during the last ten years, the difficulty is to know where to begin, and after that where to stop. If anybody desires to understand the magnitude of the aggregate result accomplished in these directions, he has only to look at those "Cautionary Lists" which I have made a practice of publishing annually for the last four or five years. In these has been given a summary of the names and doings of all individuals, firms, and associations that have come under notice in Truth within the previous twelve months. When it is remembered that such summaries do not profess to be exhaustive—there being a great many cases in which, while a passing criticism may be justifiable at the moment, to pillory a person subsequently may not be—the accumulation of them year by year affords a record which, I confess, quite astonishes me when I look back upon it. It is true that a certain number of the names re-appear year by year. But a great many more drop out, thereby showing the practical result of such inconvenient publicity; and, what is of more consequence from my point of view, so far as readers of Truth are concerned, all these birds of prey are, or ought to be, rendered innocuous. I am really not concerned about people who do not read Truth, and it is not my fault if everybody does not do so. I take the opportunity of remarking that another annual issue of the "Cautionary List" is now in course of preparation, and will make its appearance before the end of the month, and I recommend everybody to procure and preserve it. Readers will not find there, however, any record of many of the largest frauds and scandals that Truth has put an end to in recent years, and to these only I will refer on the present occasion.

Five-and-Twenty Libel Actions.

Necessarily this class of business brings with it a great deal of more or less troublesome litigation. When I was last reviewing my editorial experiences I was able to congratulate myself warmly upon the net results of such litigation up to that date. It is the same to-day, and I again lay stress upon the fact because it shows that the criticism of Truth upon particular persons and individuals has in the main been justified conclusively. In 1897 I was able to show that out of all the actions that I had fought in twenty years, only two had resulted in "substantial" damages, and one of these turned on a matter of no greater public or private interest than the precise position of a village pump, as to which I was misled by trusting to the evidence of two beneficed clergymen—a lesson which I have always remembered to my profit. Through placing the village pump upon the wrong side of the street, I had to pay £100 in damages, with a much larger sum in costs. In the ten years that have elapsed since I made that boast, though something like five-and-twenty aggrieved parties have gone so far as to issue writs, only nine have brought their cases into court, though two parties also made applications to commit Mr. Labouchere for contempt of court. Of these nine actions, four were decided in my favour either by the jury or judges, one was settled in court, each side paying its own costs, while one resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, but the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial on my application. I may incidentally remark that this is the only case in thirty years in which I have ever appealed against the verdict of a jury, but as a further appeal to the House of Lords by the plaintiff is still pending, I say nothing more about this case. This accounts for six out of the nine actions. Of the three verdicts which stand against Truth, one was an action brought by the Co-operative Union, and £1 damages were awarded to each of thirteen plaintiffs, and £2 to the Union collectively, which is sufficient to show that the alleged libel was not of a serious nature. In fact, I was never able myself to make out clearly what it was. There remain, therefore, only two cases in which substantial damages were awarded. In one of these a gentleman named Calev recovered £100 for an allegation in Truth that he had published in the World a story which was identical with a Queer Story previously published in Truth. The trial showed that both the Truth and World stories came independently from a more or less ancient source, and under these circumstances I certainly could not grudge the author what the jury gave him. In the last case of the lot, a Lancashire gentleman recovered a verdict at Manchester for £500 for a libel, due to an unfortunate mistake which was corrected and apologised for as soon as it was brought to my notice. The writer of the article had confused the gentleman in question with his brother in the transactions under notice. His mistake was detected before the article went to press, and was corrected in every instance but one where the names were mentioned, and it was this oversight that cost Truth £500. In the whole ten years, therefore, the only case in which a verdict has been recovered against Truth for a libel published intentionally is the case of Mr. Caley, who obtained £100 damages. I take a pride in this fact, which I think every one will admit to be legitimate. It must be remembered that during these ten years many hundreds of individuals, associations, companies, and institutions have been criticised in these columns more or less severely. I could easily point to dozens who have been accused of conduct unfitting them to associate with respectable men. Every journalist who does this does it, in the present state of the law, at grave risk to himself, however sure he may feel about his facts. When, therefore, it appears that in the course of ten years only one person whose conduct has been criticised in these column has succeeded in recovering damages for libel, and that only in consequence of a mistake as to the origin of a work of fiction, which a jury only assessed at £100 damages, I feel entitled to appeal to the result as showing that strong as is the criticism to which individuals are often subjected in Truth, exceptional care is taken that such criticism is never published except in the fullest assurance that it can be justified if challenged. I am not the only journalist who has ever made a practice of hitting hard, but I think I may claim to be the only one who, after the hardest hitting for thirty years, can say that during the whole of that time he has only been found guilty on about three occasions of hitting the wrong man.

Some Unsuccessful Plaintiffs.

Among the actions in this ten years' list, the majority relate to matters which are now of little public interest, but there are two or three which are worth recalling. One of them is the heavy litigation over the Article Club, in which Mr. Laurence Cowen was the plaintiff. Mr. Cowen was a very clever young man—too clever, unfortunately—who started a journal called Commerce. In connection with this journal, he founded an association of business men which was called the Article Club, because the qualification for membership was the publication in Commerce of an article descriptive of the member's business. For each such article the price was £300, besides the purchase of a certain number of copies for distribution; and the charge was, on the face of it, absurd, because the paper was quite unknown, and had no sale worth speaking of beyond its sale to the members of the club. All sorts of ingenious tricks were employed in order to get influential people into the club, either as honorary members for advertising purposes, or as £300-members for Mr. Cowen's purposes, and the club was blown up like a big bubble until it began to have the air of an important public institution, while Mr. Cowen waxed wealthy, became quite a personage, and contemplated entering Parliament. The humbug of the thing was exposed in Truth, but I treated it more or less as a joke, and Mr. Cowen allowed my observations to pass unnoticed for more than a year, when I suppose he found that they were injuring the concern, and he brought an action for libel. After a long and expensive trial the jury disagreed; but another long and expensive trial followed, the verdict was given in my favour, and the Article Club thereupon disappeared. On the whole, I think that its disappearance was an advantage to British trade and the public generally. But it was a somewhat expensive operation for Truth, as Mr. Cowen subsequently became bankrupt, and the costs have never been paid. How many thousands of pounds I have had the pleasure of disbursing in connection with cases in which I have been successful—not to mention the others—I find it difficult to reckon up precisely, but something like twelve thousand out of the total stand to the credit—or, perhaps, I should say the debit—of the Article Club and Mr. Cowen.

One of the motions above mentioned to commit Mr. Labouchere for contempt of court provided a case of considerable public interest. It was brought by the late Mr. John Kensit. For many years he had been severely criticised in TRUTH on the ground of the indecency of many of his publications. I never concerned myself about his religious views. Whether a man is a Protestant, or a Roman Catholic, or a Mohammedan, or a Confucian is no affair of mine. But his manner of advocating his views may be; and in Mr. Kensit's case I always condemned the recourse he had to obscene libels on Roman Catholic institutions for the purpose of discrediting a religious creed and community of which he did not approve. Although I had more than once said that he had rendered himself liable to criminal prosecution, he took no notice of my remarks until it happened that he was involved in a libel action with another paper. The criticism of TRUTH having been repeated while this action was pending he, or his solicitors, alleged that this amounted, under the circumstances, to contempt of court. The Lord Chief Justice and two of his colleagues held that, under the circumstances, it was nothing of the kind, and adopted my view that Mr. Kensit was endeavouring to silence TRUTH by an indirect proceeding, when he had persistently refrained from answering directly. His abortive motion for contempt of court did his cause a great deal of harm, and I am glad it did, for whatever may have been the intrinsic merits of his cause, his method of advocating it was certainly immoral, and, I should hope, irreligious.

Another individual who has involved me in a vast amount of litigation during the last few years, though without ever bringing his grievances to trial, is Mr. F. W. Horner, late M.P. for North Lambeth. His case is so fresh in the public memory that it is scarcely necessary to do more than mention it. But I trust I may be forgiven for looking with pride on the part played by TRUTH in exposing and overthrowing him, for his career was nothing less than a national disgrace, using as he did his title of M.P. to perpetrate wholesale frauds on Continental bankers and hotel-keepers, who had up to that time treated membership of the British House of Commons as the hall-mark of perfect integrity and honour. His dealings with TRUTH were not the least remarkable feature in his career of imposture. When I first showed him up, at the end of 1902, I had against him a perfectly cast-iron case of swindling a banker at Marienbad by means of a worthless cheque. But he at once issued his writ, made a brave show of injured innocence, and kept me and the firm of Lewis and Lewis at arms' length for the best part of eight months, basing his defence on a cock-and-bull story that the fraud had really been perpetrated, not by him, but by some relative whom he desired to screen. He fought against the disclosure of the name of this relative with wonderful ingenuity and persistency, until the Court of Appeal ordered him to give it up or abandon the action, when he chose the latter alternative, and retired from the scene with a magnificent affectation that he was sacrificing himself heroically on the altar of friendship. What was not less remarkable, he immediately paid my costs, not by a cheque, but in hard cash. Thereupon I published particulars of a long series of frauds, similar to that at Marienbad, which he had perpetrated on Continental bankers and hotel-keepers. He talked of bringing another action, but did nothing. In October, 1905, I discovered that he had resumed these disgraceful practices, and gave some particulars of his recent doings, and once again he commenced an action for libel; and he managed to keep this action going until the last General Election, when he was ejected from Parliament, made bankrupt, and disappeared into obscurity, it is to be hoped for good. Considered merely as a Unionist M.P., his defeat at the election was not by itself a remarkable phenomenon; but the fact that he received the smallest number of votes recorded for any candidate in all the polls throughout the United Kingdom showed conclusively the opinion of his own constituents, regardless of party, upon his abuse of his Parliamentary position; and for this satisfactory result I claim the whole credit in the name of TRUTH.

As another example of the trouble and expense involved in tackling gentry of this kind, I may mention the case of a man named Cameron Hitch, who started a libel action about three years ago. Hitch was a shifty sort of adventurer, who, after being three times bankrupt, victimised a number of people by forming a "syndicate" for punting at Monte Carlo with an infallible system, and also by pretending to require capital for a club at Mentone. The man, in fact, had been engaged in a career of rascality which rendered it out of the question that he could ever show his face in court; but he issued a writ on the strength of warnings that were published in TRUTH against his advertisements, and kept the action going until the eve of trial, when he absconded, the fact being that he was then engaged in another swindle, and was "wanted" by the police. I take this opportunity of mentioning that if anybody knows his present whereabouts I shall be glad to have his address. For the satisfaction of ridding London of this undesirable I had to pay several hundred pounds in the shape of costs of preparing the case for trial, briefing counsel, and investigating the plaintiff's record. I suppose he thinks he had the best of it after all, and I am not sure but what he is right—so far as I am personally concerned.

One of the most remarkable stories that have ever been dealt with in TRUTH belongs to the period under notice. This is the story of Mr. Joshua Jones and the Mokau Estate in New Zealand. Unfortunately the last chapter of it has not yet been written, though I hope it may soon be. It would be impossible to tell the whole story here, but I cannot pass over my own share in it in reviewing the exploits of the past ten years. Mr. Jones came to London from New Zealand in 1893 for the purpose of realising an estate in New Zealand of some 50,000 acres, containing valuable coal and other mineral deposits. The estate was mortgaged for comparatively small amounts in the colony. The solicitor, the late Mr. Wickham Flower, whom Mr. Jones employed, managed to acquire the property in his own name at the sale under the mortgage in New Zealand, in conjunction with Mr. C. C. Hopkinson, then a banker in Regent-street, and, having acquired it, he called on Mr. Jones to redeem it from him within a stated period, and finally asserted his right to deal with it as he pleased. Mr. Jones was thus left helpless and penniless in London, and for five years he tried in vain every remedy open to him. At the end of that time a friend introduced him to me. The story was published in Truth, with the result that Mr. Hopkinson's firm suspended payment and Mr. Flower retired from his firm. Nothing more definite happened until an attempt was made by Messrs. Flower and Hopkinson to sell the Mokau property at the Mart. I then published an article warning intending purchasers of the doubtfulness of the title, and on this a Chancery action was commenced against me by Messrs. Flower and Hopkinson, and an application made to stop the sale of that issue of Truth, which the Court refused to do. The property was consequently withdrawn from sale. The action against Truth was at my instance transferred for trial to the King's Bench Division, but when the trial drew near it was abandoned, and my costs were paid. On the order of the present Lord Chief Justice, while holding for a short time the office of Master of the Rolls, the Incorporated Law Society at last held an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Flower. The Discipline Committee, while expressing a mild disapproval of his action, acquitted him of actual professional irregularity, but their report was taken before a Divisional Court, which found the solicitor guilty of unprofessional conduct, and ordered him to pay all the costs of the inquiry and the motion, amounting, I believe, to close on £2,000. So far as Truth was concerned, therefore, everything that had been said was conclusively vindicated, first by the abandonment of Mr. Flower's action, and secondly by the judgment of the Court against that gentleman; and so far as Truth was concerned the Mokau case ended there. None of these proceedings, unfortunately, sufficed to restore Mr. Jones to the possession of his property, but, as far as my knowledge goes, there is yet good hope that this result may be attained, Mr. Jones having subsequently brought an action which was settled on terms which gave him the right to be restored to possession on payment of an agreed amount within a certain time.

One abortive libel action recorded among my lawyers' bills is connected with the exposure of a series of frauds which attained considerable dimensions about four years ago, though they never came before the public except in the pages of Truth. The action in question was commenced by a man named Ashton. At one time he was in the bicycle trade, and engineered a small boom by means of trick advertisements. That business having fizzled out, he next turned up in connection with a widely advertised concern called the Armadale Company, in which he was associated with two brothers named Abraham. By means of seductive advertisements offering capital to business men in need of it, they induced people to entrust them with the conversion of their businesses into companies under agreements entitling the Armadale Company to considerable sums for preliminary expenses, which were payable whether the proposed companies were brought out or not. Needless to say, they never were, and tradesmen were victimised in shoals by this ingenious fraud. Exposure in Truth stopped the game, but Ashton and the Abrahams having parted company, the former started a new swindle of similar character on his own account, under the name of the Mercantile Syndicate, while the Abrahams tried their hands at another in the shape of a Tradesman's Legal Aid Society. Truth showed up Ashton once more, and he started an action for libel, which he kept on foot for a few months, in order to silence further criticism, but ultimately dropped it when it reached a stage likely to cost him money. The Mercantile Syndicate, by which people in all parts of the country had been swindled out of considerable sums, necessarily perished at the same time, and so did the Merchants' Legal Aid Society. In connection with these concerns, I made the acquaintance of a man named W. G. Smith, who had been associated in some way with the same parties, and claimed to have been the originator of the Legal Aid Society. He went down to Brighton, and there started a South Coast Tradesmen's Legal Aid Society. He was followed up by Truth, however, with the result that he was prosecuted by a tradesman from whom he had obtained goods on false pretences, and went to prison. After his release he speedily contrived to get back to the same place, and is still there. Thus all these closely allied swindles have one by one been rooted out.

Representative Gaol Birds.

The worthy Smith, just referred to, is one of a long list of evil-doers in whose case exposure in Truth has during the last ten years been followed by punishment of a still more unpleasant nature. I have traced no less than thirty of them, and probably there are many more whose fate has escaped my notice. When in 1897 I reviewed the work of "Twenty Years in Truth Office," I noted with pride among the rogues whom I had helped to bring to justice, the notorious "Wells of Monte Carlo," who had been sentenced to eight years' penal servitude for a series of frauds. by two alone of which he had netted £28,000. Towards the end of 1905 I discovered that another old acquaintance of mine was carrying on a system of wholesale swindling in London by means of a bogus "trawling syndicate," and on his being arrested it transpired that the partner in the business was none other than the ex-convict Wells, suitably disguised. Wells is now enjoying another three years' penal servitude. The other member of the "trawling syndicate" was the Rev. V. H. Moyle—an aged clergyman of the Church of England with a most extraordinary record. I first had the unpleasant duty of bringing the earlier part of it to the public notice in 1898, when the man was vicar of Ashampstead, in Berkshire. He had held that benefice for thirteen years, and during that time had been involved in a series of scandals, of which bankruptcy and imprisonment on a County Court committal order were not the worst. Finally, in defiance of the Bishop's admonition, he had deserted his parish for several months, making no provision for his duty, and leaving in his house, in the last extremity of neglect and want, a poor helpless old widow lady whom he had robbed of nearly everything she possessed. On the story being published in Truth, it came to my knowledge that in 1868, Moyle, being then vicar of a parish in Yorkshire, had been sentenced to seven years' penal servitude for forgery. The Bishop of Oxford

(Dr. Macharness) had sanctioned his presentation to Ashampstead in 1885 by way of giving him a chance of retrieving his character! After the Truth exposure in 1898-9, the then Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Stubbs) took proceedings under the Benefices Act, and Moyle was deprived of his living. When the Stamford-street "trawling syndicate" made itself conspicuous in 1905 I was at once able to identify him; and he was soon afterwards arrested in company with the more notorious Wells, and on conviction was sentenced to eighteen months' hard labour—a very lenient sentence. I regard these two men, Wells and Moyle, as two of the most audacious and incorrigible criminals that I have ever had through my hands.

On the list before me there is another man against whom I have a long and ugly dossier—like Moyle, a man who started with superior education and position—but as he has been released in the meantime, and may possibly have seen the error of his ways, I forbear from raking up his record now out of the files of Truth. Among the rest are representatives of all sorts and condition of rascality. Charity-mongering is represented by a man named Chubb-Jackson, who was hunted from place to place by the searchlight of Truth for years. He was one of those pestilent rogues who get hold of a few wretched, friendless children, and use them as the means of appealing to the public for subscriptions to a bogus "home." After playing this game in many places, he was ultimately prosecuted and sent to prison. Another detestable form of swindling is that perpetrated, generally at the expense of a class of people most deserving of sympathy, under the pretence of offering home employment. One of the most active representatives of this class, after incessant exposure in Truth under the names of "Paynter," "Smith," and other aliases, was ultimately prosecuted, and though he was unfortunately admitted to bail and took the opportunity of absconding, his business was effectually stopped. I wish I could say as much of a few more of the same class. Closely allied to them are the bogus employment agents and swindling registry offices for servants. Two acquaintances of this class are recorded on my list as having gone to prison. A different but highly profitable class of fraud is represented by a man named J. H. Johnson, who got fifteen months' hard labour in 1904, after I had been on his trail for several years. This man, a drunken, good-for-nothing scoundrel, had invented one swindle after another in the shape of associations for dealing with public evils or asserting public rights—"philosophical ideas," he facetiously called them when in the dock—and by means of them, and by fairly steady attention to the business of going about collecting subscriptions, he had earned a comfortable living for at least seven years. I think it must have been the periodical exposure of his doings in Truth which led him to give a new name to his "philosophical idea" about once in twelve months; anyhow, it was owing to a Truth paragraph about Johnson that a certain public-spirited peer who had given the man a subscription for an alleged ratepayers' association, was led to hand him over to the police and give the evidence necessary for his conviction. I specially refer to Johnson, because one of his most successful "philosophical ideas" was a society for the suppression of street noises, with which he collected any amount of money and duped, among others, the late Sir Walter Besant. No sooner was Johnson under lock and key than another philosopher of the same school—Mr. T. Bowden Green—pounced upon this derelict "idea," and soon got it into capital working order as the Betterment of London Association, which is still with us. But to return to our prisoners. There are still two whom I cannot pass over, both of them medical quacks, and long known to readers of Truth. The first is "Professor Richard," a Spanish-American impostor, who, after many years of impudent swindling in all parts of the world, and more than one experience of gaol, got a further sentence of twelve months' hard labour. The second is an equally notorious rascal of the same type, the "reverend" Mr. Hawkins, of Brighton, who has not yet completed his very easy sentence of three months' hard labour. So the list goes on down to the case of Mr. Bullard, the swindling scholastic agent, who was sentenced the other day to "twenty-one months' hard," as the immediate result of his exposure in Truth—in fact, I had the pleasure of getting together the evidence for his prosecution.

Legislative Achievements.

The records of the Law Courts, however, whether civil or criminal, touch but a small fraction of the work that is annually done by Truth in the way of exposing rascality, correcting abuses and scandals, and redressing injustice. I have had a list prepared of achievements under this head in the course of the last ten years only, and I find myself literally unable to deal with it, except generally, within the compass of a single article. There is no object in piling up a list of mere names when the circumstances have faded from the reader's memory; but I may pick out a few samples at random just to indicate the nature of the bulk. To begin with, there are the rapacious rascals of the usury trade, who are dealt with individually week by week in these columns. Apart from the public service that is done by putting people on their guard against these pests of society, I may say without exaggeration that the exposures of the trade in Truth, particularly in the case of the notorious Isaac Gordon, were a direct cause of the passing of the Moneylenders Act of 1900. The Act was founded on the recommendations of a Select Committee which sat in 1897 under the presidency of Mr. T. W. Russell, and some of the most instructive evidence laid before that Committee was obtained from Truth Office by Mr. Ascroft, one of the most active members of the Committee, who spent hours here studying the question. The Act is not perfect, as I have often had occasion to remark, but it has done an immense amount of good, and for its imperfections I am not responsible. I might add that it seems a rare thing for any solicitor to be retained on behalf of a moneylender's victim without coming to Truth for information and advice, and in this way I suppose that I have assisted to defeat the machinations of dozens of usurers in the Law Courts or outside since the Moneylenders Act was passed.

In passing I may remark that much the same thing might be said in regard to many obnoxious individuals besides moneylenders. A week rarely passes without bringing an inquiry from some solicitor on behalf of an injured client as to whether Truth knows anything of the wrong-doer, and the answer is more often in the affirmative than the negative. The mention of the Moneylenders Act reminds me of the service which Truth has more lately performed, so far as London is concerned, in connection with fraudulent employment agencies and registry offices. The repeated exposure of the mischief done by such concerns led the London County Council to promote a Bill bringing them all under its supervision. When this Bill was before a Parliamentary Committee one of my staff was called as a witness, and was able to furnish from the archives of Truth much valuable information as to the nature of the frauds prevalent. The Bill was passed, and all agencies and offices of this class are now subject to municipal supervision, as had been urged in Truth for years. This, of course, only applies to London, but it may be expected that provincial municipalities will all in course of time follow the example set by the L.C.C. I may here mention that besides two or three registry office keepers on my black list who have been convicted of fraud, Truth has also been instrumental within the last few years in putting a stop to a very delusive scheme for providing work for women, and in pricking a huge bubble with the magnificent title of the National Employment Agency, the promoter of which gave himself and his scheme away in an imprudent interview with the Editor of Truth.

Miscellaneous Exposures.

Turning to the sphere of charity and philanthropy, the sort of work that Truth is always doing may be illustrated by the case of the Royal Military Benevolent Fund, which a few years ago had fallen entirely into the hands of the lady who founded it, and had managed to convert it into a convenient means of providing herself and husband with board and lodging in a handsome mansion in Queen's Gate. The lady was ejected, and the charity restored to an efficient and useful condition in consequence of the exposure of these facts. I have also on my list the names of no less than five shady personages besides the above-mentioned Chubb-Jackson who have been hunted out of the "children's home" line of business through my humble exertions. That a good many more still remain in the trade is not my fault. There is an interesting record, too, of religious impostors whose pernicious operations Truth has done something to check. At the head of it stands the Rev. Otho Fitzmaurice, formerly Vicar of St. James's, Bolton, who deserves to be bracketed with Mr. Moyle, above-mentioned, as a representative clerical black sheep. He had been engaged for years in raising money fraudulently all over the kingdom by means of mendacious appeals on behalf of his parish and schools. After this had been demonstrated in Truth, the police took him in hand. He was sentenced to three months' imprisonment; incidentally amused himself, pending an appeal, with a motion to commit Mr. Labouchere for contempt of court, which came to nothing; and was eventually deprived of his benefice, and betook himself to America. Next to him on my list come the two bogus "ex-monks," Ruthven and Widdowes, and the more magnificent scoundrel, Edward Rufane Donkin, the prince of bogus bishops; but the latter is now no more, and I have no desire to revive the story of his career.

Among the innumerable products of sham-medical knavery which have been effectually dealt with (I have already referred to two of them) the most conspicuous is the Drouet Institute for the Deaf. Some seven or eight years ago this swindle had by unstinted advertising of the most mendacious character developed into one of the biggest things of its kind ever known. After a good deal of criticism, the proprietors were so ill-advised as to invite me to come and interview the staff and inspect the modus operandi of the Institute. The report of the interview, at which absurdly futile attempts were made to gammon the representatives of Truth, established conclusively the fraudulent character of the business. The principal proprietor, a clever but unscrupulous Frenchman, made desperate efforts to keep the thing on its legs, but it gradually went down hill, assisted by further exposures in Truth, and though I believe it is still in existence, it has for the last two or three years ceased to call for serious notice. Another field in which some useful work has been accomplished is in the exposure of the tricks of shady patent agents. This began with a huge "patent competition" promoted by a Mr. Rayner in 1898, and has been continued in many other cases, especially in connection with what has been described as the "patent editor trick," to which numbers of newspapers and magazines which ought to know better have stupidly lent themselves. I believe that this class of business, by which thousands of pounds have been extracted from inexperienced amateur "inventors," has been practically killed by the criticism of Truth. Perhaps the biggest question that Truth has tackled during the whole of these ten years is the delusive system of industrial insurance in connection with the tea trade, which became notorious through the phenomenal success of Nelson's Pension Tea. It will be remembered that I fought this question persistently for upwards of a year in 1904 and 1905, and if the Truth demonstration of the utter rottenness of the whole scheme could only have been brought home to the ignorant people at whose expense the business was run, the number of victims would have been materially reduced. But other papers advertised the scheme while I denounced it, and the promoters managed to defer the inevitable crash till they had made huge sums of money out of it, and all I can say is that every word of my criticism was justified by the result. Another rotten financial scheme which at one time threatened to grow to vast dimensions, with corresponding loss to the deluded people who put their money into it, was the National Old Age Pension Trust, promoted by a Mr. Taverner. Truth was not the only paper which exposed the folly of this scheme, but Truth was the only paper of which Taverner took any notice, and it was in consequence of his coming to this office to defend his scheme and the conclusive demonstration of incompetence which he then afforded, that proceedings were taken which resulted in the winding-up of the "Trust" by an order of the High Court.

"TRUTH" AND THE ARMY.

I find that this chapter of journalistic history is running to unconscionable length, and I must cut it short. I pass over, therefore, the case of Mr. Edalji, to which so much space was devoted in 1905, and in which the arguments of TRUTH induced the late Home Secretary to remit four years of the prisoner's sentence. I pass over, also, all that has been effected in the last ten years by exposures of abuses or injustice in the public service. But I must say a word or two as to certain practical results accomplished in connection with the Army. When first, towards the end of the 'eighties, the practice was first adopted of ventilating in these columns the grievances, individual or collective, of officers and men in the Army, there was a widespread conviction that TRUTH had become a more dangerous paper than ever before, and that military discipline was being sapped at its foundations. No such result has followed, and I believe the actual result has been the very opposite. For fifteen or twenty years past it has been a regular practice among soldiers of every rank, from generals down to drummer boys, to apply to the Editor of TRUTH whenever they have had anything to complain of. They have all had his respectful attention, and in the vast majority of cases they have secured the ventilation of their grievances. Occasionally the aggrieved party has himself proved to be in the wrong; but if I were to go into details and statistics, it would be very clearly seen that the percentage of cases in which TRUTH has not been right is even smaller in the case of military matters than in the civil proceedings that have been referred to above. On the other hand, a great many wrong things have been put right, and I am bound to say in this connection that so far as my experience goes, in no public department is there such a genuine desire to do the right thing as in the War Office. In many instances it is within my knowledge that officers with plenty of more important work to attend to have taken an immense amount of trouble to investigate comparatively small matters that have come to light in TRUTH. Not only in the cases of individuals has much good been effected in this way, but in questions affecting the welfare of the Service generally. Within the last ten or twelve years innumerable benefits have been conferred upon soldiers, and almost without exception they may be traced to suggestions or complaints first brought forward in these columns. I think, too, that the fact of the columns of TRUTH being open to all comers who have any genuine claim to a hearing has exercised a salutary effect upon persons of all ranks in authority throughout the Army. Certain it is that whereas ten or fifteen years ago I used to hear almost every week some moving tale of injustice committed either by an individual officer, or a court-martial, during the last few years such things have become rarer and rarer. Rightly or wrongly, I attribute this to the wholesome fear of publicity. I have never set up for an "Army reformer"; there are too many experts in that field already. But I cherish the belief that the Army is a much better managed institution in many respects to-day than it would have been if TRUTH had never taken its domestic affairs in hand.

I must now apologise for these reminiscences and moralisings. Probably they are more interesting to me than to the reader. But a man is entitled to congratulations on his birthday, and if no one else is likely to congratulate him, I do not know why he should not congratulate himself. I used to be told years ago by kind friends that TRUTH was going too strong, and would either have to bridle its tongue and restrict its energies, or would ultimately get into serious trouble and come to unutterable grief. The last fate has been escaped hitherto, but I have sometimes heard it said that TRUTH is not the paper it used to be, and that its readers no longer enjoy those wholesome exposures and scathing denunciations of evil-doers which they did of old. I suppose people who know little or nothing of the facts are apt to think that a paper which has been in existence for thirty years must necessarily be suffering from senile decay. I hardly think my regular readers will be under that delusion; but if anybody is, perhaps the foregoing recital of a few, and only a few, of the achievements of this aged journal in the last ten years of its existence—and a great part of it within the last four or five—will dispel such an idea. TRUTH has been more abused than any other paper ever published, and its Editor has never complained, for those who hit hard must expect to be hit back. But I doubt if any paper ever published could produce a better justification for its existence in the shape of practical results accomplished for the benefit of the community at large; and I am proud to think that at the end of thirty years the paper is more useful, more influential, and better appreciated by the public than it has ever been before. Now I have done patting myself on the back, and we will return to business for another ten years.

THE THEATRES.

THE PROGRAMME AT THE PALACE.

Looking in at the Palace the other evening, I came in for a feast of good things which did not overlap one another, but served the purpose of a variety entertainment by being really various.

Those who have not witnessed Mr. R. A. Roberts in his "story of quaint deception" should not miss seeing "Ringing the Changes." The little piece is the composition of this protean comedian, and if one do not pry into its mechanism over closely, it serves well enough as a peg for its author's changes of personality. An irresponsible solicitor with a tiresome old military uncle who has money and theories as to the correct behaviour of young men, though none as to his own; that old uncle himself; the barmaid suing the said uncle for breach of promise (I had to verify on the programme the denial of my eyes and ears that this could be so); an excitable Italian chef; a most familiar old housekeeper, who has a long monologue with the dummy figure made in the likeness of James Diddler, absent at Newmarket—these, and in addition a much-married cabdriver, a carter, and a typical sonorous actor of the old school, did Mr. Roberts exhibit in really admirable caricature, and with an economy of time in his changes of costume which amounted merely to walking out of one door and in at another.

Variety! That is the charm of the Palace, and one can pass from the delicate mental deliberations of the fair Trixie to the truly cyclonic dancing of the Molasso without any difficulty. This turn is really a remarkable acrobatic feat, and pleases one rather by the sense of difficulties overcome than with that of voluptuous movement. They dance with a hurricane at their heels, and are a notable quartet.

I have never seen Little Tich in more uproariously good form than he was the other evening. He is a comedian sui generis, and, whether as a park-keeper, as an officer who lived to fight another day, or a light-toed fairy of the ballet, matters not. He is always a living caricature of the conventions.

"The Treasure Ship in Fairy Seas," at the Hippodrome.

Here we are bidden to the deep seas, and may penetrate their secrets. With its stage at the back and its arena that can be flooded, the Hippodrome offers unique facilities for experiments in land and water. On this occasion the action begins with the diver's hut, and continues by way of the storm at sea to that moment when the ship sinks to the deeps from the aerial heights above our heads, at which it reposes during the early part of the performance. I am not quite sure which would be the best point of view to witness this complicated entertainment. Personally I was rather too near the gauzy curtain, which is dropped like an immense birdcage over the arena. Yet I enjoyed part of the adventures, and as much as any the grotesque divers in their helmets and the water sirens who court them. A beautiful background (or should it be backwater?) was afforded by the flying ballet of mermaids who have flown hither from Paris and Vienna; and the graceful evolutions of Miss Agnes Kellermann and the Misses Finney, champion lady swimmers of the world, also pleased me.

The chrono-megaphone gives an interesting exhibition of animated photography, and the remainder of the programme is filled largely with performing animals of various sorts, with the feats of jugglers and acrobats, and with the conjuring tricks of the clever Chung Ling Soo.

Hengler's.

The arena of Hengler's makes an altogether ideal place for the celebrated adventures of Red Riding Hood. This may sound hardly probable, but I maintain that to enjoy a fairy story you must work with your imagination as well as its author and as its contrivers, if it be a question of spectacle. Too much is often done for us by the stage carpenter and the painter of scenery, but this is not so at Hengler's, for behold Red Riding Hood walking with a delightful deliberation round and round her granny's house, which is placed in the very middle of the arena. But she has to start from home, so when the savage wolf has had time to arrange a very small bush in a flower-pot between himself and the red-hooded little one, she duly sets forth, scolded by her mother. Without making any more bones about it than the wolf professes to do of her, she advances to the flower-pot, and up jumps the wolf. Shrieks. Enter Prince Charming and chorus. A song from Prince Charming. Arena again darkened. Red Riding Hood again approaches the hut, and the wolf holds his immortal dialogue with her while we hold our breath. The fairy queen and her fairies have been walking round and round the arena for some time, so we know there is not much danger, but nevertheless it is exciting.

I have not space to enumerate all the many capital turns that filled the second part of the programme, such as the English football bulldog who pursues his ball with equal ardour in the stalls or in the arena, to the vociferous delight of the children. I think one reason why children love Hengler's is that the little boys can compare personal impressions with the clown, who is always walking about on his head or on his feet, and ready to converse with any one. They can also pat the ponies, as they trot round or dance round, and the little girls can enfold the tiny Maltese terrier in their arms before he runs back and shuts himself up in his basket and locks the door.

The Playhouse is the name selected by Mr. Cyril Maude for his new theatre, which will be opened on the 28th of this month. It rises upon the ashes of the old Avenue, and, like the phœnix, comes resplendent from the fire of adversity. Mr. Maude begins with "Toddles," an adaptation from the French, which will be played for the hundred and seventieth time on the opening night. I hope he will soon be walking into some good British comedy (for he is a charming comedian), and some day we may see him running a British farce, and even trying a flight at Shakespeare, that imperial bird.

* * * * *

Mention of Shakespeare reminds me that I have just been reading Count Tolstoi's violent attack on him of Avon in the Fortnightly Review. The septuagenarian Tolstoi is a kind of Nihilist or sham Buddhist. He dislikes action, unless directed in certain narrow channels. He dislikes, therefore, the world-wide outlook of Shakespeare, blaming the immorality of many of his heroes. He believes that the theatre should be devoted to religious teaching, and should shut its doors against the study of life for life's sake, as Shakespeare understood his art. The whole world would be about as cheerful a country as—Russia—if Count Tolstoi had his way. The attack, however, is interesting, as showing how far a remarkable mind such as that of the writer of "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina" can go off the lines when led by false ethical theory.

But, as the poet says, nothing makes people do more wrong things than religion wrongly conceived, and the Count finishes his article by condemning his own dramatic works of the past as well as those of a good many of his compatriots. He has a certain method in his reasoning.

* * * * *

"The Bondman," transferred from Drury Lane to the Adelphi last Saturday evening, bids fair to enjoy a prolonged lease of life. For there can be no doubt as to the popular verdict, if one is to judge by the applause of pit and gallery on the evening of the migration, and whatever may be one's opinion of Mr. Hall Caine as a writer of English, he has undeniably two qualities which stand him in good stead both as a novelist and as a writer for the stage. He has the power of constructing a plot and of telling a story in his own way, which way makes a direct appeal to the majority of readers and of those who witness his work for the stage. The changes in the cast are not numerous, apart from the absence of Mrs. Campbell and the playing of the part of Greeba by Miss Wynne-Matthison, which is no loss to the effectiveness of the whole performance. Mr. Hampden now plays Mr. Ainley's former part, and succeeds tolerably well as Michael.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE MOULIN ROUGE MARQUISE.

THE news is premature of the Historical Society having decided to thank the Marquise de Morny for having given Paris an approximate idea of the manners and morals of the Imperial Court to which she belongs by birth and up-bringing. Nor is it true that the Société de Blanqui mean to congratulate her on having avenged the victims of the Coup d'Etat by her appearance in "Rêve d'Egypte" at the Moulin Rouge, the fastest of our cafés-chantants. Not that she is not entitled to the warmest thanks of both bodies. The object lesson she gave, without meaning, possibly, to be a teacher, has done more to set the defunct Empire in an historically true light than all the volumes written against it, not excepting "Les Chatiments."

Mme. de Morny's appearance at the Moulin Rouge, and the police interdiction of the entertainment she prepared for that place of wild amusement, have been the events of the week. This lady is the youngest daughter of the late Duc and Duchesse de Morny, née Princess Troubetskoy, and was born in 1863 at the Petit Bourbon when her father filled the post of President of the Corps Législatif. On his death her mother moved with her four children, two sons and two daughters, to the sumptuous house in the Rue Panouse which he had prepared against the possible event of a rainy day. He left her and the quartet of little De Mornys a great fortune. She married, while still a young widow, the Duc de Sesto, Grand Chamberlain to Alfonso XII., as he had been to Queen Isabella, of whom he had been the favourite, against the competition of the Duchess of Alba and her sister, the Countess de Teba, who aspired to marry him before the Imperial crown came in the way. The eldest of the De Morny demoiselles, on growing up, married a great Spanish nobleman, and killed herself from excess in smoking cigarettes and calming her nerves with chloral. The eldest son, on growing up, had a taste for feminine belongings, and I remember him bringing down the house by wearing the tutu of a danseuse in a long-continued pas seul. The "house" was on this occasion composed of members of the Mirliton Club—hommes de l'Empire for the greater part—and their lady friends, and the stage that of the old Mirlitons Theatre in the Place Vendôme. Since he married the daughter of Gusman Blanco (at the time of the marriage ex-President of Venezula) we have not heard much about the eldest son. The second son, Sergius, the best of the family, has his father's passion for speculative ventures, without the hard, cold head and the cynical daring which enabled the latter to avoid ruinous scrapes and scandals. I saw Count Sergius on trial at the Palais de Justice on the charge of complicity in some too sharp practices. He struck me favourably in some respects, and appeared to me the dupe of a chevalier d'industrie, who might have found a match in Mme. Humbert. His judges had also this impression, and he got out of the mess, acquitted of fraudulent intent, but ruined in regard to fortune.

"Rêve d'Egypte" might have been Syrian or Assyrian in feeling. It needed no literary effort to produce it, only pantomimic and musical suggestion. An homme du monde composed the music which a Montmartrois feuilletonist described as enough to set all the felines of Nubia and those of the house-tops of Paris dancing. Society swallowed the newspaper réclames, which stated that the manager of the Moulin Rouge had agreed to pay the Marquise 1,500 francs a soirée, and Colette Willy 700 francs. Mme. de Morny had in the "Egyptian Dream" assigned to herself the rôle of a necromancer who revives a mummy of an Egyptian princess (Colette Willy). A Mlle. Dusson, who has rather special views of plastic art and of antique revivals, was to have the third rôle. Willy had, every one knew, taken steps to obtain a divorce. "Rêve d'Egypte" must ensure him a triumph in the divorce court. Willy is the best "card" going for a literary dinner. His chit-chat is dazzling, but not hurtful to the vanity of any confrère at table; he contrives to be so thoroughly bon garçon, apparently innocent of any wish to shine. As a writer he is nothing less than delicious—très lettré, natural as Nature herself when she covers mother earth with wild flowers. He plays with difficulties in turning out comedies, and excels in lending an iridescent glow to falsities. He discovered Polaire, and he threw a gauze of charming sentiment over the play, adapted from a very spiteful novel by Gyp, in which she made her first great hit. Mme. Colette Willy prepared for her début at Montmartre—with a host of boulevard writers behind her—by appearing at the Théâtre du Parc, Brussels, as Paninka in Lerberghe's "Pan." Her appearance there followed an altercation with the head of the Brussels police about the costume.

As much as 160 francs in advance was paid for box places at the Moulin Rouge to witness the first appearance there of the Marquise de Morny, Colette Willy, and Mlle. Dusson, who is aged seventeen. Her part was to help to unswathe the mummy which in its bandages became once more the delightful priestess of Isis and the princess of 3,000 years ago—a lithe, gracile creature, serpentine in its motions as the bandages fall away, and the very incarnation of at least one of the deadly sins. Gaillard, the Director of the Opera, had left "Ariane" to her fate to witness this début, Capus had come up from Touraine, Bataille from his château near Alençon, Jaluzot sought in a stall to forget his commercial mishaps, Henri Rochefort to find matter for a newspaper article red-hot with cayenne pepper, and the author, delightful "Claudine" Willy, had an avant scène which he shared with Meg and some members of his dîner club. The different cercles sent their contingents, which came prepared to make a row and to drive from the Moulin Rouge the daughter of the prime artificer of the Coup d'Etat. It has been the fashion latterly to idealise the Second Empire, its balloon petticoats and pegtop trousers. The Marquise de Morny threw on the survival of it that lives in herself a too fierce light. Hence the rage of ces beaux messieurs. Some of them may have wished to avenge outraged decency and morality, but there was more Tartufferie than virtue in their indignation.

I suppose that M. Lépine could not help putting a stop to the "Egyptian Dream." But from the historical standpoint it is a pity that he did. The cocodettes of the Second Empire were formed of the same clay and animated with exactly the same spirit as the Marquise de Morny. They had a foreign ambassadress in their midst who could have surpassed Colette Willy in her genre—and stage impudence. Mme. de Morny is one of those ladies who value the liberty of the ground floor. One can leave and re-enter one's ground-floor abode without troubling the nocturnal slumbers of the concierge simply by using a window as a street door. She was divorced young, got entangled in many scrapes, and was placed by her family under a conseil judiciare. An avoué paid the rent of her apartment in a handsome house close to the Musée des Religions, where I dare say she picked up the idea of her pantomime. She had also the use of an Italian villa in the Commune of St. Leonard, Les Bergeronettes, with poetic grounds bounded by the fast-flowing and fairly deep and wide Nonette, a stream dear to anglers. Her allowance in money was 5,000 fr., or in English, £200. Last year she was allowed to have the full enjoyment of her fortune, and was thus enabled to make good to some extent losses members of her family had sustained through the disturbed state of Venezuela. She still keeps up and passes her summers at Les Bergeronettes, so called from the quantities of song birds in the grounds and the forest beyond the Nonette. It is an Eden into which spirits masculine are rarely admitted. The architect, the gardeners, the man who bedded down the horses, and a costumier had glimpses of this Paradise of theatrical friends of the Marquise, divettes of opéra comique, bouffe operetta, and actresses, some talented and others only remarkable for their plastic points. The Marquise drove them about the country when they were with her on holiday visits, she holding the ribbons. She generally takes them out in an elegant wagonette and pair, smoking cigarettes as she drives, and wearing a velvet jacket and trousers not less tight than those of an Italian infantry soldier. This was also her studio costume, for she paints. It was meant to be masculine, but looked a third sex arrangement, and it gave her a droll appearance whenever she jumped down from the driver's seat. She has a plump but not exactly a fat figure, little plump feet and hands, wears high heels, and has her very fair hair tucked under a jaunty little hat. The profile is also extremely fair, with a song-bird outline. The face is paradoxical, in looking at once young and old, in being enigmatic and yet having in it something frank. It at once impresses one as the face of some mild chirruping creature, and one whose lot has been one of profound sadness. You might travel all Europe over without finding a similar countenance. Sometimes it presents a flickering likeness to the Comtesse de Paris, and not without a traceable cause. The Comtesse and the Marquise are both descended through ancestresses from Louis XV.

The peasants in the vicinity of Les Bergeronettes take philosophically the eccentricities of Mme. de Morny. "Dame! Why should we peer into her private life? Have we any right to stick our noses into her affairs? They eat a lot of our cherries, strawberries, and vegetables at her villa. Nobody pays good prices for them so ungrudgingly. Who else among the rich people of the country is kinder to the poor? She sends to the curé more brioche than anyone else, to be distributed as blessed bread on Sundays. She may have queer ideas, but what call have we to set them right? Well, then!" This reasoning in a country where the Maries of Magdala and Egypt are held to be great saints is very natural.

The storm that burst over the Moulin Rouge may have been got up. It may be the prelude to another suit to place the Marquise a second time under a conseil judiciare. Why Willy was threatened and assaulted passes my understanding. "He offended good taste in going to see his wife in the horrible 'Egyptian Dream,'" I hear. That will not do. One does not look for good taste at the Moulin Rouge, and he repudiated Colette directly she published her determination to co-operate in Mme. de Morny's pantomime. A suit for divorce immediately followed up his repudiation. Mlle. Noilhan, daughter of the Secretary-General of the Patrie Française, showed herself the most furious of the furies alike against the Marquise, Colette, and Willy. Was this because his scepticism prevented him seeing in the late M. Syveton the arch-angelic being which he appeared to the imagination of Mme. Lebaudy?

M. Caillaux is scarcely happy in his financial ideas. If he taxes titles at all he should do so heavily. What is a 3,000-fr. succession duty once and for all on ducal strawberry leaves? Just enough to irritate, and to bring no grist worth talking about to the treasury mill. A supporter of the government to whom I aired this opinion said: "That is so, but how prevent people bearing it?" Easily enough, it seems to me. Why not forbid the insertion of all untaxed titles in law papers, newspapers, or letters to be delivered by the Post Office to their bearers? This would not be more inquisitorial than the means taken in free England to ascertain the exact amount of income of any one suspected of wanting to hoodwink the Inland Revenue Department. Annuaires might be published and supplied to the Post Office and to fiscal officers, giving the names and titles of those who had conformed with the law. They might even be supplied gratis to the latter, as are the annuaires téléphoniques. Shopkeepers would be glad to buy them. These publications would have reference merely to the fiscal side of the matter. The self-ennobled ought to stand in its columns on precisely the same footing as those setting up to have titled ancestors. For every person who now airs some nobiliary distinction I am sure we should have many dozens all agog to see their names in this annuaire.

Dr. Jean Charcot, son of the late eminent Dr. Charcot, and half-brother of Mme. Waldeck-Rousseau, fell in love on his return from his voyage of Antarctic exploration with Mlle. Meg Cléry and is now engaged to her. She is the daughter of the late M. Cléry, the witty and able advocate, and a niece-in-law of the late M. Gérome, the painter and sculptor. Look on her as one may, one sees in her an exceptional person. The features are shapely and well proportioned without approaching the classical type. The expression is agreeable and indicative of a smooth temper and an open, well-poised mind and amiable disposition. The manners are natural and easy. Were she forty instead of twenty she could not be more mistress of herself or know her own mind better. There is something reposeful in her which is very pleasing. Her father gave her every educational advantage, and she was brought up in one of the most artistic connections (and in the best sense of the term) that Paris could afford. Goupil, the picture gallery proprietor and art publisher, is her grandfather. The honeymoon, at her desire, is to be spent in the Savoy and Piedmont higher Alps as a preparation to the Antarctic expedition to which her future husband is this year to treat her. Mlle. Cléry accompanied her father in his annual visits to Venice, where he had a palazzo, and to Cairo, where he had a villa and a large legal practice. She has studied antiquity without knowing that she did so under his guidance, and the different schools of Italian painting.

Mlle. Cléry must be wealthy. But without any fortune, and unsupported by powerful connections, she would not fail, through the force of her remarkable individuality, and without giving umbrage to any, to rise to a first place.

I first met Dr. Jean Charcot at the Ministry of the Interior, when he was the husband of Mme. Jeanne Hugo, and seemingly as happy in her society as she appeared to be in his. She looked an amiable Juno, and so like Mme. Victor Hugo, her grandmother. Like his father, he strikingly resembled Napoleon, but had a bright and gay temper, and lost no time in vain ceremony, but at once broke ice.

The Bill to tax patent medicines is a subject of keen controversy. The vendors of these preparations have found unexpected allies in the press, and after reading certain articles one might well think that public feeling is hostile to the proposal, whereas it is probably the other way about. I have used the expression "patent medicines" rather loosely, as the nearest popular English equivalent for the French term spécialités pharmaceutiques. The Bill contemplates taxing them to the extent of 10 per cent. on the selling price. It has been carried through the Chamber of Deputies, and I have no doubt it will go through the Senate, notwithstanding the opposition of the vendors, whose allies, inside and outside the Chambers, are full of fight. The debate revealed some startling figures. A certain pill brings its vendor £24,000 a year, a tar capsule £32,000, a preparation called "phosphatine" brings a profit of £48,000 a year. I have no doubt that much larger figures could be quoted in England, the English nation being even more "physic-struck" than the French, and advertising being an older science.

I was interested in knowing the opinion of my chemist on the proposed tax. He is a graduate of the Paris School of Pharmacy, and is, as I consider, one of the best-informed chemists of Paris. What would be the effect of the tax on the public? He told me the public would pay the whole of it, because the vendors of patent medicines, who have formed a sort of trust, have just decided that way. They are the absolute masters of the situation in France, chemists, on account of extreme competition, being disunited. "When a customer asks me for a box of phosphatine and hands me 1 fr. 75 centimes, I say, 'Thank you,' because I am polite, but I would sooner do without his custom, and I send every halfpenny to the maker; but when he takes from me a pennyworth of dried violets, I rejoice on a profitable transaction." He went on to say that in a few years, after the number of chemists had become much reduced, it would be their turn to combine, and then they would refuse to sell specialties—which, by the way, are illegal in France, being merely tolerated.

No profession has become so overcrowded as that of chemist in France. This was a consequence of the inequalities of military service. Holders of certain degrees served but one year instead of three. One of the greatest evils of conscription was its inequality—three years for the masses, one year for the classes. Everybody sees it and admits it now that service has been made two years for everybody. The effect of the former inequality was to force into the scientific and liberal professions young men who ought to have been at the counter—or behind it. One result is that the bulk of chemists in France (Paris being, of course, excepted) are on the verge of starvation. In former years the Paris School of Pharmacy received 300 new students every year. Last year the number dropped to fifty. And this year, guess how many students joined that great school. Two. This is but one instance of the terrible effect of the past unequal military service on the distribution of professions in the country.

I showed my chemist the figures quoted in the Chamber of Deputies. He said they were correct. Talking of tar, he told me why certain famous tar capsules really do relieve coughs. The gelatine of the capsules contains opium. This is the real remedy, the tar is just a "moral remedy."

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE English have all a Tory on the shoulders, dear Lady Betty; the past restrains and oppresses us in every direction. Some call that prudence, others prejudice; it is absence of enterprise.

. . . . .

It is a New World, and there is a New England; the latter will prosper when there are the New English.

. . . . .

For the moment, we are in the grip of the alien who is new, whilst we dread to detach ourselves from the old.

It is the wisdom of our descendants that is necessary.

"Frame-Women" is an expression which should obtain a hold on the public of the moment. It appears that the halo-like arrangement which decorates the women of the time is formed by wrapping the hair round a "frame"! How much more of their general appearance is created by "frame" contrivances? The ordinary man is necessarily ignorant of the secrets of the modern woman's surface composition, and this circumstance has produced a new industry which is described in the following letter:—

"310, Maddox-street, London, W.

"SIR,—Woman is an expert in marrying; man is not. I propose to enlighten him. For that purpose I have founded 'The Bachelors' Information Bureau' at this address, and I should be much obliged to you if you would announce this circumstance in your 'Letter' in next week's issue of TRUTH.

"Having an exceptionally large and varied circle of acquaintances, both in London and the provinces, I have also secured the services of a well-chosen staff of women, whose advantages in this direction are almost on a level with my own. So well organised is the system that there is scarcely an unmarried woman of the prosperous classes in England with whom some member of my staff is not intimately acquainted. Should a bachelor apply to this office, on payment of £5 5s. he will receive accurate information as to how much of the lady of his choice is natural and how much is artificial.

"I feel sure that you will perceive at once the importance of the services which it is the object of 'The Bachelors' Information Bureau' to render, and will, therefore, lend us your valuable support.—Faithfully yours, "(Mrs.) ADELIZA TREWBODY."

Amateur-marrying is a survival of the primitive ages; it must be replaced in the immediate future by municipal marriage—the control of these contracts must be entrusted to the County Council. Jack and Jill married because they temporarily, and without sufficient information, approved of each other, and had the opportunity of being bound together. Of those proceedings innumerable misfortunes have arisen from time immemorial. Marrying is a science; its principles should be clearly defined, and alliances should not be permitted to be contracted in defiance of them, both in the interests of the individual and of the community. There are, for instance, characteristics that do not blend; it is to be hoped that "The Bachelors' Information Bureau" will supply information in this direction which will enable its clients to avoid terrible mistakes of the sort, for women generally conceal matters of the kind until it is too late for the ordinary man to escape. "Love is blind" is the old-world formula; many modern men have, too late, discovered that the more accurate rendering should be "Love is a blind."

* * * * *

Was Edmund Spenser an advocate in advance of the Suffragette cause? It is curious that the following lines in "The Faërie Queen" should have escaped the memory of the supporters of this movement:—

"Here have I cause in men just blame to find,
That in their proper praise too partial be,
And not impartial to woman-kind.

. . . . .

"But by recórd of ántique times I find
That women wont in wars to bear most sway,
And to all great exploits themselves inclin'd,
Of which they still the garland bore away;
Till envious men, fearing their rule's decay,
'Gan coin strict laws to curb their liberty:
Yet, since they warlike arms have laid away,
They have excelled in arts and policy,
That now we foolish men who praise 'gin also (eke)
t' envy."

There are now Treasure Ships; there are also Treasure Friendships! It is not possible for ordinary men and women to equip a vessel, and travel in her to some distant shore to dredge for specie. It is comparatively easy, however, to endeavour to extract valuable material of one kind or another from the rich men and women amongst us. There are few wealthy persons in the kingdom that have not some dozens of enterprising "treasure-seekers" industriously endeavouring to extract money or gifts from them! The millionaires who are "sunk" in Park-lane might be represented in a picture with thousands of little "society" craft moored above them, each of the latter lowering at intervals into these Treasure Ships a diving Duchess or some lesser social worker!

Nevertheless, in almost every novel, periodical, or newspaper, is to be found abuse of the millionaires, and descriptions of the injuries they have done or are doing to "society." It is peculiarly inconsistent to abuse them, as is generally done here, and lose no opportunity of associating with them and acquiring their friendship. There is a broad, bold streak of inconsistency that runs throughout the British character!—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

SOME of the sporting papers are urging either that the Totaliser shall be introduced on English racecourses, or that bookmakers should be licensed, and it is pointed out that either "reform" would provide the Jockey Club with a reserve fund. The moon will fall before Parliament favours any legislation which will facilitate popular betting, and the idea of a Government control of Turf speculation is the wildest chimera ever hatched in the brain of a Bedlamite. The Stewards of the Jockey Club are not likely to meddle with such matters, either directly or indirectly, as any such steps as have been recommended by their harebrained advisers in the press would lead them into collision with Parliament, and it would be a case of the earthen pot and the brazen vessel, for the Club would then come to direful and irreparable smash.

The King has at the present time twenty-four horses in training at Newmarket, thirteen of which are two-year-olds. Of the older horses the dark three-year-old Perambulator is the most promising, but most of the others might advantageously have been weeded out of the Royal stud, as they are never at all likely to distinguish themselves when running in tolerably good company. It is a great mistake to keep bad horses in training, and such sagacious and successful owners as the late Duke of Westminster and the late Lord Falmouth invariably got rid of animals which were not up to a certain standard of form. Now, however, one sees many owners who are content to go on paying training and racing expenses for beasts which never by any chance win a race. His Majesty's two-year-olds include Peredore, own brother to Zinfandel; Maid of Norway, filly by St. Simon out of Nunsuch (dam of Nulli Secundus); Lady Wayward, filly by Ladas out of Vane (own sister to Flying Fox); Simpatica, own sister to Slim Lad; Golden Amber, filly by Diamond Jubilee out of Ambleside; Verrier, colt by Persimmon out of Amphora; Perspective, own brother to Perambulator; and Perdrigon, own sister to Mead and Chatsworth. His Majesty's colours are not likely to be seen out before the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, when Slim Lad has a chance of retrieving his reputation in the Hastings Plate, a race in which he will have the benefit of a maiden allowance of 7 lbs. Perambulator may make his début in the Two Thousand, but if this colt does turn out to be a racer of good class he will stand an excellent chance of winning the Newmarket Stakes at the Second Spring Meeting, as none of the flyers of last season are engaged in this race. It may be hoped that the King will have a two-year-old capable of winning either the Coventry Stakes or the New Stakes at Ascot, as his Majesty has subscribed most generously to those races (and to many other events at Ascot) for several seasons past, and it is certainly his turn to carry off either the one or the other of them again.

His Majesty's racehorses have now been doing very badly for six seasons, but he is not the only owner of a fine stud which has failed to turn out winners, as the Dukes of Portland and Westminster have also been exceedingly unfortunate. Troutbeck is the first animal out of the Eaton stud which has won a great race for its breeder since the death of the late Duke of Westminster. The King's racehorses must have cost him a large sum during the past year, as most of them were very heavily engaged, and the forfeit account alone must have run into thousands of pounds. However, the breeding stud will have paid for the horses in training, with a considerable balance over, as Persimmon, Diamond Jubilee, and Florizel II. all had full subscriptions, and the fee of each horse was 300 gs. There was no use keeping three sires which are own brothers, so the sale of Diamond Jubilee was a most judicious step, and the price of 30,000 gs. certainly represented fully double his intrinsic value.

When Andover won the Royal Hunt Cup in 1905, the favourite was Sir Daniel (three years, 6 st. 8 lb.), who started at 9 to 4 in a field of twenty-five. Sir Daniel did not finish in the first three, and he was afterwards beaten three times during that season. He was sold to go to South Africa, and the other day he won a valuable race, the Johannesburg Handicap. His legion of backers at Ascot must feel considerably exasperated by this news, for most of those who lost their money over this animal in the Hunt Cup again "went for" him two days later, when he started second favourite (price 9 to 2) in a field of fourteen for the Wokingham Handicap, and was again well beaten.

An evening paper announced the other day that Troutbeck has been turned out of training, so he will not be seen again on a racecourse. This is a pure fiction, for Troutbeck is to undergo a special preparation for the Ascot Cup, a race which the Duke of Westminster is very anxious to win. This horse is believed to be a really good stayer. A deplorable blunder was committed when Troutbeck was so prematurely withdrawn from the Eclipse Stakes, for he would have held all the older horses safe, and the best of the three-year-olds will be needing a rest by the middle of July.

It is a curious and melancholy fact that the winners of the classic races of 1905 all failed ignominiously at four years old. Cherry Lass could not be trained again, Cicero collapsed miserably in the Ascot Cup, when he ran his last race, Challacombe started once, and then finished last of three, although running in moderate company. As to Vedas, who was proclaimed to be a racer of the highest class after his victory in the Two Thousand, all he could achieve last season was to win a couple of paltry £100 plates.

Roseate Dawn will win the first hurdle race for which he starts. I hear that this horse has turned out a very fine jumper. He will probably also win a good handicap during the spring.

Lord Cadogan has ten horses in training at Newmarket, seven of which are two-year olds. The Sun, three years, by Sidus out of La Figlia, may win some good races next season if he is judiciously placed. Of the two-year-olds, three are sired by Sidus, one being an own sister to The Sun. There is a colt by St. Frusquin out of Star of Fortune.

Lord Londonderry has only five racehorses this season, one of them being Pearmain, half-sister, by Persimmon, to his Majesty's colt Cynosure, of whom great things were expected in May last, but he grievously disappointed his stable, and has never yet won a race. Lord Harewood has seven horses in training, but the four older ones are not of much account, not being above second-class handicap form. The two-year-olds are all sired by Minstead, who was a smart horse, and he would probably have won some of the great races of his year if he had kept all right.

There is a splendid entry for the Ascot Cup, no fewer than fifty horses having been engaged, as against thirty-four last year, and twenty-five in 1905. There are thirteen French horses, including Mr. Vanderbilt's Maintenon, who has never been beaten since he finished second to Spearmint for the Grand Prix de Paris, and it now appears impossible that he can have shown his true form in that race. He is a genuine stayer. The only French three-year-old is M. A. Aumont's Calomel, who was one of their best two-year-olds last season. Calomel, however, is scarcely likely to start for the Gold Cup, as he is engaged in the Grand Prix, which race is run this year on the Sunday in Ascot week. The Cup is really and truly an "International" race this season, for the Russian four-year-old Hammurabi and the Hungarian four-year-old Morpeth II are both entered. Mr. Bass has engaged Sancy and Gold Riach, and it was fully expected by the stable that the horse would have won the St. Leger if all had gone well with him. Sir E. Cassel has entered Killeagh. Lord Derby has Keystone II. and Bridge of Canny. Mr. Hill has engaged Mintagon, winner of the Cesarewitch, who will find himself hopelessly outclassed in this race. Mrs. Jackson has entered Velocity, and it will be interesting to see how this horse gets on over a Cup course. Mr. S. Joel has, of course, engaged Polymelus, and it is expected that next season this horse will discover himself to be a good stayer, but I shall be surprised if he does well over this severe course. Colonel Kirkwood has, of course, entered The White Knight, who may be trusted to stay the distance, which is more than can be said of many in the entry. Major Loder has Spearmint and Hammerkop, and if the Derby winner can be got to the post it will no doubt be the business of the mare to make running for him. I do not believe, however, there is the most remote chance of Spearmint getting through a preparation for such a race as the Ascot Cup. Sagamore has been entered, and I presume that Mr. Raphael is of the opinion that this colt will show his best form over a distance of ground, as he has not been engaged in the Coronation Cup at Epsom. I expect that in due time we shall find Sagamore entered for the Gold Vase, and that the colt will be reserved for these two events at Ascot. One of the French lot is Storm, who failed ignominiously in his English engagements last season. Llangibby is not likely to stand training again, but he has been entered for the Cup, presumably on the off-chance. Lord Rosebery has entered Ramrod and Bezonian, and one would have thought that the three-year-old already had a sufficient number of engagements next season. Mr. J. de Rothschild's Beppo can stay well, and he will be one of the best of the English lot for this race. Mr. L. de Rothschild's Radium is confidently expected to win some good races next season, but I shall be vastly surprised if this horse is up to Ascot Cup form. Challacombe is not likely to be dangerous, but I cannot understand why this horse has not been entered for the Alexandra Plate, as he escapes a penalty in that race, and it is a very much easier event to win than the Gold Cup. Mr. W. Hall Walker has Black Arrow and Polar Star, but I shall be surprised if either of these animals is included in the field. Troutbeck is, of course, engaged, and Lord Wolverton has entered the three-year-old Prince of Orange. There is a great deal of absolute rubbish in the entry.

As to the Alexandra Plate, none of the cracks of the Gold Cup entry have been engaged, the most notable names among the thirty-five horses in that event being Radium, Beppo, and Velocity. Roseate Dawn is entered, and Lord Derby is represented by Gourd, and Major Loder by Hammerkop, who won this race in 1905.

There are thirty-two entries for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, the most notable names being Spearmint, Troutbeck, Black Arrow, Polar Star, Polymelus, Keystone II., Hammurabi, Velocity, The White Knight, Beppo, Radium, and Challacombe. I expect we shall find Polar Star among the starters for this race, and the meeting of this colt (over the Derby course) with Keystone II., Troutbeck, Polymelus, Velocity, and The White Knight would be most interesting. It is very strange that Sagamore should have been left out of the entry for the Coronation Cup.

Forty-five horses have been entered for the Lincolnshire Handicap, as against fifty last year, and fifty-one in 1905. The race will be run on Tuesday, March 19, a week earlier than usual. Ob, who won last year, has been engaged, and M. Euphrussi has a second candidate in Champ d'Or, who disappointed his owner at Kempton Park. Dean Swift, Roseate Dawn, Polymelus, Picton, Kaffir Chief, Velocity, Prince William, Earla Mor, Athi, His Eminence, Certosa, Catty Crag, and Sarcelle are the most notable names in the list, one striking feature being the absence of three-year-olds, of which there are only two—Fra Diavolo and Saxham. It will be interesting to see how Polymelus is handicapped with Velocity.

It is amazing that so valuable a handicap as the Queen's Prize at Kempton Park (run on Easter Monday) should have obtained only thirty-five entries, as the race is worth £1,000, with a minor forfeit of only £3. The most notable names in the list are Bridge of Canny, Radium, Gourd, Roseate Dawn, and Achilles.

The City and Suburban has done very badly, there being only forty-three entries, as compared with sixty-three last year, and fifty-five in 1905. This is a grievous and inexplicable failure, considering that the handicap is worth £2,000, with a minor forfeit of only £3. However, the class of the entry is fairly good, the list of older horses engaged including Polymelus, Ramrod, Ob, Champ d'Or, Achilles, Velocity, His Eminence, Gold Riach, Roseate Dawn, Dean Swift (who won last year), Prince William, and Ulalume. There are only six three-year-olds, the best of them being Prince of Orange.

The entry for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap of £3,000 (run May 11) has fallen from forty-six in 1905 and forty-four last year to forty. This race would probably do better if the date of closing the entries could be altered. It should be deferred until the middle of March. The class of the entry is very much the best of all the spring handicaps, as it includes Keystone II., Polymelus, Velocity, Polar Star, Gingal, Black Arrow, Malua, Sagamore, Ramrod, Orwell, Song Thrush, Hammurabi, Dean Swift, and Meadow Rue. Of last year's disappointments, Lally has not been entered for any of the handicaps, but the name of Malua appears in the Kempton Jubilee list. It is confidently expected that this horse will win a good handicap next season.

The weights for all these handicaps are to be published on the 24th, but the managers of the Kempton Park meeting would have been better advised if they had kept the weights for the Jubilee Handicap back until after the Liverpool Spring Meeting. It would have been quite early enough to have published these weights on March 28.

Ambition has been a strong tip for whichever of the spring handicaps he might go for, but this horse's name is not to be found in any of the lists. The name of Rocketter is also missing. Admirable Crichton is another animal which was jabbered about some time ago as likely to win a handicap during the early part of the season.

It is really amazing to look back upon the official Free Handicaps of the two-year-olds of 1905, in which Keystone II. was regarded as being unworthy to be included. Lally was top weight, and was estimated to be 15 lb. superior to Spearmint, who was placed on an equality with Picton. Flair, who was really the best three-year-old of 1906, was placed 11 lb. below Lally, which meant that (including the sex allowance) she was regarded as being a stone below that flagrant impostor. I never could believe in the superlative merits of Lally, and repeatedly expressed the opinion that his form had been preposterously overrated, at a time when he was being extolled to the skies. Gorgos, winner of the Two Thousand, was placed 29 lb. below Lally, who was estimated to be 34 lb. superior to Bridge of Canny. Troutbeck was also regarded with the extremest contempt.

Lord Falmouth's dark colt, St. Martin, own brother to Quintessence, is said to be progressing most favourably. He is very good-looking and racing-like, and most beautifully bred. Everyone would be pleased to see Lord Falmouth's very popular colours successful in the Derby. St. Martin is engaged in the Two Thousand, but I am told that if all goes well with him he is to make his début in the Newmarket Biennial, a race which he will win easily if he has any real pretensions to "classic" form, as he will be receiving weight from My Pet II. (who is not likely to start for this race), and from Weathercock, and Simon Square. St. Martin missed engagements at Ascot, Goodwood, Derby, and Doncaster last season owing to the hard ground, and when at last he was intended to start at the Newmarket First October Meeting for the rich Buckenham Post Stakes, he was withdrawn at the very last moment in consequence of the death of Lord Falmouth's sister. But for this event it is probable that St. Martin would have won both the Buckenham Stakes and the Rous Memorial Stakes.

Last Saturday the Frenchmen played their first Rugby football international match against England in this country. England won the first match of the series, which was played last year in Paris. Before many years are past I quite expect to see the Frenchmen meeting Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. The match at Richmond was a great success. Those who expected to see bumble-puppy and amusing incidents were mistaken in their anticipations. Early in the game Lee was hurt. He was playing full back. After twenty-five minutes' play he had to retire. He had broken a rib. Before half-time the Frenchmen had equalised England's score. They had put on a couple of goals and a penalty goal. England could not afford to play without a full back. Hill, the English captain, took Mills out of the pack and put him full back after the interval. He ought to have done so before. Personally, I was glad that he made this mistake. It showed that the Frenchmen were not to be trifled with. They took full advantage of a big blunder, and Maclos' place-kicking was splendid. In the second half things went well for England. The French forwards failed to stay, and all through the game they failed to combine. They were too individualistic in their work. That was where their fatal weakness lay. Isaac made a splendid full back, and he was carried off the field shoulder high at the finish. Truly, Rugby football has been planted on good soil in France, and I have no doubt that it will flourish exceedingly.

Under Association rules there were some remarkable results. In the First Division Woolwich Arsenal were beaten quite unexpectedly by Middlesbrough by five goals to three. The reason was that the veteran Bloomer was playing as well as he had ever done. He scored four goals himself, and gave the final pass for the fifth. In the Second Division Chelsea scored a win and are at the top of the list. They had a very good Saturday, as Leicester Fosse, Notts Forest, and West Bromwich Albion, who are nearest them in the table, all suffered defeat. With any luck they ought to be certain of going up into the First Division. Most of their dangerous engagements away from home have been played. They have a large number of home fixtures to come, and, with promotion in prospect, they should mean big takings at the gate. In addition, they are not only leading by two clear points, but they have a match in hand over West Bromwich and Leicester Fosse, who are next on the list. In the Southern League Portsmouth went top of the tree, and so far as one can judge they are pretty likely to stay there. Millwall seem suddenly to have struck a scoring vein. They romped over Watford by ten goals to one.

The amateur clubs, the Corinthians and Casuals, went North on a Christmas tour. The Corinthians were not at full strength, and they won one match, drew two, and lost two. They scored nine goals, and had the same number scored against them. The Casuals had not such a strong card, and they did very well, winning four matches, drawing three, and losing one.

While congratulating Cardiff on their brilliant success against the South African footballers, I cannot help feeling a suspicion of regret that our visitors were not successful. To have gone through a tour of twenty-eight matches with one match drawn and only a couple of defeats is something of which they may well be proud. At the same time, the success of Cardiff indicates to many the desirability of there being more club matches in a visiting team's programme. The counties are but scratch teams, and so, as far as that goes, are international teams. At the same time, I cannot help feeling that both the New Zealand and South African teams have done a good deal to improve the condition of county football, and by such matches good players are taught to get together when playing with one another on only few occasions. The South Africans leave behind no record of slim tactics or wily strategy, They have shown that a team that plays good, clean, honest Rugby football can prevail. Their halves have not taken advantage of the blind side of the scrimmage to be up to clever dodges when the referee cannot see them. Their defence was perfect. Their halves and three-quarters were well together and fast. Their forwards were a bit disappointing; they never seemed able to come away with those tremendous rushes that are characteristic of the Irish teams. In bidding our visitors good-bye, we can only hope that it will not be long before another South African team comes to these shores.

It has indeed been fortunate that these two amateur teams from the Colonies of South Africa and New Zealand have visited our shores in consecutive seasons. The interest of the public in the game has been awakened at a critical time in England. It is reported that the affairs of the Northern Union, whose teams seceded from the parent body in order to form professional teams and to play, as it ultimately proved, a bastard sort of football, are in anything but a satisfactory state. Towns which were the centres of the game are no longer providing spectators. Bankruptcy is in many cases imminent. The village teams that used to flourish are practically extinct. Association football is taking advantage of the situation. The players who have played for the Northern Union are debarred from playing with Rugby Union teams. The question is whether the Rugby Union will take them back to the fold. I imagine that the attitude of the Union will depend to a great extent on the result of the inquiries now pending as to the alleged veiled professionalism prevalent in certain clubs. If there is found to be a system of secret payments prevailing, I apprehend that the Rugby Union will be unlikely either to forget or to forgive. It is, in my opinion, far better for the English Rugby Union to be composed of a few clubs playing on strictly amateur lines, than to consist of many clubs, some of whose practices are not above board. The visits of the Colonial teams have shown that there is a public ready and willing to see good football. The International English matches draw good gates. So far as the metropolis is concerned, I have come to the conclusion that something in the nature of a league is desirable, in order to centralise public interest in the game. In the provinces similar arrangements might be made. But I cannot see that the English Union is under any obligation to grant indulgence to those who wilfully cut themselves adrift, and who, finding that there is no money in the game, wish to be whitewashed. They are peculiarly the class of players who will revel in secret wages and payments for broken time.

It was very interesting to read the summarised report of an inquiry as to the rights and wrongs of two clubs with regard to the transfer of a professional and the transfer fee that was payable. The only person that was immaterial to the inquiry and who was not called was the player in question. One would think he was a material witness, as a point was raised that one club had used its best endeavours to get him to go somewhere. The way in which players are bought and sold is really most amusing. It is the sort of business in which amateurs are supposed to engage and to control. The Football Association is very angry because the amateurs think that all the business part of football as to wages, transfers, and so forth should be left to those who manage teams. It certainly seems high time that the professional players organised themselves in their own interests. They are not permitted to be represented on the Council of the Football Association, and yet, like other folk, they have their grievances.

Mr. Archdale Palmer has resigned the secretaryship of the All England Lawn Tennis Club. His resignation has been received with deep regret by the members, who realise all that he has done for their club. He has, however, done so much that his successor will find his task a comparatively light one. He may rely on receiving Mr. Palmer's advice and assistance if at any time he should require it. Through all the miserable dispute not one of the so-called reformers has been able to allege anything against Mr. Palmer's integrity and honour. The despicable attempt of Mr. MacFie and Mr. Griffiths to show that Mr. Palmer had misled the general meeting of the Lawn Tennis Association ended in a miserable fiasco so soon as the facts were threshed out. The upshot of the whole affair is that the All England Lawn Tennis Club is quite a negligible quantity in the affairs of the Association. Its members will be well advised to devote their whole attention to strengthening and improving their own position. A further attack is pretty certain to be made upon them. It is not likely that a set of reformers who consider that makers of lawn tennis balls should pay the Association for using their balls will permit for any length of time a club to exist that so far violates this proposition as to pay a full trade price for its balls. That was not the sort of reform that the anti-traders wanted. They hoped to finance not only tournaments but the Association itself at the expense of the trade. In other words, the private purchasers of lawn tennis balls were to pay the piper all round.

Probably few of those Cambridge undergraduates who attended the lectures of the late Professor F. W. Maitland knew that he was a long distance runner who had run as second string against Oxford, and who had rowed for Third Trinity. As a lecturer he would enliven the intricacies of real property or constitutional law with epigram and satire. He was as good a teacher as he was a scholar. Most men loved him; all liked him.

I was very sorry to read of the death of the old Oxford and Lancashire cricketer, G. R. Bardswell, at the early age of thirty-three. He went to Uppingham, and on going up to Oxford he got his Blue as a freshman. He played for Lancashire for several seasons. He first came out as a very successful slow-medium bowler. But after an accident to his hand in 1895, which prevented his playing in the University match he did little with the ball. His batting, however, improved rapidly, and he was always a brilliant fieldsman in the slips.

OVER-STOUTNESS is not difficult to permanently cure when the right remedy is found. Antipon is now in universal favour. The Methodist Recorder says:—"It is satisfactory to know that Antipon is the practical result of a specialist's researches and discoveries, so that reliance can be placed upon its efficacy." MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE regulations for next year's Tourist Trophy race have now been issued and while no sensational changes have been made the alterations seem mostly to have been well conceived, though it would be sanguine to assume that even under the revised conditions only genuine touring cars will be enabled to compete. Obviously, however, the alterations have been designed with the hope of attaining this desirable end. Among other things, all manufacturers entering will be required to undertake to make and sell for a period of six months cars conforming in every particular to those which they run in the race. The makers will get round this, of course, in some way or another—it will be amusing to notice how—but the proviso is well meant. The only really effective way of ensuring the entry of genuine touring cars would be for the Club to reserve the right to choose the competing cars from the makers' stocks, and then run the race on a handicap basis; but such an arrangement would, of course, be impracticable.

As it is, the Club is doing the next best thing by making all the requirements that foresight can suggest and that experience has taught to be necessary. It is also possible that a second race for heavier cars may be organised. I cannot help thinking, however, that the Club would do better to consider the claims of smaller cars rather than larger ones in this connection. The further encouragement of monstrous touring cars is quite unnecessary. A race, or races, on Tourist Trophy lines, open to cars of from, say, 8-h.p. to 14-h.p. would, on the other hand, be really useful. One of the new regulations, by the way, is rather ill-judged, namely, that stipulating that no advertisements relating to the race and its results shall be subsequently issued without their having been viséd by the Club authorities. Not only is this likely to entail a vast amount of trouble and irritation, but it will also have the effect of making the Club responsible for all the advertisements bearing on the race—which is hardly desirable.

The effect of the new Secret Commissions Act will be interesting to note in connection with the motor business. There are few industries in which the practice at which the Act is aimed prevails more extensively, though he would be a rash man who ventured to hope that the new legislation will bring it forthwith to an end. It should, however, operate at least to strengthen the hands of those who, hitherto, have found it necessary to allow these illicit bonuses virtually in self-defence. Now that it is possible to point out to the wily chauffeur on the look-out for his "squeeze" that his acceptance of such would render him liable to serious pains and penalties, and that it is the truest kindness to save him from such unpleasant possibilities, his cupidity should be to some extent, at any rate, checked. Nor is the chauffeur the only one by any means to whom the same applies. People in good positions, whose expert friends kindly interest themselves in choosing cars for them, would often be surprised if they knew of the handsome commissions thereby pocketed.

Lively times may be expected if cyclists in general adopt the policy which seems to be favoured by the Cyclists' Touring Club of waging war on motorists by "having the law on them" whenever possible under one or other of the various Highways and Police Acts, of which the Club obligingly furnishes particulars. In commending the information to its readers, the C.T.C. Gazette observes:—

> If he be a motorist, and a considerate one, he will gladly "mark, learn, and inwardly digest" the code of offences of which he is never likely to be guilty; if he be an anti-motorist he will note with delight that when he witnesses a wilful infringement of the rights of other sections of the road using community, he has many remedies lying ready to his hand should he decide to put the law in motion.

This is not exactly "Don't nail his ears to the post," though rather in that vein. From a perusal of the said summary, it appears that under certain of the Acts cited any person witnessing an offence may arrest the offender—as, for instance, for leaving a carriage on the highway so as to obstruct the passage thereof, not keeping to the left or near side of the road, or driving any carriage furiously. I can only repeat that exciting times may be anticipated when cyclists proceed to attempt the arrest of motorists on their own account for these and like crimes.

Motorists insured in the Car and General Insurance Corporation, Ltd., which does a larger business, I believe, than any other office in this class of work, will be pleased to notice that the Corporation has recently decided on a considerable extension of the benefits conferred by their policies, without any increase of the premium rates. Thus all ordinary private motor-car policies will henceforward cover under the accidental damage section the first 20s. (hitherto excluded), as well as all risk while the car is in transit within the United Kingdom by road, rail, or inland waterway, and lamps. Further, under the Accidental Damage and Claims by Public sections any insured car will, in future, be protected, when it is being driven with the consent of the owner by any licensed driver. These are spirited concessions which will, no doubt, be widely appreciated. In regard to that last named, there is only one slight drawback. Hitherto the owner who has not felt disposed to entrust his car to other hands than his own has always been able to plead that if he consented his insurance would be invalidated. Henceforward this convenient excuse will be denied him.

Tempting advantages are offered, also, by the insurance company which has been formed in connection with the Motor Union—advantages which have probably had something to do with the move of the older corporation above named. Thus the Motor Union's policy also permits a car to be driven by any one holding a proper licence. Still more novel is the provision under which, in the case of accidents, the assured may have repairs done to the extent of £2 10s. without waiting for the company's sanction, the latter at the same time undertaking to pay special compensation of £1 per day if the required repairs have not been completed within fifteen working days by the company in the event of its having undertaken them. These terms are lavishly conceived, no doubt, but they do not alter the fact that the Motor Union is going right outside its proper province in embarking on an undertaking of this knd.

The report that Mr. Charles Jarrott, who has so long championed the cause of the four-cylinder engine against that of six cylinders, is about to take up the agency in this country of a famous French firm which has recently identified itself with the six-cylinder movement, will afford amusement to many. "Et tu, Brute!" will surely represent the reproachful attitude of the four-cylinderites, of whose cause Mr. Jarrott has hitherto been such a doughty champion. Doubtless Mr. Jarrott will now perceive merits in the six-cylinder engine to which he has hitherto been blind. But his opponents will not be too hard on him. "There is more joy," etc. Mr. Edge will doubtless be the first to welcome the prodigal into the fold.

Talking of Messrs. Edge and Jarrott, by the way, it will be quite like old times if these famous racing motorists of the past bring off that twenty-four hours race on the new Brooklands motor track, of which there is talk at present. Mr. Edge started the thing with his proposal to try to establish a twenty-four hours speed record on the track, and Mr. Jarrott was quick to pick up the gage. A race would at least be more interesting than an endurance trial, though neither seems strictly necessary to establish the tolerably obvious fact that a modern motor-car can travel a vast distance in a short time. The present twenty-four hours touring record is, it seems, held by Mr. C. J. Ridgeway, who, about sixteen months ago, in America, covered over eight hundred miles in that time. Mr. Edge hopes to do over fourteen hundred miles. Another well-known motorist has, it is said, wagered £100 to do fifty miles on the new track in half an hour.

The Roads Improvement Association have taken a good work in hand by offering prizes for the best tar-spreading apparatus, and it is to be hoped that a really efficient and economical machine may be brought into being as a result. If all the roads in the kingdom were tarred nothing more would be heard about the dust nuisance. Unfortunately, the cost of the process, which ranges from £60 to £90 per mile, is at present almost prohibitive, and save for a few experimental stretches, little or nothing has been done in the matter throughout the country generally. Given a more economical method of applying the tar by some kind of mechanical sprayer, the cost might be materially reduced, and the county authorities might be more disposed, in view of the undoubted efficiency of this treatment, to utilise the process. If only a few of the principal high roads were so treated, the gain would be enormous—alike to motorists and to the general public.

That is a rather novel idea which has been suggested in one of the motoring papers—viz., the institution of boy guides to pilot motorists through unfamiliar towns. On approaching an ordinary town of any size, the author of the suggestion points out, the automobilist often finds himself at a loss. He has covered ground smartly on the open road, and is beginning to be proud of his average. Then through the tortuous suburbs he crawls half a dozen miles in an hour. There is a certain amount of truth in this—at least, to the extent that one's rate of progress is inevitably diminished when the traffic of a town has to be negotiated. The town has to be a very considerable one, however, if the motorist is to experience much difficulty in finding his way through it, and I fancy that, so far as most automobilists are concerned, the active and intelligent one on his beat will be found adequate to the supply of all the information that is necessary. At the same time, it is often astonishing what difficulty is experienced in the country districts in getting intelligible answers on the subject of routes and distances. The average rustic is amazingly ignorant of the country beyond his own immediate town or village.

NEW YEAR STARTS WELL—REACTIONS LATER—PROFESSIONALS TOO EAGER—WHAT THE PUBLIC PREFERS.

The new year opened on the Stock Exchange with a burst of activity, but it was mostly of the professional order, and after a couple of days of vigorous bidding, there was a sharp reaction due to the desire to snatch profits, because the public did not come along in sufficient numbers. At the end of the week conditions improved again under the influence of easier money and the expectation of an early reduction in the Bank rate, but the outside interest continued small. The fact is that the large army of professionals is too eager to work the market, and those who have capital for investment or speculation have not very much reason to bless them. I do not think it necessary to discuss now the question whether there is or is not enough business to go round, but the public is shy after the drain of the Boer and Russo-Japanese wars, and has not too much superfluous cash to play with. It has developed a preference for safe 4 per cent. stocks, and probably for some time to come will continue in this course, with only a moderate diversion into other directions, and then only when the wares offered are very attractive.

MONEY EASY—ANTICIPATING A LOWER BANK RATE.

The Money Market is already discounting the probability of a reduction in the Bank rate within the immediate future, and this is reflected in the steady decline in bill rates. Despite this, however, the position is generally considered to possess some element of uncertainty, and though three months' fine bills are taken below 4⅞ per cent., there are not wanting expressions of disapproval at the recklessness of the market in sailing so dangerously close to the wind. The recovery in the American Exchange is certainly a promising sign, but here and there some scepticism exists as to its genuineness, and, in addition, the uncertainty as to the dimensions of the Argentine and Brazilian requirements of gold, not to mention the Indian Currency reservations, make the immediate future somewhat cloudy. It has to be noted, too, that Lombard street is being denuded of its superfluous supplies of money by reason of the loans falling due at the Bank, and though it is true that the dividend payments have been large, it must not be forgotten that the "Old Lady" holds a considerable number of bills maturing this month, which is calculated to preclude the possibility of any superabundance of money being experienced before January has turned. Nevertheless, untoward developments excepted, there will be no necessity for a 6 per cent. Bank rate much longer. A reduction within the next few weeks seems inevitable, but whether the market is discounting the event prematurely remains to be seen. The Bank continues to secure practically all the heavy arrivals of gold, and this, together with the infiltration of cash from circulation, is likely to make a good impression upon the reserve, so much so that a substantial recovery is more than probable within the next week or two. The total at £19,689,000 is an improvement of £970,000 on the week, due to the return of money from the country and the receipt of gold from abroad.

CONSOLS RESPONDING TO MONEY PROSPECTS — ATTRACTIVE STOCKS — JAPANESE FAVOURED BY INVESTORS — RIO'S EFFORTS.

The possibility of the Bank rate being reduced within a few weeks, and the significance thereof in relation to the monetary situation, is naturally making a favourable impression upon the gilt-edged stocks. Perhaps the market is a little premature in regard to the Bank rate possibilities, and it would not be at all surprising should any insignificant development in Lombard Street serve to check the prevailing enthusiasm somewhat. This seems not improbable, but at the same time the investor who is holding gilt-edged stocks has nothing to fear. Before many weeks have elapsed the necessity for a 6 per cent. Bank rate will have completely disappeared, and with the general monetary pressure relaxed, it is pretty certain that stocks will be established on a much higher basis. In these circumstances, any relapse that may occur is likely to be purely temporary in character. In the Foreign market monetary influences are also making a good impression upon values, and in point of interest the investment demand for Japanese bonds is most conspicuous. As I have said before, the New Fours, upon which a return of over 4⅝ per cent. is obtainable, appear to be worthy of consideration, while the Four and a Half per Cent. issues, giving about the same yield, also appear attractive, though it may be noted that they have a rather shorter currency. There is nothing fresh to chronicle in relation to Russian bonds, which continue to wobble somewhat erratically, according to the whim of the moment. Among South Americans it is interesting to refer to the reports that the Municipality of Rio de Janeiro is credited with the intention of raising a loan of £10,000,000. These reports are somewhat at variance as to details, but one thing is certain, and that is that the chances are much against the Municipality raising this large sum without the backing of the Brazilian Government. Such a security would put quite a different complexion on the matter.

INTERESTING MOVEMENTS IN HOME RAILS—SOUTHERN STOCKS STRONG—SOUTH WESTERN DEFERRED'S MYSTERIOUS RISE—SCOTTISH ISSUES AFFECTED BY THE ACCIDENT AND THE BLIZZARD—ENGLISH TRADE LINES AND DIVIDEND PROSPECTS.

The usually staid Home Railway market has had quite an exciting week. There has been a burst of activity and strength in the Southern passenger group, quite unconnected, it may be added, with the forthcoming dividends, and a sharp decline in Scottish Rails—a result of the serious accident to a North British express near Dundee, and of the blizzards in the north which have done much to spoil the revenue record for the half-year, both by reducing gross receipts and raising operating costs. The stocks of the trade lines, while influenced to a mild extent by the recent spell of severe weather, which upset the favourable estimates formed regarding traffic returns for the holiday fortnight, have on balance made a fair improvement. Now that the results for the twenty-six weeks of the half-year are known, it is demonstrated beyond doubt that several lines will be in a position to make respectable additions to their dividends on account of the past half-year, and with the dividend season almost upon us, the market is waking up to the opportunities offered to the bargain hunter. The better tendency has also been due in a measure to the sudden ease in Lombard-street, where conditions point to the possibility of a reduction in the Bank rate within the next few weeks. It is interesting to observe that the stocks to show special strength in the trade group were Great Northern Deferred, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Hull and Barnsley, North-Eastern, and North Staffordshire. There is no question to my mind that the speculative investor will get the best value for his money by selecting one or more of the foregoing five stocks; the immediate dividend outlook in each case is bright, and prices are low. At the same time, those who took my advice and got in several months ago will have still better reasons to feel satisfied, for each of the stocks mentioned, particularly York Deferred and Hulls, which I have recommended almost to the point of becoming wearisome, have already had a fair rise from the lowest depths reached last year. There is less to tempt the speculator in Midland, North-Western, and Great Western stocks, for dividends are only likely to be raised very moderately, and as regards Westerns, the heavy new capital charges that have to be faced in the current year renders the outlook somewhat dubious. At the same time, no one can deny the sterling worth of these three stocks as investments, and they are bound to share in the general levelling up that will occur in Home Railways with the advent of really cheap money. Reverting to the southern passenger group, the surprise of the week has been the sharp spurt in South-Western Deferred. The one thing that seems certain about this movement is that it is not due to anticipations formed regarding the forthcoming dividend. The South-Western, in consequence of the Salisbury accident, may have to reduce its dividend; indeed, stockholders can only hope for a maintenance of the previous year's payment by a transfer from the reserve fund. But in the immediate future the Company will derive great benefit from the transference of part of the White Star fleet from Liverpool to Southampton. Kent coal, combined with the prominence being given to the Channel Tunnel proposition, has undoubtedly stimulated buying of Chatham and South-Eastern stocks. A story got abroad the other day that the Kent collieries would begin sending coal from the Dover pits to London in March, and this seems to have started a fair amount of speculative bidding for Doras and Little Chathams, part of the support coming from France. This talk about a Channel Tunnel, and Kent being converted into a Black Country, is no doubt calculated to fire the imagination, but some more positive proof of a change in the fortunes of the Kentish railroads will be required before either Chatham Ordinary or South-Eastern Deferred can be called cheap. If my readers wish to take an interest in these lines, they can obtain sound merit with reasonably good prospects of a capital advance by buying either Chatham First Preference or South-Eastern Six per Cent. Preferred Ordinary. The latter looks particularly cheap, for, on the basis of the last two half-yearly dividends, averaging 5½ per cent., it offers a yield of 4⅜ per cent., with, of course, the promise of another ½ per cent. in dividend when earned. My table follows:—

"AMERICAN RAILWAY EARNINGS AND DIVIDENDS," by D. O. CROAL, F.S.S. "A carefully written résumé of the position and prospects of the leading lines in the United States."—Financial News.—EFFINGHAM WILSON. Price 6d. net.

Prior Charge Stocks.

In the active "Bull" movement which is confidently expected all round, Home Railway prior charge stocks, are certain to participate. Failing a cataclysm, it will be very good business to buy them. Of course, one is called upon to discriminate, but by so doing one can obtain 3½ to 4 per cent. with very excellent security—not quite gilt edged, of course, but next door to it, and good enough for most people. They do not possess the speculative possibilities that would develop among ordinary stocks in times of a boom, but they would certainly show an appreciable advance. There are many investors who prefer relative steadiness to a possibility of a sharp fall, such as has occurred during the last year in ordinary descriptions. There is plenty of scope for selection. Take debentures, for instance. Great Western Four and Three-quarter stock gives a yield of £3 8s. per cent. London and North-Western (one of the choicest investments obtainable) returns £3 3s. 6d. per cent.; Midlands £3 5s. 9d. per cent.; North Eastern £3 6s. per cent.; Brighton Fours £3 9s. per cent.; and Lancashire and Yorkshire £3 6s. 9d. per cent. South Western issues are also among the choice ones; and if you want more for your money, Central Londons will give you £3 14s. 9d. per cent.; Charing Cross, Euston and Hampstead £4 12s. 6d. per cent.; Baker Street and Waterloo £4 4s. per cent.; Great Central Second £3 12s. 6d. There is a large selection of Guaranteed stocks which bring in more than Debentures, and are scarcely less desirable. I give below a table which shows at a glance what may be obtained from this class:—

on Great Central, 1874, which last, though not in the Trustee class, has become a very desirable security—there being already four stocks behind it receiving their dividends, whilst others will be added in due course. Stocks like District Preference and Chatham Second Preference will no doubt appeal to nobody; but the City and South London, 1896, issue seems worth attention, and you can obtain on it about £4 6s. 6d. per cent. Outside Home Railways there are many stocks which will repay investment. Bengal and North Western Preference, for instance, gives you almost 3¾ per cent., with most excellent security. East Indian and Great Indian Peninsula Annuities are not very much in favour, because they are not well understood, but the return on the various classes ranges from £3 12s. 6d. per cent. to about £3 17s. 6d. per cent. Southern Punjaub Preference brings in £3 17s. 6d. per cent., and Nizam's State Railway Four per Cent. Debentures give £3 18s. 3d. per cent. In addition to the stocks named there are the issues of the Canadian railways. On Canadian Pacific Sterling First Mortgage bonds the yield is a good 4 per cent., but it is an objection to them that they are redeemable in 1915. It seems to me that the Preference shares would repay attention, and I give below a table showing what you may get on this and some other leading Canadians:—

NOTHING LIKE PHILANTHROPY.

The National Share Exchange, of 22, Great Winchester-street, E.C., assures everybody that it has not one dissatisfied client, and, "as far as investments go, no one has ever lost a single penny through depositing with us, whilst cheques for all speculating profits have been mailed the same day as the deal has been closed." Being interested parties, the concern does not like to furnish advice, but at the same time it is only too pleased, on receipt of wire, telephone, or letter, or on personal application, to furnish the fullest possible information, together with the highest and lowest prices during any number of years of any stock or share. There is nothing like philanthropy. The London Scottish Stock Exchange—the title is most misleading, by the way—announces one more success. It announces that Stock Union No. 29a closed at the end of November at a profit of 150 per cent., representing after deduction of its commission of 10 per cent., a net return of £13 10s. upon every £10 subscribed. This is really pretty, but where is the point of making money for absolute strangers when you can make it for yourself and retire on a competency within a few months?

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

DIRECTORS' FEES.

No dividend has been paid on Ind, Coope, and Co.'s Preference shares for or since the beginning of 1905, and in the circumstances the proposal of the Directors to increase their remuneration seems rather an imposition on the shareholders. They have recently registered new articles of association, making three of themselves Directors for life, and the following luxuries are to be thrown in:—(1) A pension of £1,000 per annum for ten years, from January, 1902, and after that £500 per annum for life to Mr. Murray Ind, now Chairman of the Directors; (2) £4,500 instead of £3,000 per annum for Directors' fees; (3) Pensions (as Directors please), for more Managing Directors and other officials. Mr. A. L. Normandy, of 15, Sydenham Hill, S.E., writes to protest against these proposals, and dissentient shareholders would do well to put themselves into communication with him.

AMERICAN POSITION—WHY THE ENGLISH PUBLIC IS SHY—HITTING OFF THE SITUATION—EARNINGS GOING OFF—SOUTHERN PACIFIC REPORT.

The turn of the year has witnessed a relaxation in the monetary conditions in the United States, and call money no longer commands 25 per cent. The outlook is, therefore, more bright, and trading may be expected to improve before long. But so far as the English public is concerned, the interest remains small, presumably because of the dangers of a speculation in Yankees (it being impossible to follow the moves of the game) and of the fact that more stable securities are to be found in other directions. The professionals play with the shares in Shooters'-court, but, taking it all round, the interest displayed is out of all proportion to the volume of business that is carried through even on professional account. A private letter to the Times seems to me to hit off the situation pretty accurately:—

> A dozen or fifteen men who have control of practically the entire surplus money market of the country, and as a corollary thereto to a certain extent of the rates of interest, are able, through the fact that the floating supply of stocks is comparatively small, to make prices almost at their will. The insurance episode was but an incident in the situation; the recent report of Union Pacific, with its enormous amount of cash and loans, gives indication how far this trust money has extended in other, and I may say almost all, directions. Of course, a large part of our public either does not know this or does not understand its meaning; they and others who, like myself, are afraid of it, are all fortified in their reluctance to sell their holdings by the tremendous crops and the great activity and apparent profits of business. Meanwhile these gamblers, perhaps the ablest the world has ever seen, churn the floating supply of securities over and over again, marking prices to suit themselves, thus catching the smaller try, if they like, both ways. It is all done to induce the great public to come into the game, and on this result depends whether we are to have one of the large panics of the age or a more ordinary, though exceedingly severe, readjustment.

If you want evidence of a close corporation worked by a handful of men who can pull the strings as they think fit, you can obtain it in the revelations into the operations of the Harriman combine. This shows that the Union Pacific holds $28,000,000 of Illinois Central stock, $10,000,000 Atchison Preferred, $32,000,000 Baltimore and Ohio, $3,500,000 Chicago North-Western, $3,500,000 Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul, and $14,000,000 New York Central. We are informed from New York that the extent to which the Company's holdings have been increased since last June came as a surprise, but it has for some time been well suspected none the less. On the Wall Street market the conditions, as already hinted, have shown an improvement, and during the week Readings, Union Pacifics, Southern Pacifics (these two last on the strength of excellent earnings), and Illinois Centrals, as well as Milwaukees and Atchisons, have made fair progress. It should be recognised, however, that Americans are a dangerous thing for the man in the street to handle. The "bosses" have failed in their efforts to bring about a boom, and must be heavily loaded up with stock, for which, it would appear, neither the British nor American publics have much use. Prices are high, and although it might pay to hold some of the principal stocks for a year or two, it would easily be possible to go elsewhere and do better without anything like the same risk. It is a satisfaction to know that the English interest in Americans has become insignificant, holders having taken advantage of the advance in values to sell out to take up less exciting and not less attractive investments. My table will be found below:—

It need not be denied that the prosperity of the United States is still great, though apparently waning. "Bradstreets" shows that gross earnings in October, the latest month for which conclusive returns have been made up, aggregated $139,418,717, a gain of $14,160,224, or 11.3 per cent., over October, 1905, when business was especially active. Net earnings, on the other hand, amounted to $50,717,844, the increase being $4,526,514, or 9.7 per cent., over October last year. Operating expenses aggregated $88,700,873, an advance of 12.1 per cent. over October, 1905. The early compilations of the New York Chronicle for November show that matters are not improving, for they tell of "a much smaller improvement, both in ratio and amount, than any recent return for some time past," and quite a number of lines actually report decreases. This unfavourable turn is attributed to the shrinkage in the grain movement—a matter of surprise, considering the bounteous harvests which have been gathered during the past season. It is pointed out that in one section—the South—the roads have had special advantages this year in addition to the benefits arising from the continued activity and prosperity of trade. The cotton movement has run considerably heavier than last year, and numbers of roads in that part of the country are comparing with heavily diminished earnings last year, the yellow fever quarantines at that time having served to curtail the traffic and revenues of such roads. This year there has been no impediment of that kind to railroad traffic, making it possible to regain the loss on that account sustained in 1905, provided general trade keeps good. The Southern Pacific Railroad has made much progress during the last few years, and its shares have more than doubled in value since 1900, being now about 96, as compared with a lowest of 31¼ and a highest of 47½ then. Its report for the past year is highly satisfactory. The Common stock has been raised from the plane of a non-dividend payer to the basis of a 5 per cent property. Gross transportation receipts were enlarged by as much as $10,117,391 (bringing the total considerably over 100 millions, that is, up to $105,632,549), and net earnings were enlarged to the extent of $5,505,638. There was at the same time some reduction in interest charges as a result of the retirement of certain bonds and their replacement by others bearing a lower interest rate. As a consequence, the surplus above fixed charges increased no less than $6,760,674, or fully 54 per cent., the amount of their surplus being raised from $12,431,973 to $19,192,647. With such an enormous increase in the amount available for dividends, the payment of dividends followed as a matter of course. The 5 per cent. dividends which the Company has undertaken to pay would call for no more than $9,892,463 out of $16,065,068 available. As a matter of fact, only 2½ per cent. on the Common stock is charged against the late year's accounts (the dividend for that amount in October having been the first and only dividend paid), leaving, therefore, a surplus on the year's operations of $11,118,837.

Canadian Pacifics Erratic—Good Traffics Resumed—Grand Trunk Dividend Prospects—2½ per Cent. Probable on "Thirds"—Better Possibilities for 1907—Mexican Firsts—A Likely Stock for the Speculative Investor—Cubans and Argentines—Guayaquil and Quito Bonds.

The past week has witnessed considerable fluctuations in Canadian Pacific shares at around the 200 level. Doubtless some nervous speculators were induced to sell upon the November revenue statement, which showed that the gross increase of $493,000 had been more than absorbed by extra operating costs, a decrease being registered in net earnings of $98,000. My own view, as expressed once or twice lately, was that the recent falling off in Canadian Pacific earnings was likely to prove of a temporary character, and might reasonably be attributed to the snowstorms in Western Canada, which would, of course, affect both gross receipts and working charges. This opinion is now borne out by the traffic return to December 31, which showed gross earnings of $2,068,000, an increase of $294,000 upon the corresponding period of 1905. Thus the Company appears to be getting back to its normal—or shall I say abnormal?—rate of progress. Seeing that from July 1 to end-November gross earnings amounted to $31,473,000, an increase of $5,710,000, and the net takings were $12,320,000, an advance of $2,479,000, shareholders can afford to ignore an occasionally poor statement. So far as the market outlook is concerned, I think the course of Canadas must depend in the near future almost entirely upon happenings in the American market. Seeing that a spell of liquidation in Yankees is badly wanted to restore healthy conditions, and the public so far shows little inclination to help the controlling groups out of their difficulty, purchases of Canadian Pacific shares to carry over can hardly be recommended for the present, although on any sharp break opportunities would arise for the speculator hunting for differences. The investor, however, who has paid for his shares has no need to worry over a temporary decline, brought about from external causes, for Canadas are intrinsically worth a higher price, and are almost bound to go ahead before very long. With regard to Grand Trunks, the market had a disappointment in the November revenue statement, the net increase of only £7,800 being half what many of the dealers had looked for. We are now in possession of all the figures we are likely to get regarding the Trunk half-year before the statement for the six months published next April—the Trunk not making a practice of giving a separate statement for December—and it is therefore timely to consider dividend prospects. The net receipts on the Grand Trunk system proper amounted for the five months to £910,000. On the basis of working for the last months of 1905 and 1904, December should yield £80,000 net, making £990,000 for the half-year. Sundry credits, on the basis of the corresponding half-year of 1905, should amount in round figures to £100,000, and there should be a surplus from the Detroit branch of £20,000, or £5,000 more than a year ago. On the other hand, the Canada-Atlantic will prove a burden upon the Trunk, its results involving probably a deficit of £34,000. Making allowance for these various items, and adding the balance brought in of £16,000, there should be a balance available of £1,092,000. Of this amount rents and interest on debentures and bonds should absorb £614,000, 4 per cent. on the Guaranteed stock £150,000, 5 per cent. on the First Preference £85,500, and 5 per cent. on the Second Preference £63,250, or, together, a total of £912,700. There would then be left a balance of £179,000, or just sufficient to pay 2½ per cent. on the Third Preference. The estimated figures I have given may, of course, prove to be a little out here and there, but they are near enough to make it practically certain that the dividend on Thirds cannot be more than 2½ per cent. On the other hand, bearing in mind Sir Rivers Wilson's promise at the last half-yearly meeting, the dividend is unlikely to be less than 2½ per cent. Taking the present price as 67½ cum dividend, or 65 ex dividend, the yield would give £3 17s. per cent. This is certainly not a very generous return, but in view of the extremely heavy expenditure with which the past year has been burdened, the market is unlikely to be guided solely by yield considerations in assessing the value of the stock. During the current year the line will be freed from the incubus of Michigan taxation arrears, which it will be remembered were summarily wiped off last spring instead of being spread over three years, and while the Board is not likely to depart from its conservative policy in the matter of the upkeep of the road out of revenue, some lightening of the ratio of working costs may be looked for during the current twelvemonth. If, at the same time, gross earnings keep up to their present form—as, indeed, there is reason to hope they will—the outlook for 1907 may be considered distinctly hopeful. While not so rash as to pin myself down to a prophecy that Thirds will get their full 4 per cent., I may remark that there is nothing outrageous in such a suggestion, and under these circumstances, Trunks are unlikely to be allowed to go back very far. In the Foreign Railway group there has been little calling for special mention during the last few days. Mexican Rails have held their own in sturdy fashion, and I would repeat that those who buy the Eight per Cent. First Preference can secure a progressive stock that has very good prospects of a 20-point rise in the not very distant future. Cuban Rails, too, have been to the front, the traffic receipts showing up well now that the Companies have entered upon the "fat" season of the year, when the sugar crop is carried. Argentine Rails, which are now quite a sober investment section, have benefited from a little buying on the part of those wanting yields of 5 to 5½ per cent. with tolerably good security, while, of course, cheaper money has been a beneficial influence. Guayaquil and Quito bonds were affected by the fact that no announcement was made regarding the payment of the coupon due on the 1st inst. At the time of writing the market is waiting for an official announcement, and meanwhile a report is in circulation that the interest will be met during the present week. My usual table follows:—

KAFFIRS REVIVE—ADVANCE IN PRICES—SHARES TO BUY—MODDERS AND ROBINSON CENTRALS—OTAVI MINES.

There can be no doubt about it that the revival in the South African share market, which I have steadfastly predicted for some weeks past, has set in, and that Kaffirs have at length entered upon a long period of business activity. For some little time, as the result of the improving conditions of the Rand mining industry—increasing gold output, profits, and dividends, and generally a better economic outlook, more especially as regards the all important question of labour—there has been an undercurrent of strength in the Kaffir market, and all the indications have pointed to the marshalling of forces as a preliminary to a forward movement. When just before Christmas prices were at their lowest, and it really seemed as if bottom had been reached, there was considerable buying of certain of the most promising among the Rand dividend payers for investment purposes, and it is the recognition of the fact, that the great majority of the mines are on an excellent paying basis and are yielding handsome returns on their capital, that has had as much to do with bringing about the revival as has the more encouraging outlook for the industry. There are unquestionably a very large number of attractive investments among Transvaal mines, and purchasers of shares in these may confidently reckon not only on receiving a splendid return on their outlay, but on a considerable appreciation in the value of their holdings. Paris has given strong support to its favourite Kaffirs, and buying orders have come in appreciable numbers from other parts of the Continent. Here there is evidence that the public is once more in the market, and everything points to a continuance of activity. The advance has been general, and in many instances, as a perusal of the following list will show, very substantial:—

	Last Make-up Dec. 21.	January 5, 1907.	Increase.
Rand Mines	6 9/16	7 5/16	¾
East Rand	4 7/16	4 13/16	3/8
Gold Fields	4	4 5/16	5/16
Modders	5 3/16	6 5/16	1⅛
De Beers	23½	25 7/16	2⅛
Premiers	11¾	14 1/16	2⅜
Ferreira	19½	21	1½
Jagersfontein	9½	10½	1
Transvaal Cons. Land	2 7/16	3½	⅝
Johannesburg Cons. Invest.	1 5/16	1⅝	5/16
Randfontein	1 3/16	1½	5/16
New Vaal Rivers	6	6 7/16	7/16
New Primrose	3 5/16	3 5/8	⅜
East Rand Mining	1⅜	1 11/16	5/16
New Kleinfontein	1 15/16	2	1/16
Van Ryn	2 13/16	3 1/16	3/16
Geduld	2 2/16	2⅜	⅛
H. E. Props.	1½	2 1/16	1/16

This list embraces but a small section of the whole of the Kaffir Companies that are dealt in, but it may be regarded as representative and as fairly illustrating the favourable effect which the revival has had on prices. As business looks like broadening a further advance is inevitable, and those desirous of participating in the movement might do worse than make a selection from the foregoing list, although there are many other shares that might be chosen for a speedy and profitable turnover. Robinson Deep, for instance, offers a splendid mining investment, as also does its neighbour on the dip of the Robinson Mine, the Robinson Central Deep. This Company has a capital of £440,000, and it is paying dividends at the rate of 16s. per £1 share, which now stand at 5 13-16. The mine is doing remarkably well, with milling power equal to 120 stamps, on which basis it is estimated to have a life of fifteen years. It is in contemplation, however, to increase the milling capacity up to 205 stamps, in which case the life of the mine would be reduced to a little over nine years, but in that time an investor, if he gave £8 for his shares, would receive 7 per cent. per annum and have all his capital returned to him. There are few more promising mining investments to be had than the Robinson Central Deep, although investors can hardly go wrong in buying any of the shares of the deep level Companies included in the list of Rand Mines' subsidiaries. The Cinderella Deep is also a good deep level concern, and the New Modderfontein, on the dip of the Van Ryn, can be strongly recommended. The New Modderfontein, which recently declared its first dividend of 5 per cent., is one of the leading Kaffir favourites, and is always among the first of the Companies to feel the effects of an improvement in the market. It has about 4,000 claims, the largest area of any purely mining Company on the Rand, and when it is fully equipped, and is worked on an adequate scale, as it soon will be, its profits will be enormous. Modders now stand at about 6 5-16, but then they are £4 shares, and at the conclusion of the late war they were over 14.

They have a long way to go yet before they reach the latter figure, but in the event of one or more subsidiaries being floated by the Company, they might easily top all previous quotations, as the property is undoubtedly a valuable one. Considerable interest has been taken in the introduction of the shares of the Otavi Mines and Railway Company, in consequence of which South-West Africas have advanced to 25s. Some time ago I gave particulars about Otavi Mines and Railway Company, which has an authorised capital of £1,000,000 in 200,000 Ordinary shares of £5 each, all of which have been issued and fully paid up in cash. Now A. Goerz and Co., Ltd., invite offers for purchase of 30,000 fully-paid Ordinary shares of £5 each in the Otavi Mines at the price of £7 5s. per share. A similar offer in respect of 30,000 further Ordinary shares is being simultaneously made in Hamburg. The Tsumeb Copper Mine, one of the chief of the numerous assets belonging to the Company, has already been proved and developed, and, as it is connected with the coast by a railway, the shipment of ore for treatment will shortly begin. The value of this mine alone, apart from the railway and its other valuable properties, is estimated to exceed the market capitalisation of the Company, and therefore investors should have no hesitation in subscribing for the shares, which will doubtless attain a high figure. As a result of the absorption of the Vereeniging power scheme for the Rand by the Victoria Falls Company, the Vereeniging shares have been in request. It is probable that the absorbing Company will utilise the Vereeniging Estate for the carrying out of a portion of the scheme for the supply of power to the Rand.

Rhodesians Neglected — Chartered — Tanganyikas as a Gamble.

Owing to its close affinity with Kaffirs the Rhodesian market is showing to rather greater advantage, but when all is said and done it must be confessed that the improvement does not amount to much. There are, in fact, few features of any particular significance, nor are there as yet any palpable signs of a broadening out of business. It is still the general impression, however, that as a result of the progressive character of the mining industry and the headway made in other directions that this market will gain greater pre-eminence in the not far distant future. As regards Chartered there is nothing fresh to chronicle in relation to the hopes entertained on the subject of the forthcoming report, but, as I have said before, it would be surprising if this did not indicate a material improvement in the financial position. In connection with Tanganyikas I am still inclined to the opinion that these shares have about gravelled after the outburst resulting from the recent issue. It is, of course, likely that if the improvement in Kaffirs should not be sustained the shares may sag away to a still lower level, but on the other hand, they are likely to move upwards if domestic conditions become healthier. As regards Bankets, they remain more or less neglected in the absence of any confirmation of the rumoured satisfactory developments. Here again one may say that any improvements in domestic conditions would probably be followed by an upward movement. My usual table follows:—

West Africans Stagnant—Broken Hills—Tailings.

It is the custom to make an effort to start the New Year well by making something in the nature of an ephemeral fireworks display, but it can scarcely be said that such a convention has been adhered to in the case of the West African mining market. The most conspicuous characteristic is the general stagnation, and it would seem that all the alleged significance of the reduced railway charges in relation to the industry, which was made the pretext for an upward movement a short time ago, has been completely forgotten. Everything considered, I do not think this is remarkable. Broken Hill shares continue to absorb considerable interest, though there is less of the feverish excitement recently in evidence. The metals remain relatively high, and it seems opportune to briefly refer to the course of silver during 1906. The most important point is the increased consumption due in large measure to the prosperity of India and the demand for coinage purposes from the United States. Imports during the twelve months reached about 19,000,000 oz., in comparison with only 14,400,000 oz. in 1905, while exports approximated 19,200,000 oz. as against 14,600,000 oz. As regards the market price, the lowest was 29d. per oz., or 3 9-16d. above the minimum of 1905, while the highest was 33⅛d. or 2 13-16d. per oz. above that of 1905, the average being 30⅞d. as against 27 13-16d. per oz. These figures are not without significance. In connection with the Sulphide Corporation, it is said that when the plant on the Central mine is completed the weekly capacity will be over 12,000 tons. This ought to materialise within a month or so, and a resumption of dividend payments on the Ordinary shares seems probable in the early future. There are some interesting references to the additional source of revenue opened by the discovery to utilize tailings profitably in the report of the Block 10 Co. In the last report it was stated that 100,000 tons had been sold at 6s. per ton, the whole of the payment to be completed within ten months. Profit and loss account has therefore been credited with the sale, but as regards 520,000 tons sold at 5s., payment has been extended over a lengthy period, and the profits therefrom will only be credited to the accounts as they are actually received. Respecting the future, tailings will now accumulate at the rate of 60,000 tons each half-year, all of which should be of a marketable value. It would seem that the gamble in Siberian descriptions is fizzling out, which perhaps is not altogether surprising in view of the paucity of information divulged. In consequence of favourable reports as to developments on the Spassky Company's property, the shares have been in great demand, and have risen to 6 9-16. A cable from Mr. Nelson Fell, the manager of the Spassky Company, announces that development during the last two months has produced surprising results, and he believes that he is not exaggerating in stating that the ore reserves have been doubled. Latterly, the copper output of the Company, in consequence of equipment of the property having been carried out, has been increased. For instance, a railway has been constructed between the smelters and the coal mines, the Yuspenssky mine has been re-equipped, the Karagandy colliery opened up, and the new smelter erected. The shaft at the collieries has been sunk to 250 feet, and an excellent seam of coal 23 ft. wide is being worked. The copper output is expected to rise almost at once to 130 tons per month, and when all the equipment is running, a few months hence, 400 tons will be treated each month. The capital of the Company is £300,000, and on a conservative basis the profit in sight on the property is estimated at between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. There have been considerable dealings in the shares of the Slough Creek, Ltd., at 4s. 6d. This Company has a capital of £200,000 in 1,000,000 shares of 4s. each, and its property, which extends over 13 miles, is situated between the Williams and Lightning Creeks in the heart of the richest gold district of Cariboo, British Columbia. A large amount of development work has been done, and while it is estimated that only £30,000 will be sufficient to fully open up the property, in the reorganisation of the Company provision is made for a working capital of £72,000. Mr. J. D. Kendall, the consulting engineer, under whose supervision the property has been developed, estimates that the profits from the mines when in thorough working order should give a return equal to fifteen times the capital. As a mining investment the property is favourably spoken of.

WESTRALIANS CHEERFUL — KALGURLIS — FINGALLS — OROYA OUTLOOK.

Though there is no palpable expansion in the volume of business, the Westralian mining market has started the New Year in a tolerably cheerful humour, in accordance with the general convention, and naturally hopes are running high in regard to what the future has in store. Sentiment apart, however, I am still inclined to believe that Westralians collectively are deserving of more consideration. The leading mines pay substantial dividends regularly, and have large quantities of ore in reserve, while the general range of values is relatively moderate. In point of interest, the sustained strength of Kalgurlis is still most conspicuous, the shares being now at a record high level, but in this connection it may be noted that the existing price contains 12s. 6d. dividend and bonus, while, of course, the prospects are distinctly hopeful, and larger interim distributions are not improbable in the future. As regards Great Fingalls, there is nothing fresh to chronicle in relation to developments, and the shares continue at a rather low level as a consequence. While it cannot be denied that there is a large element of uncertainty in the position, and that, as a result of the ore shrinkage in the average grade, the profits have diminished to such an extent as to entail a lowering of the quarterly dividend from 5s. to 3s. per share, it is nevertheless clear that the ruling quotation discounts any further adverse contingencies. It may be pointed out that there is 3s. per share contained in the present price. As regards Oroyas, it is becoming more and more manifest that the mine has practically reached the end of its tether as a high-grade proposition, and though it may have a prolonged existence as a low-grade property and additional profit may be expected to be derived from the Oroya Black Range ultimately, a reduction in the dividend seems inevitable before long, so that there is not much chance of a recovery in the market price. INSURANCE NOTES—STAR LIFE OFFICE—REASONS FOR AMALGAMATION.

Last November I had something to say about the proposed amalgamation of the Star Life Assurance Society with the Norwich Union Life Office. This is a course which is advocated by an influential body of policy-holders and shareholders, who have requisitioned the Directors of the Star to call a meeting for the purpose of considering the proposal. The meeting has been fixed for January 16 at noon, at the Hall of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, Moorgate-place. In sending out the notice, the Directors have issued a circular, which, I suppose, is intended as an argument for voting against the acceptance of the Norwich Union terms. In view of the fact that a few months ago the Directors of the Star strongly advocated amalgamation with the United Kingdom Temperance Institution, it is difficult to see why they are so adverse to the acceptance of the much better terms which are now obtainable from the Norwich Union.

The first argument of the Directors is that "no official communication desiring such amalgamation has been received from the Directors of the Norwich Union." It is scarcely to be expected that the Norwich Union would make a formal offer unless there were some reason to suppose that the Directors of the Star were prepared to negotiate. Quite clearly specified terms have, however, been obtained through influential shareholders or policy-holders of the Star, so that the preliminary stage is in quite regular order and in the usual form. Moreover, it is a fact that the Managers of the two Societies have been in communication on the subject.

The second argument of the Directors is that "no reason exists to render an amalgamation necessary for the Star." This point I will come to presently, merely remarking for the moment that amalgamation is more necessary now than it was when the Directors urged the acceptance of less favourable terms.

The third argument is that "the special circumstances which would have made a union with the United Kingdom Temperance advantageous to the Star do not appear in the proposal" to join the Norwich Union. The reason for this statement seems to be that the Star has its principal supporters amongst Wesleyans and other Nonconformists, who have taken policies of a moderate amount for the encouragement of thrift, and that the United Kingdom Temperance does a similar business and caters for the same class. A further point is that a large proportion of the assured in both Companies are total abstainers, and it is partly to secure special advantages for that class that the Directors negotiated with the United Kingdom Temperance. With all due deference to the Directors, this is pure nonsense. I have previously expressed the opinion that Nonconformists are a very excellent class of people from a life assurance point of view, and I fully recognise the great attractions of the temperance section of the United Kingdom Temperance Institution; but neither point has anything whatever to do with the existing policy-holders in the Star. Had the Star been taken over by the United Kingdom, the Star insurance fund would have been kept separate, would have been debited with 10 per cent. of the premiums for the expenses, and would have had to give one-tenth of the surplus to the proprietors, which would have been the United Kingdom Institution, instead of the present shareholders. The benefits of the temperance section would have been available only for new entrants who are entirely free to go to it at present, whether or not they have anything to do with the Star. The existing policy-holders would have been absolutely unaffected by the temperance section.

If the United Kingdom Institution was the only one considered appropriate for amalgamation with it would be interesting to know whether or not amalgamation with another Company was considered previously. It is commonly reported that it was so, and I have seen no denial of this statement.

The next point made by the Directors has, perhaps, a certain amount of force. The Norwich Union terms provide for a reversionary bonus at the rate of 30s. per cent. per annum, calculated only on the sum assured, instead of on the sum assured together with the bonuses already added. The Star has previously given compound bonuses on this latter plan, which gives larger bonuses to policies of long duration than to those that have been effected recently. This seems to me a matter that could be adjusted without difficulty, if negotiations were entered into, and probably the Norwich Union would have no objection to guarantee a compound bonus equivalent to the simple bonus specified in the terms which the Norwich Union is prepared to give.

Finally, the Directors appeal to their constituents to vote against the proposed amalgamation, and to assist the Directors to maintain and increase the prestige of the Star, which such proposals are calculated to damage.

It seems to me that this damage has been done already in a particularly effective fashion by the Directors themselves, and especially by the Chairman of the Star in the speech which he made, when advocating amalgamation with the United Kingdom Institution. On that occasion he explained that the Star had a paid-up share capital of only £5,000, and that the returns to the shareholders have averaged nearly 100 per cent. per annum since the office was started more than fifty years ago. He went on to point out that this share capital constituted a serious stumbling-block to the prosperity of the Society, and that the strongest reason for the proposed amalgamation was that "we get rid of the shares entirely, as regards their adverse effect on future business." As regards new policy-holders joining the United Kingdom Institution, this was correct, but it had nothing to do with the present policy-holders of the Star, who would have continued to pay one-tenth of the surplus to the new shareholders, which would have been the United Kingdom Institution. The Norwich Union proposal does absolutely and finally get rid of the share capital, and definitely guarantees a fixed rate of bonus to the policy-holders, a rate of bonus in excess of what they could possibly hope to obtain were the Star to continue its separate existence.

In regard to the shareholders, the Chairman expressed the opinion that the price of about £56 offered by the United Kingdom Institution was much more than the shares were worth, but the Norwich are giving £65 per share, and it seems to me difficult to persuade the shareholders that they would have been wise to take £56, and extremely foolish to take £65. Thus, as far as the shareholders are concerned, the new offer is much better than the old. So far as the retention of the services of the staff is concerned, the Norwich proposals are distinctly more favourable than those of the United Kingdom Institution. The consideration which ought to settle the question is the welfare of the existing policy-holders. The Chairman of the Star stated that the formation of a temperance section was impossible, and was very emphatic in explaining the disadvantages of paying large dividends on a share capital of £5,000 when the assurance fund amounts to six millions. He further explained that the foreign business of the Star was in an unsatisfactory condition, and generally waxed eloquent on the impossibility of the Star continuing to work as a separate organisation. These difficulties, which must inevitably prove fatal to its success, have been greatly increased by the speech of the Chairman and the action of the Board, and the circumstances of the Star are such that it is unreasonable to expect that future bonuses will be at such a good rate as the Norwich Union offers. The Star did on one occasion declare a compound bonus at the rate of 31s., and on the strength of this many people assured in it; but in 1898 the bonus dropped to 15s., and in 1903 it fell to 10s. Since then there has been a slight improvement; but the outlook—as a whole—is most unpromising. There is no earthly object in the continued separate existence of this society since it has no single policy to offer which cannot be obtained to better advantage elsewhere, and from the point of view of sentiment, it seems more appropriate that a Nonconformist institution should amalgamate on favourable terms with a first-class office, in which the best possible use would be made of its valuable connections, rather than that it should continue as a standing witness to the failure of Nonconformity in the life assurance world. I am quite sure that I am giving policy-holders and the shareholders the best possible advice when I recommend them to communicate with the Star Policy-holders' Committee, at 5, Moorgate-street-Buildings, London, E.C.

New Issues.

The following prospectuses have been issued:—

Cape of Good Hope.—The London and Westminster Bank, Limited, are instructed by the Government of Cape of Good Hope to offer for subscription £994,350 of Three and a Half per Cent. stock at a price of 95 per cent. The stock will be in addition to, and will rank equally with, the £13,422,823 19s. 1d. already created, and will be inscribed in the books of the "Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three and a Half per Cent. stock," kept by the London and Westminster Bank, Limited, and will be transferable without charge and free of stamp duty at that bank, either by the stockholders personally or by their attorneys.

Mexican National Packing Company.—Capital, $10,000,000, in common stock, with $2,000,000 in Five per Cent. Forty-year First Mortgage bonds authorised. Martin's Bank are commissioned by the purchasers and the Company to receive applications for $1,300,000 of the above Five per Cent. First Mortgage Convertible Gold Bonds. Each allottee of bonds will receive from the Company, when he has paid up in full, a bonus of $20 (twenty per cent.) in fully-paid common stock for every $100 par value of bonds allotted to him.—Issue price, 95 per cent. Out of the total $2,000,000 of bonds, $700,000 have been appropriated to retire $600,000 Six per Cent. bonds of the Company, of which about four-fifths have already been retired. The sums received by the Company from the purchasers of the $1,010,000 of bonds and the net proceeds of the $290,000 of bonds now offered for sale on behalf of the Company are required to pay certain liabilities of the Company, and to provide for installing the machinery in packing-house No. 1 at Uruapan, Michoacan; building and equipping packing-house No. 2 in the State of Vera Cruz; building and equipping packing-house No. 3 in the State of Nuevo Leon; purchasing and putting in service fifty refrigerator cars; building and equipping cold storage warehouse, refrigerating plant, and general offices in the city of Mexico. The balance, estimated by the President of the Company at nearly $400,000 (£82,083 6s. 8d.), will be available for the general purposes of the Company.

Nerchinsk Options, Limited.—Capital, £50,000, in shares of £1 each. There are now offered 40,000 shares at par. The Company has been formed to acquire the grant by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, of an exclusive licence to prospect and to lease any gold mines which this Company may select, the area of selection covering in the aggregate four square miles in the Maia Kondechi Valley. This area is situate in the eastern part of the Nerchinsk mining district of Siberia, in the neighbourhood of the property of the Kluchi Gold Mines, Limited. The concession held by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited (the territories covered by and including the above-mentioned area), was granted by the Private Cabinet of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and is held by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, as transferees for a term of twenty-four years, from January 1, 1904, with the right of renewal for a similar period.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Government.

Fitzroy.—I should not disturb the investment, except for a transfer into North-Western Railway stock. This is the one which is likely to advance the most rapidly, although it looks dear.

Railways.

Hanover.—You might have got in on a lower level, but I think you will still find Antofagastas a desirable investment. H. B.—For a lock up for a year or so, you will find Grand Third Preference among the pick of the market. Beira.—Your best plan would be to work with the Debenture Holders' Committee. Grantbridge.—The explanation is that big financial interests in Montreal and London, as well as in New York, are behind Canadian Pacifics; while the "bosses" control Americans to the greatest extent. The difference between prices here and on the Continent is that values are computed differently, and some allowance must also be made for exchange. I hope before long to deal with the matter in a popular manner, as free as possible from technicalities. Primus.—One of the best would be Grand Trunk Third Preference stock; another would be to purchase some Great Central 1894 stock, this Company's outlook being great. Lavender.—1. Mexican Central Railways "B" Debentures ought to harden within the next year or two. 2. Leopoldinas cannot be called a cheap stock, but the Company has made good progress, and its prospects are satisfactory. The yield, without taking count of possible increase in dividends, is already equal to 5½ per cent.

MINES.

G. W. G., Southampton.—The company is quite unknown in this country, and I regret that I am not in a position to advise you about a purchase of its shares. H. L. G., St. Helena.—The thing is a sheer gamble, and unless you are prepared to take risks the shares should be left alone. A. B., Cape Town.—I have no knowledge of the concern. Ship.—Simply a gamble. M. S., Bridgwater.—I understand that the company is in a very indifferent way. Mascotte.—1. Victoria Deep Leads are a hopeful speculation. 2. Grand Trunk Ordinary stock makes a good lock-up. Zeta, Dundee.—The general tendency of South Africans will be upwards, but only slowly, until (as I have pointed out a few score times) the labour question is finally fixed. It is satisfactory, however, to know that, with the exception of a handful of impossibles, all parties are now agreed upon the necessity of settling the question promptly; and it is significant, I think, that the Kaffir magnates are sailing one after another for South Africa. M. H., Balham.—1. You will be much more safe in buying one of the leading copper shares. 2. Utah Developments are speculative, of course, but they are promising in that light, and are not dear at the current price. Salad.—The two deep leads, Consolidated Deep Leads and Moorlorts, are excellent gambles, and developments to date are indicative of good results in the future. They are low-priced, and I think they might be paid for as "option" money—that is, if the speculation turns out well you will secure very large profits indeed; if it does not, then your nominal option money will have been lost. Bath Oliver.—1. On the basis of the 1906 dividend and the current value of the shares, they will, as I said, return 25 per cent. 2. At present a reliable estimate of the recent strike cannot be obtained. N. M. S., Northwich.—1. There are no prospects for any one of the three Companies named. 2. Buy a few Arizona Coppers, or Utah Developments, or Utah Consolidated, or Zinc Corporations with the proceeds of the sale of the other three. Vad.—Rand Mines, Goldfields Ordinary, and Witwatersrand Townships, and Jagersfontein Deferred.

MIXED SECURITIES.

Mexite.—1. You will find the traffics stated every week in the Statist and the Economist. 2. The South African might be held for a better market. Lex.—1 and 2. I should not be disposed to buy either of the shares. 3. There is no reason to sell Singer Cycle Debentures. 4. I should be disposed to sell out. The prospect of appreciation is not very immediate. 5. The shares are hopeless. 6. The prospects are poor. 7. I think you might hold for a recovery. 8. The prospects are reasonably fair. 9. Coronation Syndicate shares are worth buying. 10. Keep Gordon Hotel Preference Shares. Unificar.—1. Hold on to Canadian Pacific shares. I can say nothing about a rise during the current account, and please do not ask me unreasonable questions. 2. Buy Arizona Copper for preference. Deputy.—I recommend Chinese Fives, Brighton Railway Deferred, and Buenos Ayres and Rosario Ordinary for the yield you desire. Artillery.—I should sell the first-named, and keep the mines for better times. Trouville.—1. Both firms are reliable. 2. I should select Arizona Coppers. 3. Anacondas should also be good for a much higher figure. 4. I know nothing good of the Company. Jacobus.—1. Mexican National Railway Preference shares do not appeal to me as a lock-up for "an early date." 2. Both the textile shares are on the up grade, and you should hasten to take advantage of the movement. 3. I suggest Grand Trunk Thirds and North-Western Ordinary. Snowball.—1. The Alberta Company's Ordinary shares have good promise, but they were recommended in these columns at half the present prices and the Second Debentures. 2. The Cobalt Mine stock is quite a gamble, as this wonderful Canadian Company has only recently been floated, and the district is simply thick with "wild cats." The one named looks like such a beast. 3. Brewery shares have depreciated very considerably, but if you are careful in a selection of shares you will realise at much higher prices before long. 4. A good broker will advise you; a second-hand one will not. Verax, Southport.—The selection was quite a good one for 5 per cent., but you understand, of course, that the stocks are a little removed from the absolutely gilt-edged. Carteret, Sydenham Hill.—You will have to wait until the settlement of the labour question in the Transvaal, in all probability, for any substantial advance in the South Africans you name. 2. I do not anticipate much rise in the Westralians, though Sons of Gwalia has possibilities; but Oroyas at the present price (in view of the coming lowering of the grade of ore) are rather speculative. 3. U.S. Steels are being worked by the usual group in the usual way. The prospects are good. 4. The other two are not attractive, but the mine is to be preferred. J. T., Glasgow.—It would be advisable to select Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, Mexican Gold Five per cent. bonds, and Brazil Four per Cent. bonds. The railways are good of their class, which is South American. Frank.—It is a pity you do not read your TRUTH a little more vigilantly. A reply was given to your questions three or four weeks ago. 1. Prospects are not bright, and I should transfer into something else. 2. As a gamble, a purchase may be recommended. 3. Do not average on either share. Atholl.—1. I think you might find better purchases than either of the industrials named. 2. The dividend covers the year 1903. 3. The shares are a hopeful gamble, but nothing more. They follow—at some distance—the course of the diamond-share market. Norris, Birmingham.—Cargo Fleets will probably recover with the improvement in the general trade of the country. 2. Briseis Tin shares ought to advance to 20s., or over. 3. If diamonds are found on the property the possibilities of expansion are incalculable; but you should recognise that the whole thing is a gamble.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Banker.—The suggestion is an old one, and I am afraid it is not easy to act upon save by Act of Parliament, and in any circumstances the procedure would be difficult. Ash.—Nos. 1 and 2 are quite good to hold. 3. Mysores are obviously speculative to a certain extent, but not unpromising. 4. I look for a substantial rise in National Telephone Deferred stock before Government acquisition. Bramble.—Your money is reasonably well secured. R. M. Douglas.—I have no information about the concern. Kanaka.—In the circumstances your suggestion would be for the best, especially in view of the recent disclosures. Alabone.—Thanks for communication. Such mutilation of the King's English is very amusing. Queen Anne.—As you say, the sum is so trifling that it is scarcely worth troubling about, and it would be best to let the matter drop at that, I think. The letter is obviously bluff. Aisa.—The value is 2s. 0½d. D. L., Worcester.—I think you might hold on to Bovril Deferred. There is just a chance of something being received by Linotype Preference in respect of the current financial year. E. Novis.—There is something suspicious about the way you have been treated by the so-called bankers, who are lottery touts, and in the circumstances you ought to let the matter drop at once, shouldering the small loss incurred. You will, I imagine, be more careful in future. Elvira.—You are entitled to the dividend, and might claim it through your broker. Associated Cement report is submitted about September. E. Troughton.—I am constantly uttering warnings against Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., of Paris, who charge exorbitantly for the bonds, many of which are undesirable. These are procurable at current market prices in London. J. E. T.—You might hold the brewery securities for a possible recovery in the future. I would not like to say whether the American oil concern named is still in existence. I have a suspicion that your money is hopelessly lost. Kingstonian.—Better cut your loss at once, and put the proceeds into something more hopeful. Of those named Apollinaris Preference are the most attractive. Lieut.-Colonel.—I would not care to vouch for the honesty of any of the Continental lottery touts, and your safest plan, I am sure, would be to ignore the precious literature. Coltart.—Ashby Staines Ordinary give about 9 per cent., and the Preference 5⅞ per cent., Newcastle Preference 6¼ per cent., and the Ordinary 5¾ per cent. Allsopps are best left alone, and the same, in my opinion, applies to the others. Ernest.—J. Lyons shares are worth buying. You might find what you want among shares of nitrate producing companies. Cammell Laird are attractive as a commercial investment. Prescience.—I would not recommend No. 3. Nos. 4 and 6 would probably respond to any improvement in South African conditions, but I know of no reason for anticipating any appreciation in the others. R. R. L., Chester.—As a commercial holding Hovis Bread, giving over 6½ per cent., are not unattractive. Constant Reader, Waterford.—Of the two Imperial Tobacco, Preferred Ordinary, not the Cumulative Preference, appear to be the most attractive. Hope Bros. Preference, which are cumulative, give about 5¾ per cent., and if the concern is to maintain the recent recovery they are not without some merit. Prestonian.—Either the Scottish Widows or the Norwich Union. J. P.—I regret my inability to advise you. Fellowes.—1. Both are undesirable bucket-shops. 2. Of those named I would prefer D. H. Evans and Santa Rita Nitrate. Novice, Cardiff.—Such high interest is not compatible with the security of your principal, and you might profitably avoid the so-called bank. Amalgamation.—The middle company is apparently the first, and (so far as published reports show) the first one bought out, or the principal persons connected with it, which has proved successful. The 10 per cent. commission to the middle company is outrageous. Geologist.—C. A. Pearson, Ltd., Preference shares are a good newspaper industrial, and give a yield of 6¾ per cent. R. H. W., Bangor.—1. Rotherham Ordinary shares are prominent among the retail drapery shares. 2. You might also consider D. H. Evans and Co.'s. Ordinary, which yield 6¾ per cent.; and then there are Harrods, Barkers, and the other stores to consider. G. H.—I have no faith in the concern. W. H. T., Hounslow.—The Company is a young one, and its expenses were abnormally high. If you can get a surrender value for your policy, take out a new one with one of the well-established and well-reputed offices—say the London Life Association or Scottish Widows. Middy.—1. The office is a good one, but you might consult the reply to the previous correspondent. 2. I am afraid a dividend is not very close. Fife.—My information goes to show that the two Scottish insurance offices named have good resources. The Nitrate Company is new, but its prospects are satisfactory, the Company having acquired good properties in Antofagasta, Chile. Tommy Atkins, Stoke.—The Norwich Union is the best office of the two. Aust.—You will have to take your chances on the production of tea and rubber on the estate, and until this proves profitable you will have no profits. L. M. K.—A bucket-shop which should be avoided. Electric.—1. The Company has, as the chairman frankly admitted at the meeting, to fight against much strong opposition, but its position is very well established, and it has a reserve of about half a million, and its shares are at a premium of 165 per cent. I should hold in spite of the reduced dividend of last year, which was due to exceptional circumstances of probably short duration. 2. Hold for the present, and watch the tendency of values through their quoted figures, and if you see it downwards sell out. Elmbank, Glasgow. —Peruvian Corporation Six per Cent. Debentures are well secured, and the City of Mexico Municipal Five per Cent. Debs may be looked upon as a good investment—somewhat short, of course, of the gilt-edged. Music.—Leave the concern alone. You cannot secure a practically guaranteed business to realise the yield of 6 per cent. Besides, the concern has not much credit. Try Rand Water Board or Grand Trunk Second Preference or Brighton Railway Ordinary, and be content with 4—4½ per cent.

INDUSTRIALS STILL FAVOURED—BAYS RELAPSE—IRON SHARE YIELDS—ANGLO "A" GAMBLE—SPIERS AND DESPOND—COAL TRADE PROSPEROUS — BANK SHARES — CYCLES IN REQUEST.

Everything considered, there is not much cause for complaint in regard to the conditions prevailing in the Industrial market generally. There may be scope for a further expansion in the volume of business, perhaps, but in this connection dealings are still on a fairly good scale, while there are also indications of a gradual broadening out of public interest, which would seem to augur well, especially in the view of confidence being engendered by the activity of trade throughout the country and the satisfactory prospects. The outlook is generally regarded as bright, the consensus of opinion being that the trade revival has not yet reached its zenith, which, in relation to this market in particular is significant. In point of interest the relapse of interest in Hudson's Bays is deserving of reference at the outset. This is to be attributed to the character of the land sales statement for the nine months to December, which would seem to indicate that the rush for land is abating slightly. For the period in question the sales of farm lands and town lots amounted approximately to £250,000, payable over a term of years, and cash receipts to £241,900. These figures compare with £320,000 and £213,500 for the corresponding period of 1905. The increase in cash receipts would seem to reflect the greater prosperity of the Dominion, while it may be inferred from the decline in the quantity of land sales that the "rush" of agricultural immigration has slackened somewhat. Despite the knowledge that the trade continues to enjoy considerable prosperity, iron and steel shares are still more or less neglected, and I consider that in this group there are many opportunities offered to the investor to pick up shares on promising terms. Here is a table showing the approximate yields obtainable:—

	Price.		Yield per Cent.
Armstrong, Whitworth	61/-		£4 18 0
Babcock & Wilcox	4		4 17 0
John Brown & Co.	1¾		5 6 0
Cammell, Laird & Co.	9		5 10 0
Pease & Partners	14½		5 15 0
Pearson & Knowles	5		5 0 0
South Durham	22/-		10 0 0
Vickers Sons & Maxim	51/-		5 14 0

The gamble in Anglo "A" continues as the dividend season approaches, and a still higher level has been attained on the strength of the rumours concerning the distribution. The announcement is due next month, and, as I have said before, the gamblers profess to expect a relatively substantial payment. For 1905 the dividend was 10s. per cent., but in view of the prosperity reflected in the payments on the Ordinary stock, a larger distribution seems probable. It is doubtful, however, whether the actual payment will come anywhere near expectations. As regards refreshment shares, Lyons continue the centre of interest, and in my opinion would make a very respectable commercial investment upon any temporary decline in the market prices. Aerated Breads, too, are deserving of consideration, and Slaters, despite the decline in the last dividend, would not be an unattractive purchase at the low price ruling. In connection with Spiers and Ponds, the unattractiveness of which I have recently emphasised, it may be noted that the Investigation Committee's report has been postponed owing to the task being a greater one than had been imagined. At the same time, the directors report that the profits of the Company for the first six months of the current financial year show a considerable improvement, though they are unable to say whether this will be sustained, and in these circumstances do not think it expedient to make any payment on account of the Preference dividend. The £10 shares stand now at about 3½, and, being cumulative, are entitled to arrears of interest, but even at such a "rubbishy" figure they scarcely seem attractive. There are good reasons for believing that the coal trade has enjoyed a large degree of prosperity during the past year, and with prices still remunerative, profits ought still to be expanding. As evidence of the enlarged profit-earning capacity of the trade, it is interesting to refer to the higher interim distribution declared by Bromyeat, Brown, and Co. at the rate of 10 per cent., as against only 7½ per cent. a year ago, while the International Coal Company is in a position to distribute at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum for the half-year. Here is a table indicating the approximate yield obtainable upon Bank shares. The one drawback these possess is the liability in respect of uncalled capital, which, though it may be a somewhat remote risk, nevertheless exists:—

	Price.		Yield per Cent.
Barclay & Co. (£20—£8 paid)	26½		£4 9 6
Capital and Counties (£50—£10 paid)	40		4 9 0
Lloyds (£50—£8 paid)	32		4 10 0
London and County (£80—£20 paid)	94		4 5 0
London and Sth. Western (£50—£20 paid)	72½		4 8 0
London and Westminster (£100—£20 paid)	54		4 16 5
London City and Mid. (£60—£12½ paid)	50		4 9 0
London Joint Stock (£100—£15)	34		4 17 0

Cycle and Motor shares continue to absorb a considerable amount of interest, and, on the strength of the satisfactory outlook, values are rather well maintained. It seems probable, as I have remarked on a previous occasion, that prices may be established on a lower level before long, and the prospective purchaser does not stand to lose much by looking on for a while.

QUEER STORY.

UNCLE SANDY'S CHRISTMAS TIP.

ALEXANDER—commonly known among his acquaintances as Sandy—Flintinson, a stockbroker in a large way of business, was (unlike the generality of stockbrokers) about as stingy an individual as ever breathed. He was a bachelor; he was rich; and he had quite a number of struggling, and in most cases deserving, poor relations, whom it should have been the pleasure, as it was surely the duty, of such a man to help. But neither to them nor to any one else did he ever give anything away.

Stop, though! I am doing the man a wrong. Sandy Flintinson was once betrayed into an act of impulsive generosity—a circumstance so unique that it merits being placed on record. This is how it was.

Sandy had a nephew named Tom, his eldest brother's sole surviving son. Now Tom Flintinson was a good-hearted, easy-going, and somewhat improvident fellow, who had a berth in a mercantile house in the City at a salary of £300 a year. On this he had seen fit to marry, and, at the time of which I write, was the father of several healthy and hungry youngsters, whose large appetites and incurable habit of growing out of their clothes and boots made serious inroads on their father's slender purse.

Not that Tom grudged the cost of their maintenance. He was far from that sort. But he did find it difficult to make both ends meet, and was in a perpetual state of living from hand to mouth. Every now and then the financial question became positively acute. But Tom had somehow always managed to rub through these crises and to emerge from them smiling. Nothing ever damped his cheerfulness; and however black the future might loom, he never allowed himself to worry about it. Like Mr. Micawber, he was a sanguine fellow, always feeling sure that something was going to turn up. And these expectations were centred, in particular, upon one James Ferriman, his wife's godfather, an Anglo-Australian, resident in Sydney (where he had large commercial interests), and generally reputed to be worth at least half a million.

Old Ferriman made occasional trips to England, and on these occasions always came to see his god-daughter, and, in addition to making her small money presents, used to throw out hints, in a vague sort of way, of what he meant to do for her by and by. But these half-promises of substantial aid never came to anything; and Tom's wife had long abandoned any expectation of their ever doing so. Tom, however, incorrigibly sanguine, continued to pin his faith on the old gentleman's good intentions, and, as regularly as the Australian mail came in, looked for a big cheque from his wife's god-father. The cheque never came. But Tom still persisted, week after week, month after month, year after year, in expecting it.

With his Uncle Sandy, Tom had always been on quite good terms, though not even his sanguine disposition ever looked for anything from that quarter. Still, partly out of sheer good nature and partly, also, for the sake of his children—whom he hoped Uncle Sandy might ultimately remember in his will—Tom did the civil to the old man as far as he could, and, in particular, always invited him to spend Christmas. This invitation Uncle Sandy regularly accepted. It saved him the cost of his own Christmas dinner. It also saved him the cost of his servants' (whom he considerately sent home for a week's holiday during his absence.) And, besides, it amused him, in a cynical, sardonic sort of way, to see what a fuss Tom, his wife, and all the family made with him, and how they pretended to be quite delighted with the cheap, trumpery little presents (he never spent more than 10s. on the whole lot) that he made them.

Indeed, it was characteristic of the old churl that he took a malicious enjoyment in getting what he could out of others by encouraging them to expect a reward and then invariably disappointing them.

But one Christmas, when he went, as usual, to spend the week with his nephew, circumstances occurred which worked a complete and wondrous change in his behaviour. The circumstances were these:

Tom's wife had a letter on Christmas morning, written on foreign paper, the perusal of which caused her some evident excitement. Few men had keener eyes than Sandy Flintinson, and very little ever escaped him. He noticed the suppressed excitement in his niece-in-law's face as she read the letter—how her eyes beamed with delighted astonishment, how her colour came and went, and how her bosom heaved beneath the faded black bodice, which she was wearing, as a mark of respect for her godfather, Mr. Ferriman, of whose death she had recently been apprised. She said nothing, however; but, with a transparent affectation of calm indifference, laid the letter down on the table with the rest of her morning's correspondence.

Uncle Sandy said nothing either. But he had remarked all this—though pretending not to have done so—and it set him thinking. By nature he was the most inquisitive of old ferrets, always agog to worm out other people's secrets, and, his curiosity once aroused, he could never rest until it was satisfied. What were the contents of this foreign letter that had caused Tom's wife to look as she had done when she read it? Perhaps she would say something presently to enlighten him. If not, he would take steps to find out for himself.

He kept his eyes and ears wide open, on the chance of picking up hints, and by-and-by his vigilance met with its due reward. This was after breakfast, when, having had occasion to go up to his bedroom, and being now just about to descend the staircase on his return journey, he observed Tom and his wife talking together in low voices in the hall beneath. He stopped, pricked his ears, and listened intently:

"By Jove!" exclaimed Tom, who held the open letter in his hand; "By Jove! I say, Mab, this is something like, eh?"

"It's glorious, isn't it?" she replied. "It far surpasses my wildest dreams. Oh, Tom, dear Tom, I can hardly realise my our supreme good fortune."

"I don't wonder, Mab. Such a sudden Golconda thrown at your head, so to speak. Well, you see, I was right, old girl, after all."

"But you never expected so much as this, Tom."

"Well, no, I confess I didn't. By Jove! You're a rich woman now, Mab."

"We are all rich, Tom. For it is as much yours and the children's as it is mine. But I say, dear ——"

"What, Mab?"

"Don't let's say anything about it till we get the money. You see, it is just possible there might be some mistake, and ——"

"No fear of that," chuckled Tom, "the letter doesn't leave much room for doubt, does it? However, as you like, Mab. It's your show; not mine."

"Well, I would rather nothing was said about it just at present, Tom. It seems, somehow, like counting one's chickens before they're hatched, and ——"

"They are hatched in this case, my dear," interposed Tom, genially, "and hatched with some effect, too. But, of course, if you prefer it so, I won't say a word about it until you give me leave."

Then he kissed her affectionately, and they came up to get ready for church.

Uncle Sandy slipped noiselessly into his bedroom.

He had heard enough, and more than enough, to give him a strong clue to the truth. But he didn't mean to rest satisfied until he had actually seen the letter and informed himself of its contents. Yet how was that to be done? Uncle Sandy began to devise expedients in his cunning old brain.

When the family assembled to start for church, he pleaded a headache, and said he should stop at home. Both Tom and his wife were much concerned; they proffered various remedies, and Tom, the good-natured, even proposed remaining behind to keep his uncle company. Old Sandy, however, would not hear of this. He would not have any one put out for him, on any account.

"I had really rather be left quiet," he said. "I shall just take a nap on the sofa while you're at church. And by the time you return I hope I shall be all right."

So they departed and left him.

No sooner were they safely off the premises than he arose from the sofa, and began to prospect around for his niece-in-law's hand-bag, in which he knew she always kept her keys. The only servant was in the kitchen, busily occupied with cooking the midday dinner, so there was no one to interrupt him.

He found the bag in its customary place on a side-table, took out the keys, selected that of Mabel Flintinson's escritoire (which he knew very well indeed, for this was far from the first occasion on which the prying old ferret had rummaged, on the sly, among the lady's private papers), unlocked and opened the escritoire, where he felt certain he should find the letter for which he was looking, and where, sure enough, it was, lying open upon the top of the blotting-pad.

Immediately he possessed himself of it, and read it carefully through. It was from a firm of lawyers in Sydney, and ran as follows:—

RE JAMES FERRIMAN, DECD.

DEAR MADAM,—On behalf of our clients, the executors of the estate of Mr. James Ferriman, of this city, who died on October 20th last, we have pleasure to inform you that he has bequeathed to you the sum of £75,000, free of duty. And we shall be glad to receive your instructions, in due course, as to how you would like the amount remitted, whether by bankers' draft or otherwise. —Congratulating you upon your good fortune, we are, dear Madam, yours faithfully, TOMPKINS AND KEEFE.

Mrs. Mabel Flintinson,
1,500 Acacia Road, Balham, S.W., England.

Old Sandy's eyes glistened as he read that letter. £75,000! The very mention of such a sum made his mouth water. Tom and Mabel were a rich couple now—really worth cultivating. Besides, the money would want investing; and what more fitting than that he should be entrusted with that operation? Tom knew scarcely anything about business of this sort, and Mabel nothing at all. They would be entirely at his mercy. And there were all sorts of ways in which he might make pretty pickings. For one thing, he had some shares on his hands, just then, that he was particularly anxious to unload. And here was an admirable opportunity of getting rid of a thousand or two. Yes, yes (he told himself), he must certainly manage to get the investing of that legacy.

He replaced the letter in the escritoire, duly locked it up, then restored the keys to their bag. This done, he sat down to think.

One thing was certain. Now was the time—now, before he could be supposed to know anything of his niece-in-law's good fortune—to ingratiate himself with her and Tom.

If he deferred it, and in the meanwhile the fact of that legacy became known, then an unprecedented act of kindness, under such circumstances, would wear a horribly suspicious aspect. But such an act now, while he was still supposed to be in ignorance of Mabel's windfall, could not possibly be ascribed to any ulterior motive.

Yes, now was the time.

But exactly what to do and how to do it? After a few minutes thought he decided on his plan of action.

There was a custom in the Flintinson household—a custom for which, at this moment, Old Sandy felt devoutly thankful—that Chrstmas presents should not be opened until after the midday dinner; and so the trumpery little gifts—a cheap pocket-book and an equally cheap diary—which he had presented, respectively, to Tom and Mabel, still lay unopened on the sideboard in the drawing-room.

Here old Sandy saw his chance. He stole into the dining-room, took the two little parcels, opened them, wrote two cheques for £50 each, placed one in either parcel, carefully tied them up again, and restored them to their places on the sideboard.

This was the first time in his whole life that he had given away a hundred pounds, or, for that matter, a hundred shillings, to any of his relations. But he did it now, and did it even cheerfully, seeing therein a safe and immediate return of some hundreds per cent. sterling.

"There," he said, to himself. "After that, they'll be so pleased with me that they'll be sure to come to me about the investment of the money. And even if they don't—well, I know what Tom is: improvident, unbusinesslike, unsuspicious, open-handed young fool; and I'll get my money back, a good many times over, from him somehow. Oh, yes. I'll nurse him to my own profit, you bet. Tom will be as wax in my experienced hands."

And Old Sandy gave vent to an unpleasant chuckle.

Soon afterwards, Tom and Mabel, with the three youngsters, knowing nothing, of course, of Uncle Sandy's nefarious rummaging in the escritoire and his consequent deep-laid schemes, returned from church; and they all sat down to dinner, the company including two bachelor friends of Tom's, whom this incurably hospitable spendthrift had invited to join them.

After dinner came the opening of the presents. And then you should have seen Mabel's face when she found that £50 wrapped round her diary; and you should have seen Tom's face when he found the other £50 cheque wrapped round his pocket-book. Surprise, delight, gratitude—these words are only feeble indications of what their physiognomies showed.

Mabel rose from her seat, holding the precious blue slip of stamped paper above her head.

"Oh, Tom! Tom! See what dear uncle has given me!"

And she ran round to where the old gentleman sat, and throwing her arms round his neck, kissed him impulsively on both cheeks.

"You dear, good, kind Santa Claus," she exclaimed with eager gratitude.

Tom was equally delighted and scarcely less moved. He didn't kiss his uncle, of course, being an Englishman. But he grasped him warmly by the hand, thanking him again and again.

Uncle Sandy, who, though well pleased by the success of his opening move for ingratiating himself with his nephew and niece-in-law, yet found the novel rôle of philanthropic benefactor rather embarrassing, waved their repeated thanks aside with a modestly deprecating gesture.

"My dear boy—my dear girl—only too pleased to have the opportunity of giving you a pleasant little surprise this Christmas. Times have been so bad of late years that I really had to look at every shilling. But now that things have looked up a bit and I've a balance to the good—it delights me—I assure you it delights me—to be able to—to—give you some small practical proof of my—ahem!—regard—and—ahem!—affection. There! there! God bless you both, my dears. And no more thanks, please, else I shall really have to run away."

And he did his best to look the disinterestedly benevolent; and did not do it badly, either, considering what a scheming old skin-flint he really was.

At the end of his week, Uncle Sandy returned home. He calculated that it would take some three months for Mabel to get an answer from the Sydney lawyers, and that, therefore, he need not expect to be consulted by Tom about the investment of the money at least until the expiration of that period.

But when the beginning of April came and still Tom, though they had frequently met, had said nothing to him about the matter, he began to feel a little uneasy as to whether his nephew had not, perhaps, placed his business elsewhere. By the middle of May, this uneasy feeling had reached such a pitch that he decided to broach the subject on the first opportunity, by pretending that he had heard the news of James Ferriman's bequest from an independent source.

A few days later, he met Tom one morning in Cornhill and seized his chance.

"Tom, you lucky dog, what is this I hear about you?" he exclaimed, clapping his nephew playfully upon the shoulder, when cordial greetings had been exchanged.

"Eh! What's up now, uncle?" replied the young man, evidently surprised.

"Oh! I've heard all about it, my dear boy, from a man I know in business. I am indeed glad that Ferriman did the right thing by Mabel in his will, after all, and I do congratulate you both most heartily."

Tom looked more and more astonished and puzzled.

"Well now, this is a most extraordinary thing," he said. "The more so as Mabel did get a letter from some lawyers in Sydney several months ago informing her that she had come into £75,000 under her godfather's will; but she and I agreed to say nothing about it until she actually got the money. And I'm glad now that we did; for the whole thing, letter and all, have proved to be simply a hoax."

"A hoax?"

And Uncle Sandy turned at least two shades paler and there was an instant diminution of the previous cordiality of his manner.

"Yes," proceeded his nephew; "A stupid, spiteful hoax, perpetrated by some one who had a grudge against us, I suppose; though I can't think who or why. But what strikes me as the most extraordinary point about the whole affair is how your friend can possibly have heard of this imaginary legacy, when neither Mab nor I have breathed a word of it to a single soul."

"Oh, things do—do get about in a most—most astonishing manner," replied his Uncle Sandy, hastily; "and I'm rather in a hurry now. Good morning, Thomas."

And off he went, without even waiting to shake hands.

Never in all his life had he felt so angry with himself as he did at this moment, and bitterly did he curse his own premature generosity, which had betrayed him into throwing away, for nothing, a whole hundred pounds.

These bitter reflections were disturbed by the sound of his nephew's voice, Tom having run after him and caught him up.

"I say, uncle?"

"What?" demanded the old gentleman, curtly.

"You're quite sure you didn't see that spiteful practical joker's letter?"

CITY LIBRARY Handwork Library Lower Level

"Certainly not, Thomas. Certainly not," replied Uncle Sandy, very red in the face, and putting on an air of righteous indignation at the mere suggestion. "What the devil do you mean, sir, by accusing me of the low, sneaking behaviour of prying into other people's correspondence?"

"Oh, I don't accuse you, uncle," answered Tom, quietly, "only Mabel happened to detect that some one had been at her escritoire, and it did cross my mind that it was just possible—however, your denial is quite good enough for me, and extremely glad I am to hear you deny it, too, uncle; as otherwise people might have said ——"

"Well, what might they have said, sir?" demanded his uncle, irritably, as Tom paused in the middle of his sentence.

"Why, that I had laid a little trap, uncle, to stimulate your generosity. Of course, it was really nothing of the sort. Only you know how suspicious people are. But they won't be able to say that now, because, if you never saw the letter, of course the suggestion of such a thing falls to the ground. For you couldn't have been induced to give us that hundred pounds by a letter you never saw, could you, uncle?"

And Tom smiled at his miserly relative, genially.

Then Uncle Sandy saw how it was. Tom and Mabel had discovered his habit of prying in the latter's escritoire, and had purposely set a trap for him. And the worst of it was he couldn't say a word without giving himself away as a bare-faced liar and a mean old sneak.

No doubt they had taken this into consideration in laying their plans and were now chuckling over his discomfiture—and, well, if ever an elderly stockbroker was reduced to speechless and impotent madness, Sandy Flintinson was the stockbroker at that moment.

ART NOTES.

OLD MASTERS AT BURLINGTON HOUSE.

QUITE the most obvious reflection aroused by the Old Masters now being shown at the Academy's Winter Exhibition is of the enormous number of such pictures that are contained in private and public collections in this country. Year by year these exhibitions are held. I see by the catalogue that this is the thirty-eighth—and always new treasures are being brought forward—and will so continue, no doubt, for another thirty-eight years to come. How it shows up the disinterested hollowness of the cry which is always raised whenever a picture of importance is supposed to be in danger of being sold to a foreign purchaser—that it is a scandal to allow such masterpieces to leave England! I do not suppose there is another country in the world—not even Italy, for there the collections are almost entirely of "home-grown" pictures—which contains one-half of the art treasures, either in number, value, or catholicity, that are to be found in England in public or private ownership. And yet we profess to grudge that the poor Americans should try to advance themselves a little higher in the scale of civilisation by paying fantastically high prices for a few of our pictures.

The present exhibition serves to show us, too, like its predecessors, what a very long way we have gone since the days of these same so-called Old Masters. Indeed, you have only to look round the first room—on any other day but the Private View, be it said, when, as I can bear witness, nothing is to be seen but representatives of that great middle-class which is the bulwark of Britannia—you have only just to look round the first room, I say, to realise how hopelessly old-fashioned these same Old Masters have become. There is not a single one of them who would have the slightest chance of being elected a member of the New English Art Club to-day. I do not believe there is a single one of them who would have the slightest chance of getting any of his pictures hung at the International (which has just opened its doors at the New Gallery, by the way, and about which I hope to say something next week) unless he had some very powerful and influential friends indeed. The truth of the matter is, these Old Fashioned Masters did not have the slightest idea of the true meaning of the word Art as we know it. Without wishing to be too hard upon them, it is difficult to speak of them as anything but mean-spirited grovellers. They appear to have thought, judging from their performances, that to paint a fine picture you require to put yourself on the same plane with any ordinary workman and work at it as steadily and industriously as if it were a chair or table you were turning out! Artizans, indeed, they might deserve to be called; but Artists! Why, I do solemnly declare that it is little short of an insult to mention them in the same breath with some of the geniuses who turn out masterpieces for us to-day! And yet there are to be found people old-fashioned enough to value them—to pay high prices for them, to boot—while the great works of such New Masters as Mr. Squidge, say, or Mr. MacSmudge, are left to wither in their creators' studies! Why should this be?

I am very much afraid it is because the public have not yet learned to take the artist at his own valuation. They do not understand—though I am sure they have been told so often enough—that in Art cleverness is everything, and that the infinite capacity for taking pains is only a sign of mediocrity. They are absurd enough to expect that a picture shall look, to their purblind eyes, something like what it professes to represent. If you show them two strokes of burnt sienna, set off in a purple mist, and tell them that it is the only really artistic way of painting a young lady smelling a basket of roses—they simply will not believe you. You offer them a really masterly portrait—and they protest that they like flesh-tints that suggest flesh and features that bear some faint resemblance to human features. There is a little portrait in the first room at Burlington House just now. It is by a man called Holbein—that is to say, it is supposed to be, for, if I mistake not, it has only recently been re-discovered. And if it is not a Holbein, it certainly ought to be, for it is an excellent example of his work. It represents a woman with rather a long nose, and thin lips, but with an amiable expression notwithstanding, in three-quarter profile, looking out of the canvas. Her complexion is, by the way, rather pinker than is usually the case with Holbein. She is wearing a brown dress and an elaborate coif. The whole is painted as simply and unheroically as possible; yet I would not mind wagering any reasonable sum that there are thousands and thousands of people—so-called Christians, mark you—who would rather own that one little portrait than all the portraits that all the members of the New English Art Club and the International Society, taken together, have turned out between them in the last five years. So much for public taste!

Then, in the same room, there is another painting, by an Italian fellow called Botticelli, of a Virgin and Child. It only shows you how incomprehensibly ignorant of the real purpose of Art these old masters were, when I say that he has made the face of the Virgin absolutely beautiful, so that it does you good to look at it! As if that was not enough, both of them—Holbein and Botticelli, I mean—have gone about their work in the most mean-spirited, grovelling way it is possible to imagine. They have laid on their paint with a ridiculous care that is absolutely miserly. You cannot see a single bold, flowing, squishy brush-stroke in either picture. They might both have been photographers, so careful have they been to put in the various objects they delineate, so that the lowest and most unintelligent spectator can recognise them at once. All this playing down to the gallery, laying themselves out to attract the attention of the public, pandering to the popular taste, in order to fill their pockets, might have been well enough had they been haberdashers, but they are supposed, even now, to have been artists.

The same awful moral is driven home deeper and deeper in every room that you enter. The second one is full of Dutch paintings—so-called—and it is almost pathetic to see the way they have, in their unknowing boorishness, set all the canons of Art, as we have now come to know them, at defiance. Then, in the big room, there are no end of portraits, by Reynolds and Gainsborough, and people like that. I give you my solemn word of honour that there is not a single portrait among them all that is hideous—those degraded painters have actually gone out of their way to produce portraits of pretty young women which shall show how pretty they are. They have given them complexions which are quite disgustingly human. There is not a single one among them all that is swathed in a purple, or a green, or a yellow, fog—there is not one of them that is at all deformed. It is a most depressing spectacle to one who really knows what Art is—nowadays. It has one comforting aspect, though—it does show us how very, very far our modern portraitists, of the really go-ahead, up-to-date schools, have gone away from the ideas which prevailed in the times of those Gainsboroughs, Reynolds, yes, and Holbeins, Franz Hals, and Rembrandts as well. There is, indeed, no comparison between them.

It is not difficult to see what was really the matter with all those Old-Fashioned Masters. They had not even begun to perceive what an artist really is. They had no idea that he is a man apart from other men, on an altogether higher level, one who must not be judged by mere human standpoints. They did not understand that as soon as a man slips his thumb through a palette he becomes, in one word, a genius; that knowledge and power all come to him without his having to work for them, that the slightest stroke of the brush, even if he do it with his eyes shut, is, and must be, a stroke of genius. They set about learning their trade just like any other tradesman; they painted their pictures as near as they could paint them to sordid, commonplace, human ideals. Can we wonder that sordid, commonplace humanity liked them, and continues to like them, and, very likely, will go on liking them to the end of the chapter, let the Neo-artists and the Neo-critics together do what they may to point out the error of their ways. It is all very distressing—and there really seems no way out of it. Because the worst of it is, no one has yet found a way of—shall I say—fooling all the people all the time, and until somebody does, it is very much to be feared that people will always be found to place a high value on the old-fashioned works of the Old-Fashioned Masters, and to turn their backs on the infinitely more up-to-date productions of the New!

MUSIC.

MUSICAL ENDS AND MEANS.

SIR EDWARD ELGAR'S recent comments, with special reference to Brahms's third symphony, on the relative merits of loud and soft endings to musical works stimulates thought on an interesting subject. In this, as in other respects, fashion and custom have greatly altered from time to time. How sublimely simple, for example, was the practice of Bach under this head. Having said what he has to say, he concludes without a single superfluous note. The way in which it is done would often be considered abrupt by modern writers, though it seldom or never seems so in the case of Bach. Even such a colossal work as the Matthew Passion is thus concluded. The last musical sentence is completed, and therewith the work is ended. Very different was the practice of Beethoven. In the case of some of his symphonies it seems to the hearer as though the final chords would never end. The necessity of each one was carefully considered, no doubt, by the composer, but to modern ears it is certain that they often seem more numerous than necessary, and modern practice has certainly tended in a different direction. How superb are some of Wagner's endings, for instance. Here there is no reiterated banging of final tonic chords—on the contrary, the musical interest is maintained down to the last note, with usually just one long drawn chord by way of a final full stop. A particularly beautiful instance is that afforded by the closing bars of "Tristan," with its curious inner part introduced, recalling, oddly enough, a passage from "Die Walküre." Another highly characteristic and enormously effective ending of an entirely different kind was that added to the "Walkürenritt" for concert purposes—an absolute inspiration in its way, contrasting strikingly with the "lame and impotent conclusions" distinguishing the ordinary Wagnerian excerpt when a concert ending has had to be provided by other hands. With what magical art also does Wagner utilise the harp upon occasion to heighten the effectiveness of his concluding bars. The overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Parsifal," and the final pages of "Tristan" all supply familiar instances.

Later composers have been for the most part content to follow more or less on the Wagnerian lines in this matter, in the sense of making their endings an organic part of the composition as a whole, and not merely the rather tiresome and obvious repetition of the tonic chord which did duty in earlier times; but Richard Strauss here, as elsewhere, has shown himself daringly original. No one acquainted with his works will need to be reminded, for instance, of the unique effect which he resorts to in the case of "Also sprach Zarathustra," the philosophic content of which is illustrated by its ending on a discord formed by combination of the harmonies of C and B. A happier instance of Strauss's practice in this matter is supplied, perhaps, by the lovely little epilogue which brings "Till Eulenspiegel" so felicitously to an end. Till has been hanged to every accompaniment of horror, we have heard the death rattle in his throat, his last wild shriek of anguish, and the final thud which portends his dissolution, and then comes that delicious postlude to remind us that it is only a story after all, and that even for such a reprobate as Till there is hope of forgiveness. This particular passage is only one of many, by the way, in which Strauss has displayed his marvellous skill in what used to be called, when Liszt first brought the practice into prominence, thematic metamorphosis. The theme of the epilogue is note for note identical with that of Till himself (as it is also, of course, with that of the introduction of the work), but marvellously transformed in character by the alteration of its rhythm, harmonisation, and so on.

As regards the particular point raised by Sir Edward Elgar, not all will agree with him probably. "It was customary in Mozart's time," he observes, "to end up loudly, and, of course, nobody applauded nowadays unless a thing did end up loudly. That was the one reason why Brahms's third symphony was not so popular as the others." For one thing, is the suggestion quite accurate that Brahms's third symphony is less popular than its fellows? So far from this being so, a record of performances would show, I fancy, that, along with the second symphony, it is the most popular of the four. This is only a detail, however. Sir Edward's main contention that quiet endings make for less applause than loud ones is doubtless quite a sound one, though there is no need to assume that a custom dating from Mozart's time has anything to do with the matter. A more natural explanation is to be found in purely psychological reasons, in virtue of which a strepitous ending naturally acts more forcibly on the nervous system, and thereby provokes a more vigorous response. Tchaikowsky's Pathetic symphony supplies a good instance bearing on the point. Its last movement, though fine in its way as any, seldom provokes anything like the applause elicited by its more vigorous predecessors, simply because it is mournful in character and ends pianissimo. Sir Edward Elgar's own practice in the matter of endings has, by the way, before now been the subject of criticism—as in the case of his Enigma variations, many of which conclude with almost startling abruptness; the same remark applying to the work as a whole as it was originally conceived. Afterwards, it will be remembered, at the suggestion, as is it has been stated, of Dr. Richter, the composer reconsidered the matter, and wrote a new final section, which lacks nothing in respect of its brilliance and effectiveness. After all, it is not only the first step that counts. There is much virtue also in a happy ending

This is to inform the Patrons of the Grand Hotel, Cannes, that a large Restaurant has recently been erected, overlooking the gardens.—A. Menge, Proprietor.

The event of the coming week will be the opening of the German opera season at Covent Garden on Monday, when, according to the latest arrangements, "Die Meistersinger" is to be given (without cuts) under Herr Reichwein. "Tristan und Isolde" is now to be given, with Nikisch at the head of affairs, on Tuesday. Herr Reichwein is quite a young conductor, of whom, however, report speaks very favourably. He is at present engaged at Mannheim, but he is shortly going to the Imperial Opera at Vienna. Herr Ernst Kraus will be the Walther, and Herr Feinhals Hans Sachs in the case of the opening performance. On the second night Van Dyck will be the Tristan, Mme. Litvinne the Isolde, and Miss Marie Brema Brangäne. But the real "prima donna" of this particular performance will be Herr Nikisch, who has never conducted opera in London before.

Hearty congratulations to Mr. Neil Forsyth on the announcement of his betrothal. One who has resisted during so many years the matrimonial perils attendant upon the position of an operatic manager might well be regarded as proof against all assaults; but Mr. Forsyth has succumbed at last. This is a Covent Garden "engagement" of a kind whose periodical renewal will not be necessary.

Very widespread and genuine regret has been caused in musical circles by the painfully sudden death of Mr. E. F. Jacques, the well-known musical critic. Though he had practised the calling little over twenty years Mr. Jacques had come to be regarded as one of the veterans of the profession, but most of his friends will have been none the less shocked to hear of his unexpected and premature death. A man of the most genial temperament, he was a highly cultivated musician and a sound critic, whose judgments were none the less respected because they were invariably couched in kindly and considerate terms. Perhaps some of the very best work which Mr. Jacques did is contained in the admirable analytical notes which he wrote for the Promenade and other concerts. In earlier days Mr. Jacques was editor of the Musical World, and later of the Musical Times, while he was musical critic of the Observer for many years.

The proceedings of the Incorporated Society of Musicians last week seem to have been rather more interesting than usual, though this is, perhaps, not saying a very great deal. Prout on Bach is always stimulating, if only by reason of the pleasure to be derived from the contemplation of unstinted enthusiasm. Dealing with the church cantatas, Dr. Prout made a good point when he reminded his hearers of the hopelessly limited and inadequate nature of the resources at Bach's command for the interpretation of those masterly and often sublime creations. Dr. Prout is probably the greatest worshipper of Bach who has ever lived. Not a day of his life passes without his playing one or more of the "Forty-eight," to each of which, as many will be aware, he has given a special title, in accordance with its character—some of a very amusing description, for Dr. Prout is full of fun.

Among other musical jeux d'esprit which Dr. Prout has perpetrated may be named a comical hotch-potch, or quodlibet, working in motives and melodies of all sorts, ancient and modern, with humorous words to match, on the subject of Bach's fugues, copies of which, from their scarcity, now fetch a high figure among collectors of such trifles. One of the last was disposed of by auction by Dr. Prout himself a few years ago after one of the I.S.M. dinners, being knocked down, amid much amusement, at a very high figure, the proceeds going to charity. Dr. Prout, who is full of amusing anecdotes, tells a good story of a provincial concert programme, the annotation of which upon Gounod's popular perversion of Bach's first prelude ran as follows: "This beautiful melody was composed by Bach, who, on his dying bed, requested that the harmony might be entrusted to M. Gounod."

Another interesting paper heard at the Conference seems to have been that on vocal culture, by Dr. W. H. Cummings, who, though best known to-day as the Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, was, of course, in earlier years one of the most popular tenors of his time. Characteristic was that story of Sims Reeves which he introduced. Reeves had refused to sing the recitatives in a performance of Bach's Matthew Passion at Exeter Hall, and suggested Dr. Cummings as a substitute, genially observing, "He is such a donkey, he will do anything." To-day there will hardly be two opinions as to who was the real donkey in this case.

The reports of these annual musical conferences in the daily papers are usually responsible for some amusing misprints. One which appeared last week was delicious. The cacophonous tendency of modern music, Mr. Carlowitz Ames was reported as saying, was exemplified by composers who deliberately allowed overtures to be played in conjunction with their harmony. Needless to say overtones, not overtures, was the word used. Another remark ascribed to the same speaker lacked nothing in point of vigour and picturesqueness:—

> They (British publishers) had other work to do than try to foster and engender a better taste in the purchasing public. They found it paid them better to produce the perpetrations of the royalty ballad-mongers, who poured forth the turgid flood of musical garbage that the British public still loved to batten on.

It is to be hoped that no royalty ballad-mongers were present.

This reminds me, by the way, of an amusing story which Mr. Cecil Sharp might have included, though he has not done so, in the entertaining reminiscences of a folk-song collector which he has been contributing to the Musical Times. In the course of one of his lectures on the folk-song he had been laying about him, much after the manner of Mr. Ames, in regard to the deplorable quality of the popular songs of the day, and on the conclusion of his address was about to take his departure, when a very pleasant-spoken gentleman came up and introduced himself. He had, he said, listened with the greatest delight to all of Mr. Sharp's remarks, and agreed with every word he said as to the superiority of the old songs over those of to-day. Unfortunately, he continued, he himself was one of the best-known and most popular composers of the latter. He wished he could do better, but he couldn't, and also he had his living to get. Exactly how Mr. Sharp extracted himself from this embarrassing situation I forget. But I am sure it gave him a better insight into the bearings of a somewhat complex problem than he possessed before. After all, even a royalty ballad-monger is a man and a brother.

Dr. Cowen has been discoursing on the subtle connection which has so long been observed to exist between long hair and musical genius, and under all the circumstances of the case ("not being himself addicted to the long hair habit," as one paper politely puts it), he must be complimented on the open-minded and impartial spirit in which he has handled a delicate and important subject. As to how it is done, Dr. Cowen confesses himself at a loss. "When I contemplate," he says, "the portraits of the most eminent of living players, be they pianists or violinists, I find heads of hair of such appalling luxuriance that I can only stand aghast and wonder how they do it." That irreverent humorist, Mr. Zangwill, once suggested that artists wear their hair long in many cases for the same reason that they wear their hats long—because it comes cheaper; but whether this is a really complete account of the matter I will not undertake to say.

A writer in the January Musical Opinion, discussing the subject of oratorio librettos, makes a curious slip. "Verses from the Bible," he says, "however beautiful they may be, seldom give the continuity which is required, and they contain much that is not required for music. . . . the Beatitudes—as arranged for César Franck's oratorio—make a good libretto; but best of all is the Requiem Mass. If you think of the wonderful works written by Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, and Brahms you will admit the truth of this contention." Now the amusing thing is that the Requiem of Brahms is not a setting of the Mass at all, but is based on a libretto composed of just those verses from the Bible which the writer condemns as unsuitable. In the ordinary way, probably, the composer is safest who sticks to the Bible in the case of sacred works. Thereby one is spared, at least, such bathos and bad poetry as usually disfigure the products of the other kind, even in the case of such highly esteemed examples as, say, "The Golden Legend" and "The Dream of Gerontius."

The Grand Duke Michael of Russia, I read, while recently prostrated with an attack of influenza, passed the time away by composing a piece of music in the form of a march, which has proved so successful that it is being utilised by military bands in Germany. In recognition of its origin it has received the name of the "Influenza March." Its music ought obviously to be catchy.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"Some of your adventures are almost incredible," said the publisher of Colonel Robertson's "Personal Adventures and Anecdotes" (1) to the author, and not the least incredible is the charge of an army 30,000 strong outside Lucknow, during the Indian Mutiny, by the colonel at the head of a few hundred men. As in the charge of the Six Hundred at Balaclava, "some one had blundered" in giving the desperate order, but in this case it was a most fortunate blunder, since it routed an army without the loss of a man! As the colonel's account reads like a page out of Charles O'Malley, I cannot resist giving it to you in full:—

"Where are the guns?" I asked. "I will show you," he said. I replied, "Come on." We started off at once, first at a trot and then at a gallop, when suddenly to our great astonishment we found ourselves on the right flank of the rebel army, some 30,000 strong, drawn up in a perfect line, as if on parade. The officer who brought the order led us right along the front of the whole of this force and only about a hundred yards from them. A terrific running fire and a perfect hail of bullets streamed over our heads; but miraculously, I may say, throughout the whole of this gallop not a man or horse was hit, and the only casualty I could ascertain was a ball through the trumpet-major's trumpet. When we arrived at the other flank of the line the officer cried, "There are the guns," pointing to two guns which were in the act of being loaded, and were being supported by a strong party of rebel infantry. I gave the command, "Left wheel, charge!" and we rode right at them. I was leading in front of everybody in the hope of getting at the guns before they were loaded. The first man I encountered was a fat old native officer who evidently commanded the supports. As I came towards him he made a fierce cut at me with his tulwar, but missed his blow, and as I passed him at full gallop I drew my sword across his naked throat, and the blood spurted right up to the hilt of my sword. Instantly after this, a second man cut at me, but I caught the blow on my sword, dropped my point, and ran him through the throat, breaking six inches off the edge of my sword. At the same instant, a man at the other side hit at me, fortunately missing his blow, and I struck him fair over the head and dropped him. Just then, about 100 yards in front of me, I saw a sepoy with his finger on the trigger of his musket, aiming directly at my chest. I swerved my horse to the right and called out in Hindustani to the man, "Run away, and I won't hurt you." For an instant he hesitated with his finger on the trigger, then threw the musket on his shoulder, and went off like a greyhound. There was a short sharp fight, and not a man of the enemy was left alive, except those who saved themselves by flight. Fancy our astonishment when we saw almost the whole of this great army in full flight back to Lucknow!"

There! If you found this exploit ascribed by Lever or Conan Doyle to one of their heroes you would mutter "Baron Munchausen!" It is true that Outram in his dispatch credits Colonel Robertson only with "dashing into a flying enemy," instead of having actually put them to flight; but the Colonel makes out a good case for his own version of the affair. It is characteristic of our War Office that the military train, which did such yeoman's service during the Mutiny, that a salute was fired from the guns of Fort William upon the departure of the corps from India, was at once disbanded on its arrival in England, and had to sell all its mess property to repay a grateful Government a donation of £200 it had advanced twelve years before for the furnishing of the corps with mess utensils! Again, Sergeant Shields, who had enlisted into the cavalry for twenty-three years' service, and who had served all but a couple of months of that period with an absolutely unblemished record, was then dismissed against his will, and refused his full pension because of the dismissal—because he had not served the full term which he was not allowed to serve! Colonel Robertson's reminiscences seem to contain a more or less thrilling adventure in every page. In one page you find him waking up one morning to discover a large cobra coiled round his leg for warmth. In another he is woken up at midnight by an insane doctor, who is sitting on his chest, and is about to cut his throat. In another he wakes to find a gigantic negro groping for his throat to cut it. In another he lowers himself into a hyæna's den to find himself face to face, not with one, but with an entire pack of these brutes. In another he is being trampled upon by a rogue elephant, while in another he has a narrow escape from a man-eating tiger. In another he is sitting with a naked light in a ship's powder magazine, while in another a piece of shell strikes and staves in a keg of rum he holds between his knees (serving out the liquor to his men in the Crimea) without disconcerting him or causing the loss of much of the spirit. These and other like accidents and adventures, of course, extend over a life as long as it was eventful, since when the Colonel joined his regiment in India it was armed with flint-locks! Indeed, at the interesting Veteran's Parade held at Edinburgh by King Edward in May, 1903, Colonel Robertson was the only surviving officer or man who had been through the first great Sikh War under Sir Hugh Gough. Dr. Margaret Todd's "Growth" (2) is a little distracting, so many are its characters, and so minute are its details. It is, in fact, too long, too discursive, detailed, and also, perhaps, too well written for the ordinary novel reader to appreciate it at its full value, as an admirable psychological study of two or three characters. The fall and rising again of Dalgleish is excellently conceived and represented, while the development in the opposite direction of Thatcher, who finds a haven of rest in the Roman Communion, is no less naturally and sympathetically described. Over against them, and yet more excellently delineated than they, are the heroine and her sister, and these characters help you through some dull and distracting chapters and compensate you for the lack of a strong or striking plot. Nor is the late Nora Chesson's exquisitely conceived and written "Father Felix's Chronicles" (3) a work that will delight the ordinary novel reader. It is rather a prose poem than a novel, and a prose poem dealing with times and men and events that seem dim as a dream, in spite of the author's imaginative realisation of them. The chronicles are represented as having been written by an old Norwich monk, who can recall the days when Richard II. was dethroned, and what story there is has to do with a conspiracy to restore King Dickon. But there is little story, and the charm of the book lies chiefly in the power by which Mrs. Chesson realises, and helps you to realise, the point of view of the chronicler. "The Man Apart" (4) is a dismal, cynical story, whose characters are either repellent or uninteresting—chiefly repellent. Its hero, while loving the heroine, keeps an actress, whom he abandons heartlessly, and finally murders. After the murder he falls down a cliff into the sea, and you feel relieved to be done with him and his base and brutal life and love. "Richard Hawkwood" (5) is a tale of the turbulent and treacherous days of Lorenzo de Medici admirably told. From the first page to the last Mr. Neville Maugham keeps you breathlessly interested in the fortunes of his English hero, who steers a bold but safe course through a stormy and treacherous sea, and reaches at last the haven where he would be—of a happy marriage.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

What a pity it is that the betterment of the physical condition of the rising generation does not excite some of the zeal which is expended so lavishly on sectarian squabbles over their spiritual welfare! This is the reflection which must occur to most people on reading Sir John Gorst's book, "The Children of the Nation" (Methuen and Co., price 7s. 6d. net). Of course, the facts on which it is based are not altogether new. Every one realises in a vague sort of way that there is a vast amount of preventable infant mortality, that numbers of children are underfed and overworked and improperly treated and trained through the negligence and ignorance, as well as through the poverty of their parents. Sir John Gorst, however, not only shows very vividly the extent of the evil and the danger it involves to the future of the race, but puts forward a series of proposals for remedying the present shocking state of things. No doubt his proposals will be denounced as rank Socialism. There are so many people who, though they insist that it is the duty of the State to concern itself with the saving of the souls of the children, are yet horrified at the idea of the State doing anything to improve their bodily health.

Mr. Putnam Weale's book, "Indiscreet Letters from Pekin," which is being issued by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, forms virtually a diary of the siege and its perils.

Under the title of "The Battle of Tsu-Shima," Mr. John Murray has published (price 3s. 6d. net) a translation of a book by Captain Vladimir Semenoff, a Russian naval officer who was on board the Suvoroff during that memorable engagement. Sir George S. Clarke contributes a preface in which he dwells upon the importance of the lessons naval experts may gather from the book. Captain Semenoff's account of the battle, however, is so vivid and thrilling that it will make an equally powerful appeal to readers who are not primarily interested in naval questions.

"Records of a Country Vicarage" (John Long, 6s.) is an entertaining anecdotal volume by the Rev. Robert Yates Whytehead, Rector of Lawford. With materials partly gathered from old family papers and partly furnished from his own experiences and recollections, Mr. Whytehead fully succeeds in his modest project of giving "a more or less interesting glimpse of the amusing side of country life." Of the country clergy particularly he tells not a few good stories. Here, for instance, is one of a sporting parson at Easington, a place on the coast which was a favourite landing-place for woodcocks at the time of their immigration to this country. When the birds arrived, exhausted by their long flight, everybody in the parish, including the parson, at once turned out to join in the sport of knocking them down with sticks:—

> One Sunday the people were in church and the parson in the pulpit when the church door was cautiously opened and a head appeared with a beckoning finger. . . . . "Well, what is it?" said the parson. "Cocks is coom!" The parson hurriedly shut up his sermon case. "Shut the door and lock it," he cried, to the clerk. "Keep the people in church till I've got my surplice off. Let's all have a fair chance."

Yet another posthumous novel by Miss Adeline Sergeant—at least half a dozen must have been published already—is announced by Messrs. Methuen and Co. It is entitled "The Quest of Geoffrey Darrell," and it will be issued in a few days.

"With Byron in Italy" (Fisher Unwin, price 5s.) is the first of a series of books intended to show on the one hand the influence of Italy on great English writers, and on the other the light which their works throw on Italian life, history, and art. The present volume contains a collection of those poems and letters of Lord Byron which are connected with his life in Italy from 1816 to 1823. Mrs. A. B. McMahan, who made the selection, furnishes an introduction and notes, and there are a number of illustrations of scenes made famous by Byron.

Mr. T. H. S. Escott's new book, "Society in the Country House: Anecdotal Records of Six Centuries," which was announced a considerable time since, is being published this week by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

Mr. Keighley Snowden's new novel, "Kate Bannister"—the romance of a great Yorkshire singer—will be published this month by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

Apropos of the Ameer's visit to India, it may be mentioned that Messrs. Harper have nearly ready a book by Mr. Frank A. Martin, which is the outcome of eight years' residence in Afghanistan. It is entitled "Under the Absolute Ameer," and will be illustrated from the author's own drawings and from photographs.

In connection with the reports from Belgrade of a conspiracy for the removal of King Peter from the Servian throne, attention may be directed to a recently published book entitled "A Royal Tragedy" (Eveleigh Nash, price 7s. 6d. net), in which M. Mijatovich tells the story of the assassination of King Alexander and Queen Draga. M. Mijatovich, who is well known here as the former Servian Minister in London, has a thorough acquaintance with the facts of the plot and the crime in which it culminated, and his narrative is remarkably interesting.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Have you noticed in what favour "the lean man" is in the fiction of the moment? From every page of the novels one reads this gaunt creature peers out, wondering (and well he may) what readers think of him. Leanness is, to all appearance, his single characteristic, except, perhaps, that he is clean-shaven. Clean and lean. What fascination! But can you understand why the hero of a story should always be described as lean? The ideal man has enough flesh on his bones to save him from this suggestion of semi-starvation, and yet not so much as would allow him to be fat. Perhaps it is because there are so many portly persons in the world that the writer of romances flies to the other extreme and produces the attenuated hero.

Height, too. The woman novelist almost invariably depicts her hero as six foot two in his stockings. Why, by the way, this roundabout way of saying "without his boots"? Men's heroes of fiction are seldom so tall. Six foot seems inches enough for them, and occasionally one or two are "of medium height." This is a moderation that a woman novelist would regard as misplaced when dealing with the stature of the male being.

I read once in some book this question: "Did you ever yet meet a lovable woman with a perfect profile?" Have you any experience on the subject? I know two or three persons with perfect profiles. Perhaps I have never tried to love any of them. We were talking over this the other day, and Richard said that he had never yet seen anyone with a very short upper lip that he could really like. Here was a fresh idea. I suppose these notions go to prove that we are not yet educated up to perfection, and that it irritates us to observe symptoms of superlative excellence in anybody. A perfect profile and a short upper lip are admirable things. Why should there be an apparently prevalent idea that they do not often accompany amiability of character?

Do you know any one that you consider really perfect? Do tell me! I have one or two friends that Important to Ladies.—You can get the real genuine Horrockses' Longcloths and Flannelettes if you insist on seeing this stamp on the selvedge: 'Horrockses.' Obtainable from the principal Drapers. Over a century's reputation.

I can scarcely see a fault in. Very, very rarely one of them loses her temper. It is over in a minute, and I just love her for not being quite, quite perfect. The other friend has a little fault of over-candour which overtakes her now and then, and chills one a little bit. Still, it is friendly and brave of her to tell me when she thinks I am wrong, and the effect of these outbreaks on her part, combined with her usual delightfully warm sympathy, is like one of those soufflés en surprise which are one half hot, the other half iced.

It is so very useful, Amy dear, to have a candid friend. But I never want one quite always in the house, do you? Nor always in the mood for excessive candour. A buffet of cold wind is good for us now and then, fortifying us and teaching us endurance. But oh, how such buffets increase our pleasure in warm and balmy summer airs! My nice, dear friend, who sometimes tells me horrid but salutary truths, is always welcome; but in her east-windy moments (and there is no meteorological prophet to tell when they may arise and warn me with a storm cone) my friendship for her has an attack of anæmia, and I say to myself, "I wonder if I really love this woman?"

Have you any parallel to this among your friendships? Some of us can see no faults in our friends; others of us can see the faults and love the friends just as warmly. To which list do you belong?

You remember that a week or two since I told you that I had incited Mary to open rebellion against John. He would not allow her to send away a dirty cook because the woman cooked his favourite dishes so very well. You may imagine my horror when John was shown in yesterday morning. I thought I was in for a scolding, and was (invisibly) buckling on my armour when I noticed his countenance. He was deeply moved about something, and could not speak for a while, whereupon I poked an excellent fire into friblets in order to give him time. At last he said, "Madge, my poor Mary is very ill with a sharp attack of influenza, and when delirious she talks of nothing but me; her devotion to me, and my—my—indifference to her."

"Delirious? Is she so ill as that? Poor Mary and poor you, John. What does the doctor say?"

"That she is very ill. Temperature 103 three nights running. We have two nurses. Oh, Madge! If I were to lose my dear, dear girl!" And his face quivered so that I almost began to cry.

"Are you afraid of the infection?" he asked. "If not, will you come round and see her, and try to get it out of her head that I am indifferent to her. She keeps harping on it so, and I really think this ridiculous idea gets in the way of her recovering."

"Why don't you tell her yourself?" I asked. To tell you the truth, Amy dear, I am very much afraid of the germ or microbe or whatever the horrid little thing is of the "flu," especially since I read that 2,600 of them could sit in a row straight across a shilling. So small as that? Then how easy to enter the human body! Oh, dear. I thought John could quite easily do the thing himself. But he begged me to go, and I went. We found Mary free from delirium, but most shockingly weak. Her face lighted up when she saw us. She does adore her John. He left us together, and I immediately (being in a desperate hurry to get out of the room) began to dilate on his anxiety about her, and gave her some idea of his state of mind. She looked enchanted, and then, almost frowning upon me, said, "And I actually sent away that cook! Oh, Madge!" in the weakest of voices.

I laughed and ran away. Next morning came John, beaming. "Temperature down to 100 last night. Pulse stronger, and she has taken more nourishment. Madge, we have saved her!"

When he had gone, I laughed again. What a happy, happy couple they will be, dear, for awhile! Still, it is worth while, even if it last but half a year.

I smelt the perfume musk to-day for the first time for many years. Is there anything that recalls old associations more quickly than perfume? Immediately on catching a whiff of it (it was in an omnibus) I was back in a schoolroom sitting next a girl whose face and name I had not thought of for years, but now recollected perfectly. She loved this horrid musk smell, and always had it about her. I did not think any one ever used it now. And there is another old-fashioned perfume called bergamot that one never hears of now. It always recalls to me an old drawing master who used to oil his hair with some stuff scented with this bergamot. I suppose we never really forget anything. The old memories could not start into life in this way if they were really dead and buried. They can be only hidden away, and are ready to be recalled at any moment. What do you think?

We are already looking forward to the show of thoroughbreds and hunters at the Agricultural Hall in March. It is so lovely watching the jumping. It is to be a big show this year, with twenty-nine classes and prizes amounting to over £5,000. The Polo Pony Show follows upon the other, the first occupying three days, the latter two, and there will be £476 in prizes offered for the ponies. This is the eighth year of the show, which is always such an attractive one, for not only are there polo ponies, but every other kind as well, from the little Shetland upwards, including mountain and moorland ponies. There are to be seven riding classes, and there is no better fun at the Agricultural Hall the whole year round than that provided by the judges' tests for these little animals. This year the amusing polo ball and the bending competition are to be supplemented by tests of handiness in turning, the conditions requiring competitors to start in pairs, go twice up and down the ring, making three complete circles in succession round two posts, one at either end. This will delight the huge audience that always assembles.

There is something special and particular and quite different from any other love in that one feels for horses. Do you not think so? One respects them for the high qualities of their character, their gentleness, their (usually) beautiful manners, and admires them for the reserved, yet unmistakable way in which they show affection for their human friends. One of the horses I used to ride loved to be whispered to. He would turn his great dark eyes on me when I was saying nice things to him in a very soft, low voice, and give me such a long look as though trying hard to understand. I often wondered if whispering might not have been a part of the man Rarey's great secret in horse-taming. My father told us wonderful things about him.

Do you remember what I wrote you a few weeks ago about all the benevolent institutions asking for money at once, instead of diplomatically spreading their appeals over the whole year? Since then I have heard of one which did not join the general chorus of "Help! help!" and yet is one of the most deserving in the world. It is the Royal Maternity Charity of London, whose offices are at 31, Finsbury-square, E.C. It provides medical attendance, medicine and nurses for poor married women in their own homes at times when they need these most. Over three thousand women are ministered to annually by this excellent charity which is now in its 150th year. The Royal patronage so kindly given to hospitals causes a certain amount of indifference to be displayed towards charities which do not share in the bright light that surrounds the throne, and this is one of the reasons that the Maternity Charity is in debt to the amount of £2,000. The other reason is the hard times which have thrown so many thousands out of work. Think what a difference it must make to a poor woman when a kind and certificated nurse comes into her poor home, bringing with her not only the comfort of experienced skill, but also relief from hunger. If a doctor should be needed the Charity provides one, and if medicine be ordered the Charity pays for it. It does not in any way compete with hospitals, but tends these poor women in their own homes, which they could not leave to enter a hospital because there are young children, and sometimes a sick husband, who could not be left.

This lessens expenses, too, for there is no costly establishment to keep up, no large staff to pay. There are seventy-two doctors, who nobly give their services gratuitously, twenty-seven certificated maternity nurses, who receive a small fee for each case, and twenty-four chemists, who purvey medicines at a fixed contract rate. The committee, composed of busy professional and commercial men, meet voluntarily once a month to conduct the affairs of the charity; and the salaried staff consists of a head physician, who is paid a nominal sum, a secretary, and a messenger boy. And for this the medical and nursing staff are a going concern in every part of London. Each case costs 10s. A donation of ten guineas makes the giver a member for life, with three "letters of recommendation" at his disposal annually, and four "letters" are given for each guinea annually subscribed; so that the numbers to be helped can be indefinitely increased by the number of additional subscribers.

We were trying to help some humble friends of ours out of a financial tangle into which they had worked their affairs, when a remark made by one of them gave us a curious glimpse into their ideas about banks. It would really seem that the uneducated fancy that the money they pay in remains there in a little heap in the actual coins or cheques in which it is handed in. One wonders how they think that such a state of affairs would enable bankers to keep their business going. Said the old mother to me, when we were talking matters over, "Last time I sent to bank I paid 'em my lucky half-suvrin in mistake. I'll be main glad to have 'un back, if we has to dror all out." She was reckoning, you see, on receiving the very coins she had paid in.

What marvellous patience the poor have under injustice about money. They seem to accept it as a part of their hard life. Educated people make a to-do and an outcry, and get matters righted, perhaps. But the humble folk, aware of their own impotence, accept the injustice or the fraud, and meekly endure it. It makes one rage all the more against the persons who wrong them. The landlords of the poor are often guilty of great injustice to their tenants, amounting to cruelty sometimes. One would love to start a brigade of good souls who would champion the hard-working poor in these cases. As if life were not difficult enough for them in any case, these greedy self-seekers must impose heavy burdens upon them.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—Everyone, more or less, seems to turn thoughtful, when the Old Year is taking its departure, even those who, in the hurry of a strenuous life, have got out of the way of thinking. Looking back is the tradition of the period, writing up accounts, balancing books, stocktaking, "summarising." The world is sorted out, as it were, and everything in it checked off and set in an infinite variety of inventories, as if each one of us were an atlas, with the burthen of the whole world on his or her shoulders. To judge by the supply, the demand on the part of the public for statistics, inventories, and summings up of all kinds is inexhaustible. Information is poured forth in encyclopedian comprehensiveness to suit every taste, every occurrence of the past year is classified; we are informed of the number of peers who were created and the number of pigs that were turned into bacon. We are in especial credited with a sudden thirst—duly assuaged—for knowing who are the oldest and who the youngest amongst the monarchs of the world, the Dukes, and so on, even down to the Baronets. One wonders why we want to stuff our minds with so many facts at New Year's time, unless it may be to make up, by a mental "gorge," for the excesses, in another direction, of Christmas time.

The Old Year is forgotten now, however, and we are all in all to the New. We are concerning ourselves with beginnings, not with endings, any more. Here in our island we are always watching for the turning over of the new leaf. We are not shy of the New Year, as Elia was; perhaps because we have never had a good time yet, and are always hoping with each year that it may be coming at last. Up to this time the new leaf has never got further than a flutter; something or other has always happened, when it was on the turn, to send it back into the old position. Just like our own private and individual new leaves with which we are inevitably in such difficulties, for they do not seem to have the knack of quite turning over either. Perhaps a new leaf can no more be turned over than a blue rose can be gathered, but what would life be if we were not always aiming at the impossible and hoping against the teachings of experience.

Our white Christmas was a quiet one over here, absolutely without social gatherings such as used to be. The Viceregal Lodge was shut up, and at the Chief Secretary's Lodge preparations for a near flitting were being made. Mr. Bryce's household gods had never been regularly set up in the Phœnix Park, and certainly had not had time to domesticate themselves there. One suspects that they may possibly feel more at home on the far side of the wide ocean. Mr. Bryce is an old friend of many years' standing of the strenuous President of America. Of course, we have all been busy with surmise regarding Mr. Bryce's successor. Even the unpolitical of our sex take an interest in the Chief Secretary, who, however much of a "most potent, grave, and reverend seignior" is expected to have a society side to his character, and to take a leading part in dispensing official hospitality. This is as it ought to be, don't you think? Otherwise where would we women come in, who are excluded from the business haunts of officialdom. We ought to have playgrounds at least, if we are not to be allowed to work.

Lord Ashbourne came over to Ireland at Christmas to visit many members of his family and to join Lord Justice FitzGibbon's renowned Howth party, which took place, as usual, after Christmas, in the villa which Lord Randolph Churchill loved to visit. Under no roof in Ireland have so many of the makers of the history of their times, nor so much wit and wisdom been gathered together, as under that of Lord Justice FitzGibbon at Howth, where the silver jubilee of the Christmas parties was celebrated some years ago. Lord Rathmore and Sir Thomas Snagge also crossed the Channel for the Howth party. The Hill of Howth has always been historic, and is keeping up its past tradition as a present one also. Howth Castle, with its many legends, is one of the oldest habitable castles in Ireland. It will pass from the St. Lawrence family, who have lived there for centuries, with the present Lord Howth, who is unmarried, and has no male heir to inherit the title. His nephews are the sons of his sisters.

Lord and Lady Londonderry pay their usual visit to Mount Stewart in the County Down this month, but mourning will prevent the customary festivities of the visit. The great event in the county is the Hunt Ball, to be given at the Newcastle Hotel, for which all the houses in the country side will be filled with guests. The Dowager Lady Dufferin has spent a quiet Christmas at Clandeboye with some members of her family. Lord Dufferin joined her last week, and Lady Hermione Blackwood, who has just returned from South Africa. Lady Plunket is shortly expected in England; she is bringing her little daughters with her, and paying her first visit home since she and Lord Plunket went out to "reign" in very democratic New Zealand.—Yours ever, CLARE.

What kind of recipes would you like this week? Pain de perdreau is an ideal supper dish:—

Cut a plucked and cleansed partridge down the back and take out all the bones, which stew with herbs, vegetables, and stock. On the other hand, take the flesh of an older bird, or about 8 oz. of veal, and pound it thoroughly, adding the contents of a small terrine of foie grass, season it with salt and pepper, and work in 3 yolks of eggs and 1 white; when the farce is thoroughly blended, spread a layer on the inside of the bird, which garnish with fillets of truffle and foie grass, add another layer of the farce, and draw the skin of the bird together. Line a raised pie dish with slices of bacon, put a layer of the farce round, place the bird in the centre, and fill the interstices with any remaining farce, cover the dish with a paste made with SCRUBB & Co., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of their CLOUDY FLUID AMMONIA that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of SCRUBB & Co. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

CORSET KRUTOID.—The latest nouveauté Parisien in tricot forms an elegant and smart up-to-date contour and lengthens the waist line.—Write or call at MESDAMES SYKES, JOSEPHINE, & Co., The Royal Anatomical Corsetières, 280, Regent-street, London.

flour and water, and bake it in a moderate oven for nearly three hours. Then remove the paste, put a press of about 2 lbs. on it, and fill up with strong gravy made from the bones. When it is cold, remove the surface grease and pour dissolved butter and lard on the top; garnish all nicely with parsley when serving.

Croûtes de gibier:—

Cut 6 or 8 pieces of bread an inch thick, with a cutter two and a half inches in diameter, make an incision with a cutter a size smaller, nearly through the bread, and fry them a nice colour in a bath of hot lard. Remove the loose piece and take out the soft interior. Mince the remains of a cold grouse or a couple of cold partridges, and pound it thoroughly in a mortar with a spoonful of white sauce, rub it through a wire sieve, and work it up in a stewpan on the stove with half a gill of thick cream, the yolk of an egg, and pepper and salt to taste. Fill the croûtes with the purée, and put a thick slice of cooked tomato on the top. Stir 2 eggs in a stewpan on the fire with 1 oz. of butter, a spoonful of thick cream and seasoning of salt, pepper, and a pinch of paprika, put a spoonful on each croûte, sprinkle them with shredded truffle, and serve them garnished with fried parsley.

Pheasant au gratin prepared as follows will be found very good:—

Truss a nice pheasant and lard it through the breast with thick strips of fat bacon, trimming them off close to the breast, fill the crop part with a farce made by pounding 2 oz. of lean veal, 2 oz. of cold braised sweetbread, the liver of the bird, previously fried with butter and herbs, 2 oz. of butter, and an egg, season with salt and pepper, and rub it through a wire sieve. Fry the bird with 2 oz. of butter and a minced onion, add stock to cover it, and braise it gently for an hour and a half, at which time remove the bird from the braise, dry the breast, brush it with beaten egg, sprinkle it thickly with bread crumbs, and a little chopped parsley; pour liquid butter over it, and place it in an oven to brown, basting it frequently with butter. Thicken the braise; rub it through a hair sieve. Re-heat the sauce, pour it round the bird, and garnish it with mushrooms.

Try these celery fritters:—

Trim, wash, and cut off the tops of as many roots of celery as you may require, without dividing them, then boil for a quarter of an hour. Remove them from the hot water, and put them in cold. Drain them and tie two and two together. Cover the bottom of a stewpan with slices of thinly-cut bacon, place in the celery, season with parsley, shalots, or green onions, a little salt, and moisten it with the fat taken off soup. Cover with slices of bacon and a well-buttered round of paper, watch them come to a boil, then let them simmer until done, drain and fry them in plenty of butter. Drain, dish, and glaze them with castor sugar, by holding a red-hot poker over them, just before sending them to table.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

P.S.—The Private View on Saturday at the Leicester Galleries of Mr. Charles Shannon's pictures and Miss Ruth Dollman's charming water-colours of the South Downs was a very smart function. I noticed in the crowd a duchess or two, Baron and Baroness de Meyer, always such a picturesque couple, Lord Weardale, Lady Trevelyan, Miss May Morris, Sir Aston Webb, R.A., Sir Ernest Waterlow, and many other interesting and well-known people. The pictures are delightful. M.

MEXICAN NATIONAL PACKING COMPANY

(Incorporated under the Laws of the State of New Jersey, U.S.A.)

Operating under special Concessions from the Supreme Government of the Republic of Mexico, and subject to its direct official inspection.

CAPITAL.

Authorised Common Stock	$10,000,000
Issued and Outstanding...	$7,500,000
Five per Cent. Forty-Year First Mortgage Gold Bonds authorised	$2,000,000

The above Bonds are appropriated as follows:—

1. For funding and retiring the outstanding Six per Cent. Bonds of the Company	$700,000
2. Present Issue...	$1,300,000

MARTIN'S BANK, LIMITED, are authorised by the purchasers referred to below and the Company to receive applications for $1,300,000 of the above 5% First Mortgage Convertible Gold Bonds.

Each Allottee of Bonds will receive from the Company, when he has paid up in full, a Bonus of $20 (twenty per cent.) in fully-paid Common Stock for every $100 par value of Bonds allotted to him.

ISSUE PRICE 95 PER CENT., payable as follows:—

£2	0s. 0d.	per $100 on	Application.
£2	0s. 0d.	" "	Allotment.
£4	0s. 0d.	" "	February 20, 1907.
£4	0s. 0d.	" "	March 20, 1907.
£7	9s. 11d.	" "	May 9, 1907.
£19	9s. 11d.	= 95 per cent. of £20 10s. 5d., the sterling equivalent of $100 at 4/1½ per $1.

Out of the total $2,000 000 of Bonds, $700,000 have been appropriated to retire $600,000 6 per Cent Bonds of the Company, of which about four-fifths have already been retired. The sums received by the Company from the purchasers of the $1,010,000 of Bonds and the net proceeds of the $290,000 of Bonds now offered for sale on behalf of the Company are required to pay certain liabilities of the Company, and to provide for:

1. Installing the machinery in packing-house No. 1 at Uruapan, Michoacan.
2. Building and equipping packing-house No. 2 in the State of Vera Cruz.
3. Building and equipping packing-house No. 3 in the State of Nuevo Leon.
4. Purchasing and putting in service fifty refrigerator cars.
5. Building and equipping cold storage warehouse, refrigerating plant, and general offices in the City of Mexico.

The balance, estimated by the President of the Company at nearly $400,000 (£82,083 6s. 8d.), will be available for the general purposes of the Company.

The Bonds are secured by a Trust Deed in favour of the Knickerbocker Trust Company of New York, whereby the Bonds are constituted a first charge upon the lands, concessions, water rights, property, and franchises of the Company, present and future, situated in the Republic of Mexico, subject only to the above issue of 6 per Cent. Bonds which are to be retired.

The said Trust Deed provides for the redemption of the Bonds over a period of forty years, by means of a Cumulative Sinking Fund (commencing Jan. 1, 1913), which is to be applied in redeeming the Bonds either by purchase at or under 105 per cent., or by drawings at 105 per cent., liberty being reserved to the Company to redeem the whole or any part of the Bonds outstanding, at any time, at a premium of 10 per cent. upon six months' notice.

The Bonds will be to Bearer, but may be registered at the Office of the Knickerbocker Trust Company, New York, or at the Office of the Prudential Deposit Trust, Limited, in London. Coupons for Interest will be attached to the Bonds, whether registered or to Bearer, and will be payable half-yearly, on July 1 and Jan. 1, in New York or London.

The Bonds will be issued in sums of $1,000 (£205 4s. 2d.) and $100 (£20 10s. 5d.), and allotments will only be made in multiples of these sums.

The bondholders will have the option of converting their Bonds at any time into Common Stock, at the rate of $110 par value of Common Stock for each $100 par value of Bonds.

Principal and interest will be payable at the office of the Knickerbocker Trust Company in New York in U.S. gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness, or at the Financial Agency of the Company in London, at the fixed rate of exchange of four shillings, one penny farthing to the dollar, fractions of one penny being disregarded.

Definitive Bonds will be delivered on June 9, 1907, in exchange for Scrip Certificates to Bearer, which will be issued in exchange for Allotment Letters with Bankers' Receipts for payments made on application and allotment.

Attention is called to the enclosed statement of facts with reference to the Company and its prospects, made by Mr. John W. De Kay, the President of the Company, and to the letter from the Hon. Sebastian Camacho, President of the National Bank of Mexico and Vice-President of the Federal Senate of the Republic of Mexico, upon which this Prospectus is based. Mr. De Kay, it will be noticed, estimates that the profits from the first packing house already constructed of rock and brick should for the year 1907 amount to $869,505 gold (£178,429 13s. 5d.) and that when the Vera Cruz and the Nuevo Leon Plants are completed, which the Company intend to construct in the year 1907, the total profits should exceed $1,800,000 gold (£369,375).

The estimated profit of the Uruapan Packing House alone amounts to	$869,505	=£178,429 13s. 5d.
To pay the 5 per cent. interest on the $2,000,000 Bonds will require	100,000	= 20,520 16s. 8d for reserve, redemption, dividends on common stock, &c.

The Company has made arrangements with the London Central Markets Cold Storage Co., Limited, Smithfield, and the Imperial Food Supplies, Limited, 11, Snow-hill, and the General Produce Company, Limited, West Smithfield, London, under which it will enjoy the benefit of the established facilities afforded by those companies for the distribution of its products in London and other of the chief cities of Great Britain.

The Government of Mexico has granted to this Company until April 10, 1913, rebate to a large extent of the slaughtering taxes now prevailing, and under its Concessions the Company will pay as follows:—

Upon cattle, 5 cents gold per head, instead of $2.35 gold per head, the present average.

On hogs, 3 cents gold per head, instead of 90 cents gold per head.

Upon sheep, no tax, instead of 25 cents gold per head.

The Federal slaughter taxes at present paid in the City of Mexico alone amount approximately to $400,000 gold (£82,083 6s. 8d.) annually. The tax saving to the Company on this basis should be sufficient to pay the interest on the entire Bond issue of this Company of $2,000,000 three times over. Moreover, in conjunction with the other benefits conferred, the rebate of taxes should be the means of ensuring to the Company the dominant control of a large percentage of the meat business of Mexico.

The Mexican National Railway Company has built side tracks into the slaughter yards of the Company's plant at Uruapan. The Company has also acquired ample freehold grounds in the City of Mexico for a refrigerating plant in that city, and will shortly have its warehouse, cold storage plant, and general offices there completed.

The concessions and rights of the Company in Mexico have been vouched for by the Honourable Luis Mendez and the Honourable Francisco Alfaro, two of the leading lawyers in Mexico, and the organization of the Company and the trust deed and the validity of the present issue of Bonds, and the legal status of the Company generally have been examined and vouched for by the Honourable Charles W. Dayton, Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and by Mr. Lafayette H. de Friese and the Honourable D. A. Holmes of the New York Bar.

Holders of Bonds, who so desire, can register their names and addresses with the London Advisory Board, at the offices of the Prudential Deposit Trust, Limited, 16 and 17, Broad-street-avenue, London, E.C., in order that periodical statements may be sent to them of the position and progress of the Company.

Applications for Bonds should be made upon the form accompanying the Prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers with a cheque for the amount payable on application. If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and when the number of bonds allotted is less than that applied for the surplus will be credited in reduction of the amount payable on allotment. Failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture and the allotment liable to cancellation.

Application will be made in due course to the Committee of the London Stock Exchange for a settlement in and quotation of the Bonds.

The official statistics as to live stock in Mexico and copies of the Concessions issued by the Federal Government of Mexico are filed at the CONSULATE of the UNITED STATES OF MEXICO, Broad-street House, New Broad-street, London, E.C., where they can be seen by intending applicants.

Certified copies of the Company's Concessions and of the trust deed securing the Bonds can be seen by intending applicants at the offices of the Company's Solicitors, Messrs. LINKLATER AND CO., 2, Bond-court, Walbrook, London, E.C., between the hours of 11 and 4, while the lists remain open.

A Brokerage of ½ per cent. will be paid on the amount of Bonds applied for and allotted on applications identified as coming through Brokers and Agents.

Prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained from MARTIN'S BANK, LIMITED, and its branches, and from Messrs. BILLETT, CAMPBELL, AND GRENFELL, 3, Throgmorton-avenue, E.C., and from Messrs. EMBERSON AND HUGHES, 4, Drapers'-gardens, E.C.

Dated January 8th, 1907.

Payment in full may be made on allotment or on the due dates of any subsequent instalments, under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

A full Coupon will be payable on July 1, 1907.

Of the above Issue $1,010,000 of Bonds are offered for sale on behalf of persons who have agreed to purchase the same from the Company, the remaining $290,000 being offered for subscription on behalf of the Company.

NOTICE to Shareholders in the NERCHINSK GOLD COMPANY, LIMITED.

Nerchinsk Options, Limited.

(Incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1900).

A Prospectus (which has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies) is being issued.

The Capital of the Company is £50,000, divided into 50,000 Shares of £1 each, and 40,000 SHARES are being OFFERED for SUBSCRIPTION at PAR, payable as follows:

2s. 6d. per share on Application; 2s. 6d. per share on Allotment; 5s. per share two months after Allotment; 5s. per share four months after Allotment; and 5s. per share six months after Allotment.

Shareholders in the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, will receive (rateably according to their applications on this Prospectus) preferential allotment as to one-half of the Shares now offered for subscription.

The Shares may be paid up in full on, or at any time after allotment, and Share Warrants to bearer will, subject to the provisions of the Articles of Association, be issued if required.

The Prospectus states that the Company has been formed to acquire the grant by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, of an exclusive licence to prospect and to lease, on terms set out in a Contract, dated 7th January, 1907 (being Contract No. 2 below), any Gold Mines which this Company may select, the area of selection covering in the aggregate four square miles in the Mala Koudechi Valley.

That this area is situate in the eastern part of the Nerchinsk mining district of Siberia, in the neighbourhood of the property of the Kluchi Gold Mines, Limited.

The concession held by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited (the territories covered by and including the above-mentioned area), was granted by the Private Cabinet of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and is held (as altered and amended by a supplementary agreement, which is dated 21st March, 1904, made by the Private Cabinet aforesaid with the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited) by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, as transferees for a term of twenty-four years from the 1st January, 1904, with the right of renewal for a similar period. Under the concession as altered and amended by the supplementary agreement, the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, has an exclusive gold prospecting licence up to the 1st January, 1908, over the concession area, and the right to call for mining leases of any mines located before the 1st January, 1908, within the free lands comprised in the concession area. The concession and supplementary agreement are subject to the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, performing and observing the stipulations and conditions therein contained, amongst which are the payment by that Company of (a) the gold royalties therein specified, but in no case less than a minimum of £4,000 per annum, and (b) a dessiatine tax of 2 roubles per dessiatine of ground occupied and taken on lease.

That the Company will not, according to the terms of the proposed prospecting licence, itself work any of the gold mines which it may select, but must promote separate companies for these purposes in conjunction with the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited.

That prospecting work has already been done by the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, on the area included in the licence to prospect under the superintendence of that Company's consulting engineers, Messrs. Pearse, Kingston, and Browne, and that the following is copy Report of Mr. A. L. Pearse on this area, and dated 21st November, 1903, addressed to the Directors of the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited:—

Mala Koudechi Camp is connected with Davenda and Mount Kluchi by a fairly good road, and can be reached from the former in two hours. It has been the headquarters for the prospecting carried out in that district (see plan) and controls the work on the "Growler" lode, the prospects named "Eisenhut," "Twin," "Discovery," "Anvil," and "Divide."

Rich quartz float found above the line of some of the richest placers on the Concession led to these discoveries.

"EISENHUT" LODE.—The Eisenhut lode was found by costeen trench on the west side of the Kostremyka Creek. Its outcrop is 10 ft wide of grey quartz, and worth half an ounce per ton. A tunnel has been started to endeavour to find this lode below the costeen.

"TWIN."—The Twin is an outcrop of quartz 3 ft wide, similar to the Eisenhut, further up the hill. A tunnel is being driven to try and find it in depth.

At the head of the Kostremyka Creek, and opposite to Mala Koudechi, almost on top of the hill or divide, a lode has been discovered named the "Victory," striking N. 75 degrees W., which is being opened on by the two shafts, Discovery and Anvil, situate 500 ft. apart.

"DISCOVERY" AND "ANVIL" SHAFTS.—The Discovery Shaft is down 30 ft. on the hanging-wall side, and exposes 4 ft. of the lode matter. The present value is half an ounce per ton. The lode is nearly vertical. In the "Anvil" shaft the lode has been cross-cut, it is 10 ft. wide, and worth 12 dwts. per ton. The shaft has been started at this cross-cut.

"DIVIDE" SHAFT.—The Divide Shaft is down 25 ft. It is situated a quarter of a mile west from the Anvil, and on the same line of strike, but it is questionable if the lode has any connection with the Victory. The formation in this shaft is not well defined, but as it pans well it is worth following.

"GROWLER" LODE.—The Growler is a lode 3 ft. to 7 ft. wide, two miles up the stream from Koudechi. A shaft is sunk 20 ft. on the hanging-wall. Its direction is N. 30 degrees W. It is a promising-looking lode of white quartz, carrying pyrites, chalcopyrite, and a little lead. Two assays made of samples from here gave 11 dwts and 5 dwts respectively.

That the Directors have also received the following Report from their Chief Engineer, Mr. H. G. L. Kenrick, M.I.M.M.:—

Worcester House, Walbrook,
London, E.C., January 5th, 1907.

Pearse, Kingston and Browne.

The Directors of NERCHINSK OPTIONS, LIMITED.

Gentlemen.—In answer to your request for an opinion on the large prospecting area you have acquired from the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, I beg to state that towards the end of May, 1902, I went out to Siberia to inspect and report on the Nerchinsk Company's property.

During the six months I was on this property I spent some time in the Kluchi and Koudechi Valleys, and laid out the first works undertaken in these valleys in search of quartz lodes.

The result of these works disclosed the large Kluchi lode, which was found immediately before my return to England. The prospecting work, which was continued by Mr. Harper (the present manager of Kluchi Gold Mines, Limited), has since disclosed several lodes in the Kluchi and Koudechi Valleys.

Very little prospecting work has at present been undertaken on your concession. The work has practically been confined to the sinking of two or three small shafts about 30 ft. in depth and the drifting of a few costeens. The result of this work must be considered very satisfactory, as the outcrops of four lodes have already been disclosed.

I understand you have a copy of a report made in 1903 by Mr. A. L. Pearse, which covers the work done on these lodes.

The rich placers in the Koudechi Valley have been worked for many years by the Private Cabinet, but no attention was given to quartz mining until the prospecting referred to above was undertaken by the Nerchinsk Company.

A considerable amount of rich float quartz has been found in these valleys, which should indicate that, with a little prospecting, the ore bodies from which it has been shed might be located.

I would strongly recommend that development work should be carried out on the lodes already disclosed, and systematic prospecting be undertaken on this valuable concession, which gives every promise of developing several large mines.

Yours faithfully,

H. G. L. KENRICK.

That, taking into account the result of the work already done, it is anticipated that by the further expenditure provided for by this Company, several mining propositions should be located suitable for formation into separate companies and the benefit of flotation of these will accrue to this Company and the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, as after providing out of the total capitalisation of each separate company one-third thereof for the working capital and formation expenses of each such company, the balance will be divided as to one-half to this Company and one-half to the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited.

A Sketch Map, showing the approximate position, etc., of the Mala Koudechi property, referred to in the reports, is enclosed with the prospectus. The purchase consideration payable to the N.P. Syndicate, of 62, London Wall, London, E.C., and the terms and conditions relating thereto, together with the various contracts and all other information required by the Companies Acts, are fully set out in the prospectus.

The Company will pay a brokerage of 6d. per Share on all Shares allotted on Application Forms bearing brokers' stamps.

The DIRECTORS are:—Viscount FRANKFORT DE MONTMORENCY, 56, Warwick Square, London, S.W. E. MEREWETHER BOVILL, Norcott Court, Berkhampstead (Director of the Kluchi Gold Mines, Limited, and of the Peel River Land and Minerals Company, Limited). Lieut.-Colonel GEORGE HARGREAVE, 18, Marloes Road, Kensington, London, W. LEO RAFFALOVICH, of 24, Palace Quay, St. Petersburg, and 23, Leinster Terrace, London, W. (Director of the Nerchinsk Gold Company, Limited, and of the Kluchi Gold Mines, Limited).

The Bankers are Parr's Bank, Limited, 77, Lombard Street, London, E.C., and Branches. The Solicitors are Steadman, Van Praagh and Gaylor, 4, Suffolk Street, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. The Broker is Wilfred Stephenson, Gresham House, Old Broad Street, London, E.C. The Auditors are Hudson, Smith, Briggs, Smith and Taylor, 23, College Hill, London, E.C., and Exchange, Bristol. The Consulting Engineers are Pearse, Kingston and Browne, Worcester House, Walbrook, London, E.C. The Chief Engineer in Siberia will be H. G. L. Kenrick, M.I.M.M. The Secretaries are Steele, Lockhart and Co., and the Registered Office is 62, London Wall, London, E.C.

Applications for Shares should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and forwarded to the Company's Bankers, together with a remittance for the amount payable on application.

This notice is not published as an invitation to apply for shares, but merely as a notification to shareholders in the Nerchinsk Gold Co., Limited, that a prospectus of the Nerchinsk Options, Limited, is being issued, and that Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company and of the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors. The list of applications will close on Thursday, the 10th January, 1907, at 4 p.m.

OUR PUZZLES.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Building, Carteret street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new Competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 2.—SPECIAL FOREIGN.

OPEN ONLY TO THOSE RESIDING OUTSIDE EUROPE.

The first Quarterly Foreign Competition, which was set in TRUTH of September 26, 1906, has proved so successful, and I have had so many letters from readers of TRUTH in all parts of the world expressing their appreciation of the Special Puzzle facilities offered them, that I find every encouragement to continue these Quarterly Competitions, and am setting the second of them herewith. That is to say, I am offering, this quarter, the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that Competitor who shall send in:

I suppose all Competitors will be familiar with these lines and many will know them by heart. But for the benefit of any who may not happen to have a Tennyson handy, I print them herewith.

On thy cold, grey stones, O Sea;
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

Oh! well for the fishermen's boy
That he shouts with his sister at play.
Oh! well for the sailor lad
That he sings in his boat in the bay.

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill.
But oh! for the touch of a vanished hand
And the sound of a voice that is still.

At the foot of thy stones, O Sea;
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me.

The parody should deal with some subject of immediate public, and, if possible, imperial, interest, and should, as far as may be, recall the sound of the original, while differing from it altogether in sense.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) Only Competitors residing outside Europe are eligible to send in parodies.
(ii) No Competitor should send in more than one parody.
(iii) All parodies must reach TRUTH Office on or before April 9, 1907.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,459.

A valued correspondent has suggested to me a subject for a Puzzle, which strikes me as altogether so interesting that I am making use of it this week, and am offering the usual Prize of TWO GUINEAS for

A LIST COMPRISING THE NAMES OF THE SIX MOST DELIGHTFUL SCAPEGRACES IN ENGLISH FICTION.

My correspondent mentions Falstaff as a good example of the sort of person meant. Dick Swiveller might also be quoted as a good illustration.

Competitors are quite at liberty to use either, or both, of these names, if they please, in the compilation of their lists.

The term "English" may be taken, in its widest sense, as referring to any work of fiction in the English language.

"Fiction," also, may be given a liberal interpretation; historical or semi-historical characters introduced into works of fiction being eligible for inclusion.

The Award, as is usual in these cases, will be determined by a collation of all lists sent in.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor must send in more than one list of six "delightful scapegraces."
(ii) All lists must reach TRUTH Offices by the first post on Monday, January 21, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DORIS.—Your solution of Puzzle No. 1,453 was duly received, and is included in the Competition.

VERBUM SAT.—Many thanks for your excellent suggestion, of which you will see I am availing myself.

PORTHOS.—Your solution of Puzzle 1,454, was, I regret to say, received too late for inclusion in the Competion.

ENOCH.—Your correction duly noted.

NORTHLANDER.—Many thanks for your good wishes; also for your kind suggestions, which I will consider.

RIMABEL.—Many thanks for your letter. I hope that I may soon have to congratulate you on becoming a Prize-winner.

D'ARTAGNAN and WHITE BOY.—From the addresses given by these Competitors, I fear that their solutions of the Special Foreign Puzzle No. 1 are ineligible. The Competition is limited to extra-European residents. If there has been any mistake, I should be glad to hear from the Competitors in question.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,456.—FURTHER ASSORTED SPECIMENS.

ORIGINAL PARODIES OF CAMPBELL'S FAMOUS LINES ENTITLED "A THOUGHT SUGGESTED BY THE NEW YEAR."

The more we live, more mean appear
The Times' succeeding stages;
In childhood how I did revere
Its thick threepenny pages

The stately current of its youth—
Ere Pigott yet disordered—
Is stemmed (as well explained in TRUTH):
'Tis only sold when ordered.

Now that the Mail costs but a "brown,"
And yellow rags fly thicker,
Why! Trade upon your old renown,
And make your courses quicker.

O, Walter, when you've lost your breath,
And life itself seems vapid,
Don't patter 'neath the falls of death,
But make the pace more rapid.

It may be strange—yet try a change.
Let Hooper do your speeding;
He'll sell for cash your ancient trash—
The public are unheeding.

Heaven gave you thunder, breadth, and length,
But you lack Yankee deepness,
And book clubs of a seeming strength,
Proportioned to their cheapness.

The Count.

The more men talk, the worse appear
A Bill's successive stages;
The "Second Reading" seems a year,
"Committee" passing ages.

The nimble spirit of their youth
Runs wild in gay disorders;
They jest and sport with phrase uncouth,
Till wit on folly borders.

And now the cheek grows pale and wan
As weeks and months are wasted;
Ye gods, this power misused by man,
By woman must be tasted.

She has not lost her bloom and breath,
Her courage is not vapid;
E'en as she struggles unto death,
Her progress is more rapid.

It may seem strange—yet who would change
Their method of proceeding,
As one by one, to gaol they go
To emphasise their pleading?

In prison viewed their measured course
Of sadly threat'ning fleetness,
Shows what may yet be gained by force,
And what be won by sweetness.

Canute.

The more we know, the less we fear
Self-constituted sages;
A day comes fifty times a year,
When most men draw their wages.

The growing passion for the truth
Compels beyond the borders
All scheming rogues at length, forsooth,
Who know no law or "orders"!

For as their well-worn cheek grows wan—
Their victims getting "slicker"—
They all go under to a man—
The Veri-Forceful Kicker!

When "Soaps" was blown quite out of breath,
Its sure demise was rapid.
And trusty freemen hailed the death
Uproariously. Sap id!

It would be strange if all could range
Times' Book Clubs to their reading;
Then everyone might leave undone
Quite every sort of weeding!

Heaven knows what peers of fading wealth—
And abrogating "greetness"—
Bestow on go-betweens in stealth
Consorting to their meetness!

Rimabel.

Why do we think when Bills appear
That soon they'll pass all stages;
The "soon" to some may be a year,
While some don't pass for ages.

Poor Birrell thought his Bill in youth
Would pass debates' disorders;
It lingered while he strove to smooth
The feuds of Clerks in Orders.

But, when his careworn chief grew wan,
As Tory shafts fell thicker,
The Lords, whose measures Bills must ban
Despatched the clauses quicker.

But when the Lords, all out of breath
Returned the Bill quite vapid,
While yet it could be saved from death
The Commons' course was rapid.

"We will not change," they said, "though strange,"
All precedents unheeding,
"Since one by one each clause has gone,

The Lords replied with civil strength,
Indemnifying meekness.
C.-B. withdrew the Bill at length.
For "change," he said, "is weakness."

Creran.

The more he learns, the less a man
Is hoodwinked as he ages:
At first each goose appears a swan,
And simpletons seem sages.

He listens in his callow youth
To ranters and marauders;
Receives their silly tales as truth,
And sides with their applauders.

But as the after years come on,
And faction's fogs are lifting,
He cries—his old illusion gone—
Ye gods! where am I drifting?

When specious claims are waste of breath,
And shibboleths are vapid,
If a bad Bill is borne to death
He likes the current rapid.

It may seem strange that he should change,
To those whom folly's leading
Still by the nose, but on he goes,
For all their special pleading.

Heaven teaches him the truth at length,
And lends him light and sweetness,
While those who trust their seeming strength
Find out its incompleteness.

Ephemeron.

The more we live, more rash appears
Our country's laws and fashion:
A hat of cartwheel size one year,
This year, no hat the passion.

The crinoline of "early Vic.,"
Tho' common sense hath banned it,
Tries cunningly by many a trick
To enter fashion's mandate.

But as the haggard face grows wan,
The rouge and poudre must thicken,
Ye gods! when all the fakes are on,
Feel ye not conscience-stricken?

When polls, too, shed their youthful crop,
And cold ye thereby catch, oh!
Why, as ye rush towards Clarkson's shop,
Don't ye, instead, try Tatcho?

'Tis passing strange that Law don't change
Court martial's rotten system,
Where time on time verdicts unique
Prove the real culprit's missed 'em.

Heaven grant us laws in the New Year
Adjudged with truth and candour.
Sound legal sauce, served without fear,
Alike to goose and gander.

Korah.

The more we work, more brief appear
Our Bill's succeeding stages;
My Bill at Commons meant a year,
At Lords, a short day's wages.

The voyage of our Session's youth,
Which Balfour yet disorders,
Stole through the Labour Party smooth,
Along the Irish borders.

And as the statesman's cheek grew wan,
And women's wrongs grew thicker
O souls! that measure rights with man,
Why seems your course no quicker?

When Scots have lost their darling Greys,
And other corps grow vapid,
We honour Volunteers' ways,
And make our ships more rapid.

It may be greed, yet who would heed,
Time's course to market speeding,
When, one by one, all prints have gone
For lines that need no reading.

Fate gives our year of seeming strength
Lords' damnifying weakness;
And those of next a subtle length
Of Lords' and ladies' meekness.

Northlander.

If you would bright and young appear
Thro' life's succeeding stages;
Then, eat no meat throughout the year,
But live like modern sages.

The gladsome current of your youth,
Unhindered by disorders,
Would flow on, like a river smooth,
Along its grassy borders.

No careworn look, no visage wan,
No headache after dinner,
No star-gazing and calling one
"A miserable sinner."

Your joys would never lose their bloom,
Life never, then, seem vapid,
And when you near the falls of death,
And feel its tide more rapid.

You would not change your happy state,
Time's course to heaven speeding,
For all the world calls rich and great,
Earth's joys are all receding.

But, in exchange for fading strength
And life of incompleteness,
You'll find a life, in Heaven, at length,
Of never-ending sweetness.

Mary Field.

The more we live we realise
Our life's increasing dangers:
To-day some risks we recognise
That yesterday were strangers.

The horse 'bus of our safer days,
Ere motors were invented,
Went lingering on its placid ways,
Slow, shaky, but—non-scented.

But now the cheek with fear is white,
And still the 'bus flies faster;
Ye driver, strive with all your might,
And save us from disaster.

Rapidity of transit is
The mode. Each in a hurry
Goes flying; but a query 'tis,
What need for all this scurry?

It may be true the microbe crew
Haunts all we eat; infection
Lurks in a kiss, in laughter, too.
Oh, what a sad reflection!

Banana skins cause many slips,
Though limbs may soon be mended;
But now we're threatened with airships
Our risks will ne'er be ended.

Marnou.

The more we live more brief appear
The Bill's succeeding stages,
A day of Birrell seems a year,
And years like passing ages.

The sweet religion of our youth,
Ere Ministers disordered,
Steals, lingering like a blessed truth,
With heresies now bordered.

But as the Lib'ral cheek grows wan,
And Tory shafts fly thicker,
Ye gods, that measure life to man,
What means the unseemly bicker?

Now this year's nearing its last breath—
May 'ts end be very rapid,
Why as the Bill has met its death,
The year seems dull and vapid.

It may seem strange, but who would change
The Bill's course to slower speeding?
When, one by one, its friends have gone
And left it lone and bleeding.

Heaven give th' New Year renewed strength,
And pardon your elateness,
And give the Bill of life a length
Proportioned to its greatness.

Porthos.

The more we eat less does appear,
And indigestion rages—
A day? Not so! but year to year,
Attacks e'en learned sages.

The toothsome palates of our youth
Gets livers out of order;
While life we try to make more smooth,
Clogs with a rocky border.

So said the M.P. to his son,
As he finished his meat and liquor,
To the House I go, we'll man to man,
Amend the clauses quicker.

When boys like you draw life's sweet breath,
Have not e'en one bad habit;
Spout politics nigh unto death,
And eat less—never rapid.

It may seem strange, but could you change
Your course of life now speeding,
To matters of the Bill that's gone,
Its vital points still bleeding?

Help give the Bill its one-time strength,
For education's fleetness:
The Lords gave only a seeming length.
But we've to add its sweetness.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE CONSOLIDATED 3½% STOCK.

ISSUE OF £994,350.

Price of Issue, 95 per cent.

Interest payable 1st JANUARY and 1st JULY.
Six Months' Interest payable 1st JULY, 1907.

Principal repayable at par 1st JULY, 1949, the Government of the Cape of Good Hope having the option to redeem the Stock at par on or after the 1st JULY, 1929, on giving twelve calendar months' notice.

The Government of the Cape of Good Hope having complied with the requirements of the Colonial Stock Act, 1900, as announced in the London Gazette of the 23rd October, 1903, Trustees are authorized to invest in this Stock subject to the provisions set forth in the Trustee Act, 1893.

THE LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED are instructed by the Government of the Cape of Good Hope to offer for subscription the above amount of Stock, to be raised under the provisions of the following Acts of the Cape of Good Hope Legislature, viz.:—

Act No. 43 of 1905	...	£658,822	for Local Works and other purposes
,, ,, 44 of 1905	...	191,228	,, Railway Works
,, ,, 50 of 1905	...	144,300	,, Harbour Works and in accordance with the powers granted by the General Loans Acts of 1881, 1883, 1888, and 1892.

The Stock offered will be in addition to and rank pari passu with the £13,422,823 19s. 1d. already created, and will be inscribed in accordance with the provisions of "The Colonial Stock Act, 1877," 40 and 41 Vict., cap. 59, in the books of the "Cape of Good Hope Consolidated 3½ per cent. Stock," kept by the London and Westminster Bank Limited,—and will be transferable without charge and free of stamp duty at that Bank, either by the Stockholders personally or by their attorneys. The interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, will be payable on behalf of the Government of the Cape of Good Hope at the London and Westminster Bank Limited, Lothbury, on the 1st January and 1st July in each year, by Dividend Warrants, which can be sent by post at the Stockholder's risk. The principal will be payable at the same Bank on the 1st July, 1949, but the Government of the Cape of Good Hope have the option of redemption at par, in London, on or after the 1st July 1929, on giving twelve calendar months' notice by advertisement in the London Gazette and in the Times Newspaper, or by post to the then Stockholders at their registered addresses.

Stock Certificates to Bearer, of the denominations of £100, £500 and £1,000, with Coupons for the Half-yearly Dividends attached, will be obtainable in exchange for Inscribed Stock at the London and Westminster Bank Limited, Lothbury, on payment of the prescribed fees, and such Certificates can be re-inscribed as Stock at the will of the holder.

The revenues of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope alone are liable in respect of this Stock and the Dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom and the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury are not directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the Stock or of the Dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.—40 and 41 Vict., cap. 59, sec 19.

Applications on the form prescribed will be received at the London and Westminster Bank Limited, Lothbury, and must be for even hundreds of Stock, and be accompanied by a deposit of £5 per cent. on the nominal amount applied for.

The list will be closed on or before Friday, the 11th January, 1907.

In case of partial allotment, the surplus of the amount paid as deposit will be appropriated towards the payment of the instalment due on allotment.

Payment will be required as follows, viz:—

£5	per cent.	on application.
£20	,, ,,	,,	15th January, 1907.
£20	,, ,,	,,	11th February, 1907.
£25	,, ,,	,,	11th March, 1907.
£25	,, ,,	,,	8th April, 1907.
£95

Payment may be made in full on the 15th January, or any subsequent day, under discount at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

If default be made in payment of the instalments at their due dates, the previous payments will be liable to forfeiture.

Script Certificates will be issued after payment of the amount due on allotment, and such Certificates will be convertible into Inscribed Stock on presentation at the London and Westminster Bank Limited, Lothbury, as soon as they are paid in full.

Copies of the Acts creating the Loan can be seen at the London and Westminster Bank Limited; and Forms of Application can be obtained at that Bank, or at any of its Branches; and of Messrs. R. Nivison & Co., 76, Cornhill, E.C.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1568. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, January 16, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

BELOW I give the account of receipts and expenditure in connection with the last Christmas distribution of Truth Dolls and Toys. As a matter of book-keeping convenience the account is made up for the year ending December 31. As, however, a good many subscriptions have been received since that date, the debt shown in the account is really reduced by about £30 at the present moment. Seeing the unsatisfactory position in which the Fund stood only two or three months ago, this result is gratifying, and the more so since the number of dolls and toys distributed, instead of being reduced, has been larger than ever. I must heartily thank all those readers of Truth who have contributed to this result, and I hope that those who have hitherto stood aloof will now feel inspired to send me the small amount required to wipe out the debt.

* This item appears as a matter of account. The donor of the new sixpences, as usual, kindly sent £5 to defray the cost of the distribution. This amount has been acknowledged as a donation and included in the receipts.

Meantime, I have to acknowledge the following contributions towards the Fund:—X. Y. Z., £5; Mgr. Goddard, £1 1s.; Frances, 2s. 6d.; R. G., £2; R. J. and M. M. G., $5; F. A. B., £2 2s.; the Officers of H.M.S. Leander and the Chatham Destroyer Flotilla, £2 14s. 6d.; Parrot, 1s.; Crescendo, 2s.; F. C. H., £5 5s.; A Subaltern, £1; R. R., £1.

Messrs. Love and Malcomson, Limited, of 4 and 5, Dean-street, High Holborn, who executed the whole of the printing in connection with the Toy Show and the distribution of the articles, have kindly informed me that they propose to make no charge for this work. This is equivalent to a donation of upwards of £12 towards the Toy Fund, and calls for my special thanks accordingly.

It was stated in Truth several weeks ago that the King intends to spend the greater part of March at Biarritz. His Majesty derived considerable benefit from his stay at Biarritz last year, and he was much pleased with the place and its surroundings. It was originally contemplated for the King to pay a visit to the Spanish Court at Madrid when he leaves Biarritz at the beginning of April, directly after Easter, when the King and Queen of Spain would have returned to their capital after spending Holy Week at Seville. All this, however, has been given up, owing to the delicate health of the Queen of Spain, whose accouchement is expected to take place towards the end of April.

According to present arrangements, the King will spend Easter at Biarritz, and will leave that place early in the first week of April for Marseilles, where he will join the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert for a cruise in the Mediterranean. The programme of the yacht's intended course will be kept strictly secret, but it is certain that a visit will be paid to Naples. It is probable that the King will terminate his cruise at Venice or Genoa, and that he will return thence overland to England, arriving in London about Saturday, April 27.

According to present arrangements the first Court of the season will be held by the King and Queen in the ball room of Buckingham Palace on the night of Friday, February 22. This will be practically a diplomatic and official function, and the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission are to attend, accompanied by their secretaries and Attachés. There will be a large number of presentations from the Diplomatic Circle.

The first two Levees of the season are to be held by the King in the Throne Room of St. James's Palace on Thursday, February 14, and on Tuesday, February 19, each day at noon. The first Levee will be principally diplomatic and official, and the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission are to attend, with their secretaries and Attachés. It is possible that the Prince of Wales may hold the third Levee of the season about the middle of March for the King, as his Majesty will then be absent from England. In this case there will be a fourth Levee early in May, and a fifth (and last) will be held during the first fortnight of June.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to be the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch at Dalkeith Palace for three days during the second week in July. The Prince and Princess are to visit the show of the Highland Agricultural Society at Prestonfield on Wednesday, July 10, and on Thursday, the 11th. On Thursday, also, they are to drive into Edinburgh in order that the Prince may lay the foundation-stone of the new Municipal School of Art. When the King (then Prince of Wales) visited Edinburgh on the occasion of the centenary show of the Highland and Agricultural Society, in 1899, he was the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch at Dalkeith, and the Palace was placed at the disposal of their Majesties in May, 1903, when they spent a week there, and fulfilled several public engagements at Edinburgh and at Glasgow. The Duke of Buccleuch is the President of the Highland Society this year.

I stated last week that the Prince of Wales will probably open the Keyham Extension Works, near Plymouth, on Thursday, February 21, as the representative of the King. I hear that it has now been decided that the Royal yacht is not to be used in connection with this ceremony. The Prince and Princess of Wales will travel from Paddington to Plymouth on Wednesday, February 20, and they are to be the guests of Lord and Lady Mount Edgcumbe at Mount Edgcumbe until the morning of February 22, when they will return to town in order to be in time for their Majesties' first Court, which is to be held at night. It is expected that the Prince and Princess will enter the closed basin at the north end of the extension works in the Admiralty yacht Vivid. The Lords of the Admiralty are to take part in the ceremonial, and they will be on board the Vivid with the Royal party.

Princess Henry of Battenberg and her son, Prince Alexander, were the guests last week for three days of Lord and Lady Exeter at Burghley House, Northamptonshire, where there was a very large party to meet them. The Royal guests attended the county ball at Stamford on Thursday night. On Friday there was a lawn meet at Burghley of the Fitzwilliam Foxhounds, and at night Lady Exeter gave a dance, which was attended by many of the guests who had been at the county ball.

Queen Marie of Hanover was greatly beloved and most highly esteemed by all who knew her. She was a noble and admirable woman, absolutely excellent in every relation of life. With a most kind and gracious manner she combined immense dignity, being a très grande dame of the school of the old Courts. When young she was celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments, and when over seventy she was still remarkably handsome. Queen Marie was a Princess of Saxe-Altenburg, and during the early years of her married life she was made very unhappy by the insolence and cruelty of her father-in-law, King Ernest, the notorious Duke of Cumberland. After his death she had a happy time for fifteen years, and then came the crash of 1866. King George died an exile in 1878, and Queen Marie had since divided her time between Gmunden and Vienna. Her great friends were the Emperor Francis Joseph and the late King Christian and Queen Louise of Denmark. There was unbounded confidence, sympathy, and affection between the two queens. The marriage of the Duke of Cumberland and Princess Thyra of Denmark delighted his mother, whose relations with her daughter-in-law have always been most cordial. Queen Marie was very charitable, and she regularly gave away a very large sum of money every year. She had a host of poor pensioners.

The story that Queen Marie had only recently become reconciled to her daughter, Princess Frederica, is untrue. The Queen did not approve of her daughter's marriage, which took place in 1880, but she soon became reconciled to her, and Princess Frederica has always since spent several weeks (or months) of the year with her mother at Gmunden. It was many years before the Duke of Cumberland would resume friendly relations with his sister, but they have now been on most amicable terms for a long time. The Princesses Marie and Frederica of Hanover vowed from childhood that they would marry only for love. It is an open secret that Princess Marie could have become Duchess of Connaught, and that the late Duke of Albany was eager to marry Princess Frederica, but neither of the sisters cared sufficiently for her English suitor.

It is probable that Queen Marie's death will lead to important changes. It is well known that the Duke of Cumberland had refused to come to any understanding with Prussia solely in deference to his mother's susceptibilities, and the uncompromising attitude which he assumed was regarded with sympathy by the Emperor Francis Joseph and by the late King Christian, both of whom respected his motives in making his mother's feelings his first consideration. The Emperor William will be rejoiced to establish a modus vivendi with the Duke of Cumberland.

The Empress Eugénie, who has been residing for several months at Farnborough Hill, leaves England to-morrow, and she will proceed to the Riviera after a short stay in Paris. The Empress intends to reside at the Villa Cyrnos until the end of April, when she will probably go for a cruise in the Mediterranean in her yacht Thistle. It is not expected that she will return to England until about the end of June. The Empress will stay at the Hotel Continental during her brief visit to Paris. The Duke of Alba and the Marquis of Villalobar (who is now in charge of the Spanish Embassy) have been staying at Farnborough Hill.

Last week was a busy one at Dublin Castle, in preparation for the coming season. The new Court arrangements have given much work in the department of the Chamberlain, Lord Hawkesbury. The Viceregal household officials are assembling this week in Dublin, where Lord and Lary Aberdeen are expected to arrive after spending some days in London on their return from Rome. There are many comfortable, if not very spacious, residences for the Viceregal household in the Castle yards. Captain and Lady Celia Coates will reside there. Captain and Lady Clementine Waring have been lent the Private Secretary's Lodge in the Phœnix Park, which was the residence of Lord Randolph Churchill during his father's Viceroyalty, and where Mr. Winston Churchill spent some years of his early youth.

The New Year has been one of expectation in Ireland with regard to many other new things, and in especial the new Chief Secretary. With a country "on the make," interest is naturally deeply engaged in its appointed, leading makers. No high official will want for advisers in the country just now, where every one, more or less, is ready to lend a helping hand in framing a Constitution which will bring peace with honour to distressful Ireland at last. The misfortune lies in the infinite variety of the nostrums recommended with a view to that end. No doubt there is wisdom in a multitude of counsellors, but then too many cooks spoil the broth. And it seems, somehow or other, very easy to spoil in Ireland.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, who is now at Belmont Castle, is to visit Glasgow on Friday, the 25th, when he will be presented with the freedom of his native city. The ceremony is to take place at noon in St. Andrew's Hall, after which the Lord Provost and Corporation will entertain the Prime Minister to luncheon in the Banqueting Room of the City Chambers. Sir Henry's father—Sir James Campbell, of Strathcathro—was Lord Provost of Glasgow from 1840 until 1843. He had settled in Glasgow in 1805, when he founded the well-known firm of J. and W. Campbell. Sir Henry was born at Kelvinside House, a large and handsome mansion on the banks of the river Kelvin, which was pulled down some years ago, and the site is now covered with houses.

Lord Alexander Russell, who died on Thursday in his eighty-sixth year, was the youngest son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, by his second marriage with Lady Georgiana Gordon, daughter of the Duke of Gordon. He was a half-brother of the seventh Duke, of Lord William Russell (grandfather of the present Duke of Bedford), and of Lord John (Earl) Russell; and a brother of the late Duchess-Dowager of Abercorn and of Lord Wriothesley Russell, Canon of Windsor. Lord Alexander served in the Army for nearly half a century. He took part in the Kaffir War in South Africa, and in the Crimean War, and served in Canada (being then in command of a battalion of the Rifle Brigade) for about eight years. After that he was employed at home, but in 1883 he was appointed to the command of the troops in British North America, and he remained for five years at Halifax, where he was exceedingly popular among all classes.

Lord Alexander Russell retired from the Army in 1888, and he afterwards lived for many years at Ewhurst Park, near Basingstoke, a place which he rented from the Duke of Wellington, but for some time past he had resided at Woodeaton, near Oxford. He was an excellent commanding officer, and his genial manners, his fine courtesy, and his liberal and very pleasant hospitalities, made him a general favourite. He was much liked by his Hampshire neighbours, and his departure from Ewhurst was greatly regretted throughout the district.

Colonel Wenman Coke, who died on Thursday, was the youngest brother of Lord Leicester. He served for many years in the Scots Guards, and took part in the Crimean campaign. Colonel Coke was returned as member for East Norfolk in 1858, and his unexpected defeat in 1865 created a great sensation, as it was regarded as a serious blow to the supremacy of the territorial magnates, who were then in absolute command of most of the county seats. Colonel Coke was supported by the great landlords of the county, but the Norfolk farmers threw off the yoke and elected a candidate of their own.

Dr. Haig Brown was a very able and most successful headmaster, but he will be best remembered as the far-sighted and sagacious pioneer of the movement for removing the City schools either to the country or to the suburbs. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and late in life he worked hard for the transfer of his old school from Newgate-street to West Horsham. He was headmaster of the Charterhouse from 1863 until 1897, when he retired on being appointed Master of the Charterhouse. His great achievement was the successful removal of the school from the centre of London to Godalming, and this was not carried out without strenuous opposition, but he conducted his campaign with consummate tact and indomitable resolution. The scheme, however, was sadly hampered by the fatuities of the governing body, arrangements being made to accommodate only 180 boys, whereas in less than four years room was urgently needed for over 500. Dr. Haig Brown was a fine classical scholar, and profoundly versed in English literature. He was a man of strong common sense, absolutely free from "side," and by no means favouring extreme views in religion or visionary ideals in the practice of life. He was ever most grateful to Christ's Hospital, and had made large donations to that foundation.

A considerable sensation was excited in West Cornwall last week by the announcement that the mineral rights of Mr. A. F. Basset's Tehidy estate have been privately sold to a foreign syndicate. These include the celebrated mines of Dolcoath, East Pool, and Carn Brea, and it is said that the royalties now amount to about £15,000 a year. Mr. Basset is the representative of the Baroness Basset, who inherited large and valuable estates in West Cornwall from her father, Lord de Dunstanville, who had made a large fortune out of successful speculations in Cornish mines.

RETURNING TO OUR MUTTON.
(With Many Thanks to the "Lancet.")

O Lancet, O Lancet,
I dance it, and prance it,
  And skip it, with pleasure to note
How the door you thus shut on
That beastly cold mutton
  As unfit for humanity's throat.

I always have thought so;
My wife, too, I've taught so;
  But in vain. She'd my lessons ignore;
Give me cold leg—aye, bolder,
At times, e'en cold shoulder—
  And hold up her hands if I swore;

Or, taking to task me,
Ironic she'd ask me
  Who was the cold mutton to eat?
Or if, when once tasted,
The joints I'd like wasted
  And thrown to the dogs in the street?

But now fortified O,
With you on my side O,
  Dear Lancet, I'll into her rub,
That if she likes to cut on,
Till finished, cold mutton,
  She may . . . I will dine at the Club.

By an oversight which I much regret the name of Dr. Burney, the late Archdeacon of Kingston, was printed in last week's Truth as "Baring." The penman, not the printer, was at fault in this instance, but as the Doctor's relationship to Madame D'Arblay was mentioned in the paragraph I admit that the fault does not end there.

The promotion of Dr. Kirkpatrick to the Deanery of Ely has vacated two important offices in the University of Cambridge. The election to the Lady Margaret Professorship of Divinity (which is the blue ribbon of such posts) is to take place on February 27. The electors are the Vice-Chancellor, and those Doctors and Bachelors in Divinity who are members of the Senate. Each candidate has to deliver a prelection before the electors on some branch of theology, such discourse not to exceed one hour in length. The Mastership of Selwyn College will not be an easy position to fill up. The Dean of Ely's successor must be a High Churchman, and the possession of adequate private means is an indispensable qualification.

Canon Knox Little has resigned the Vicarage of Hoar Cross, Staffordshire, to which he was presented many years ago by the late Mrs. Meynell Ingram. The living, which is of the net value of about £300 a year, with house, is now in the gift of the Meynell Ingram Trustees, who have presented it to the Rev. Frank Fuller, curate of St. Matthew's, Westminster, who was curate of Hoar Cross many years ago. The church, which is a very handsome one, is locally celebrated for its elaborate ritual. The large and valuable Hoar Cross estates were left by Mrs. Meynell Ingram to her brother, Mr. Frederick Wood, who has assumed the name of Meynell. Canon Knox Little will reside permanently at Worcester in future. He was appointed in 1881 by Mr. Gladstone to a stall in Worcester Cathedral, which is worth £800 a year, with house.

Mrs. Boyle, widow of the well-known Dean of Salisbury, who died last week, was celebrated for her munificent charities both at Salisbury and at Kidderminster, where her husband was vicar from 1867, when he replaced the late Bishop (Claughton) of St. Albans, until 1880, when Lord Beaconsfield appointed him to the Deanery of Salisbury. Mrs. Boyle was warmly interested in many philanthropic schemes, which she most generously supported. She was a daughter of Mr. Robins, of Stourbridge, then a leading banker in that district, and had resided at Salisbury since her husband's death, which took place in 1901.

As mentioned last week, I have received one or two further communications with reference to the case of Father Hays, but I really do not know that they are worth troubling my readers with. One is from a gentleman who, while admitting that Bishop Brindle "acted without prudence and discretion and failed to acquaint himself with the circumstances of a peculiarly delicate case," goes on to refer to the fact that "Father Hays devoted nearly all his life to philanthropic work among the people rather than priestly work in the sanctuary," also to his consorting with Protestants in temperance work, and his "broad and liberal" utterances, and so forth. We have heard all this in a letter published two or three weeks ago. To say that the priest worked too much among the poor, and was not sufficiently intolerant or arrogant towards non-Catholics, seems to me a poor sort of excuse to offer for proceedings on the part of the Bishop which are intrinsically indefensible. Neither does it seem to me to reflect much credit on the writer or the "Catholic" Church.

The following is a different point:—

From reading your article on Bishop Brindle and Father Hays, a non-Catholic reader might be led to infer that the strange incidents and promotions, etc., witnessed in the diocese of Nottingham are common to other Roman Catholic dioceses in England. As personally acquainted with five dioceses, permit me to say this is not so. Such things are unknown here in Lancashire. As a rule, our English Catholic bishops are men of ability and tact, having the entire confidence of a loyal and devoted clergy. A LANCASHIRE CATHOLIC.

In TRUTH of December 26 a paragraph appeared having reference to an appeal of the Duchess of Sutherland on behalf of the Potteries Cripples' Guild. The appeal stated that the Guild had obtained an order for the flowers used in the production of "Les Merveilleuses" at Daly's Theatre; and what I said was that the Duchess had apparently been incorrectly informed on this point by some one connected with the Guild, as the flowers in question were of German manufacture, and had been supplied by an agent in London to the agent of the Guild. I regret to find that I am the person who was misinformed. The statement as I gave it was certainly made by a gentleman who ought to have known the facts, and who supplied a few flowers which the League were unable to turn out. But on closer investigation it appears that this last fact is the sole foundation for the statement. The Potteries Cripples' Guild undoubtedly supplied all the flowers, with certain trifling exceptions. It has taken me some time to get at the whole truth, but now that I have done so I must apologise to all concerned for having been misled in the matter.

Both in London and in Glasgow last week there were interesting prosecutions under the Lotteries Act. In the London case the defendant was the promotor of a penny raffle in connection with a concert in aid of "The National League of the Blind," and at Glasgow a clergyman, his session clerk, and the hon. secretary of a bazaar committee were getting up an illegal guessing competition, in which the entrance fee was also a penny. For the latter event the prize was a gold watch, and the competition was to have taken the form of guesses as to the precise second at which the watch would stop after being wound up. The children attending the Sunday school were engaged in selling tickets, and this little gamble promised to be so extensively patronised that the clergyman and his colleagues counted upon netting a profit of £120 for the purpose of the church. In both cases convictions were recorded and small penalties imposed. The notion that the law relating to lotteries may be broken with impunity if it is only broken for some charitable or religious object is much too prevalent, and it is therefore satisfactory to see that something is being done to correct it.

A lamentable letter appeared in the Scotsman the other day from a Lieutenant-Colonel Seton. The poor gentleman had been reading in the Times a letter on "Raids and Invasion," which had led him to believe that a landing of 80,000 German warriors on the coast of Scotland is an event to be anticipated at any moment. The Lieutenant-Colonel judges that compulsory service for youths under twenty is the only thing left for Scotland under these circumstances, and he implores the women of Great Britain to throw their weight into the scale, darkly hinting at what the female sex in particular have to apprehend in the event of 80,000 German savages once getting loose among our hearths and homes.

Now this just shows the consequences of the indiscriminate distribution of sensational literature among people of weak nerves. We talk of the effects of penny dreadfuls on boys, but what is it by comparison with the case of this old soldier, shaking in his shoes, and appealing to every one to shake likewise, all through some utterance of the "blue funk school" which he has read in his favourite newspaper? I presume he is only a retired lieutenant-colonel, and not quite the intrepid warrior that he was when his moustaches were first growing; but that is only an additional reason why his friends, and the friends of all old gentlemen of the same type, and old ladies too, should take care to keep alarming literature of this sort out of their reach. I hope that something will be done to calm the nerves of this gallant old officer, and to explain to him that we still have a Navy at least three times as strong relatively to the particular enemy he has in view as any that Nelson could muster in the days when "Boney" was waiting to pounce on our ancestors and ancestresses.

Not the least pathetic point in the letter is the poor gentleman's ludicrous idea that an invasion by 80,000 troops of the flower of the German army can be warded off by merely giving a little compulsory drill and musketry training to all our boys under twenty years of age. Either he supposes that the terrible Germans will be driven pell-mell into the sea by the lads of Scotland who happen to be under arms; or that the same result will be ensured by a levée en masse of this once-and-for-ever trained population, unorganised, undisciplined, and probably unarmed; or perhaps even that the mere probability of this event will deter the Kaiser and his staff from ever attempting the rash enterprise. The idea that a German invasion in such force, if possible at any moment, requires the maintenance in Scotland of a standing army of at least equal size and efficiency, does not seem to have occurred to him, in spite of his early martial education and experience.

In view of the appearance of letters like this in newspapers which ought to know better than to publish them, and the panic-stricken utterances of our field-marshals and generals on the subject of the Channel Tunnel, what I would propose is this. First of all let us get rid of our Navy, beyond a sufficiency of cruisers to guard our commerce in war. Next, let us bring home all our garrisons from South Africa and the Mediterranean. With the money saved on our battle fleet let us build a good high wall all round our coast—something like the Great Wall of China. Behind the wall let us have a conscript army equal to the German in numbers and efficiency, that is to say, four millions strong on a war footing, with at least 600,000 constantly under arms close to the coast, in case of emergency. In front of the wall let sentries perambulate the beach day and night with their eyes always on the offing on the look-out for the enemy's fleet. Under this scheme of national defence, I think that the population at large might possibly go to bed at night with some sense of security. But I do not go so far as to say that this feeling would be justified. On the principle applied at present to naval defence, it is obvious that if we are to be really safe we must be prepared for a combination of two invaders against us. We ought, therefore, to have something like eight million troops behind our wall, and perhaps a little margin over to meet "the wastage of war." I think if we took these precautions the panic-mongers might be silenced—temporarily.

When Mr. Brodrick waved his wand and conjured into existence six army corps, it struck me as a pretty trick, but not much more. When Mr. Haldane waves the official wand again, and hey, presto! we have an imposing "expeditionary force," marshalled for immediate business into commands, divisions, and brigades, instead of army corps, my mind naturally runs back to Mr. Brodrick's conjuring. It looks very pretty on paper, and I do not question that it is highly scientific, though that is a question for experts. No doubt the business-like organisation of your materials in the way that will make them most effective for business purposes is a very important matter. But the materials come before the organisation. We know now where we are to look for all our units when they are wanted, and the places they are to fit into. The important question remains, however, whether they will be there when we come to look for them, and what condition they will be in.

A veterinary officer in India writes to me with some vehemence to protest against the order recently issued for the instruction of combatant officers in veterinary science. The question seems to have been dealt with at some length in the Veterinary News for November 3, in an article the general tenor of which is sufficiently indicated by its title, "Every man to his trade." The article criticised a recent memorandum of the Adjutant-General in India calling attention to the facilities afforded for the instruction of cavalry officers in veterinary hospitals, the objection to this being that veterinary officers have enough to do without imparting a smattering of scientific knowledge to cavalry men, and that these men are not serious students, but a "mob of sightseers," who have no hankering after serious knowledge, but merely obstruct and embarrass the man of science in the performance of his scientific duties. The writer asks what the R.A.M.C. would say if regimental officers were turned into the military hospitals to learn how to doctor soldiers, and so on, and so on.

Seeger's Hair Dye.—Dyes the hair by merely combing through. 2s. the Case, or Trial Bottle, mailed free from observation, 7d.—Hinde's Ltd., 1A, Finsbury, London.

With all respect to the veterinary staff of the Army, this line of argument seems a trifle absurd. As a matter of fact, regimental officers are now being called upon to acquire some smattering of sanitary science, and if they are instructed at the same time in first aid to the injured, or in any other common knowledge that may be necessary on the battlefield or in a campaign, no one could object to it on any ground except that officers have too much to learn already. But whatever may be the case with regard to the treatment of human beings, there cannot be two opinions as to the desirability of cavalry officers—and, for the matter of that, cavalry soldiers also—knowing something about the proper treatment of horses. I always thought that the need for "horsemastership" in the cavalry was one of the most valuable among the many "lessons" of the Boer War, and all that the authorities seem to be doing at present is to enforce this lesson.

It really cannot be pretended that there is any great professional mystery about the doctoring of animals under ordinary circumstances. Every man who takes a personal interest in his stable knows pretty well how to doctor his horses himself. If he keeps a stable but does not interest himself in it, he trusts to a coachman or groom to do this job, and the occasions when it is necessary to call in a vet. are extremely rare. Every farmer who knows his trade knows how to doctor his own cattle in the ordinary ailments to which they are subject. And in the case of dogs, I should think that most of the people who find it necessary to consult vets. about the health of their pets are women.

When you come to the Army, you are in the position that your horses are for the most part in the charge of young men who have not had time to acquire the lore of the stable. This is true both of privates and junior officers. Even a horsey man who gets a commission in the cavalry has not the opportunities of frequenting stables and looking after horses personally that he would have, and utilise, if he were living in the country with a stable of his own. Common sense suggests that you should give both privates and officers some sort of instruction which will make them as competent to look after their horses in sickness and health as a coachman who has spent perhaps ten or twenty years in private service. I recommend the military section of the veterinary profession to sink professional pedantry and adopt this common sense view.

From information received, I gather that the War Office has just called for the names of non-commissioned officers on the permanent staff of the Volunteers with upwards of twenty-one years' service, presumably with a view to their discharge. I am sorry to disappoint those sergeant-instructors who have protested to me against this proceeding, but as it is entirely in accordance with suggestions that have frequently been made in Truth at the instance of the much more numerous body of non-commissioned officers who have not completed twenty-one years' service, and are very anxious about their prospects of promotion, I am estopped from questioning the wisdom of the War Office in this instance. One man concerned candidly admits that there are sergeant-instructors above the twenty-one years' limit who have ceased to be efficient, and may properly be removed; but he goes on to contend that the proper course is to make a searching investigation of the abilities and attainments of the men during the annual course of instruction, which is now about to take place, and to deal with them upon their merits, irrespective of age. My own view, however, is that the "too old at forty" rule requires to be applied in the Army, if anywhere; and that if a non-commissioned officer is retained in a position which requires that he should be of the highest degree of smartness and efficiency all round beyond the twenty-one years' limit, it should only be because he is such an exceptional man that it is impossible to find a junior who could do his work equally well.

Many growls have appeared in TRUTH respecting the result of the abolition of the rank of regimental quartermaster-sergeant in the Field Artillery depots as regards the staff-sergeants, who are thereby excluded from any further promotion, unless to warrant rank. I have again been reminded that this grievance stands unchanged, and it sems to be a genuine one. The staff-sergeants concerned are precluded from earning any increase of pension beyond their 2s. 6d. a day, while they see men like farriers, wheelers, and saddlers rising to quartermaster-sergeant, and retiring on 2s. 9d., though possibly they have inferior education certificates. I have a notion, though I am unable to verify it at the moment, that in the Army Service Corps, or one of the departments, pension rises periodically by length of service, irrespective of classification by rank. Is not this a sound principle to apply all round?

Just after asking the last question, I hear a still louder and more comprehensive growl on the same subject from the Royal Engineers. It is alleged that there is now such a block in promotion in that corps that a non-com. has but the slightest chance of ever acquiring a pension of 2s. 6d., let alone improving upon it. The following are given as the average periods for each step in the non-commissioned ranks under present circumstances:—

Lance-corporal to 2nd corporal	3 to 4 years.
2nd corporal to full ditto	4 years.
Full-corporal to sergeant	5½ years.
Sergeant to coy. sergt.-major	7½ years.

Assuming that a man is made lance-corporal with three years' service, which seems as much as can be expected under the circumstances, he will barely be able to complete six years' service as sergeant at the above rates. I give the table for what it is worth, but if it represents anything like the true facts, the matter deserves consideration from every point of view, for the prospect of earning increased pension is the strongest inducement to good conduct, energy, and self-improvement. The present state of things in the Royal Engineers is said to have been largely brought about by the fact that immediately before the submarine mining branch was disbanded no less than thirteen comparatively junior sergeants were promoted to quartermaster-sergeant, only to become at once supernumerary to the establishment, while jumping over the heads of men in other branches who were years senior to them. This senseless proceeding has inflicted what is really life-long injury all through the non-commissioned ranks of the corps, and, in fact, beyond that limit.

A gentleman writing to me from Galway states that he had just seen a detachment of Connaught Rangers marching from barracks to the Town Hall, armed with brooms. His curiosity aroused, he followed them up, and found that their duty was to clean up and decorate the place in preparation for the Galway Hunt Ball, and that they strongly disapproved of it, one man going so far as to observe that if they had understood that soldiers had to do this sort of job for civilians as part of their duty they would none of them have enlisted. The witness mentions that it is not the first time he has seen soldiers thus employed, and that he believes it to have a bad effect on their military spirit, and to be a discouragement to recruiting. I should think there cannot be a doubt of it, and it is amazing that in these days such things should be allowed. In the abstract, all forms of labour may be equally honourable, but in the concrete they are not so regarded. Many lads, including some of the best soldiers, enlist with the idea that there is something honourable and glorious in military service. I do not know how that idea could be more effectually dissipated than by publicly compelling soldiers to do the work of charwomen, or supplying them in detachments to influential civilians who want labour without paying for it.

This reminds me of another hunt ball, to the success of which the sister Service seems to have contributed. This one was held at Monmouth, and, according to the Western Mail, a special feature in the decoration of the ball-room "was the utilisation of over 100 signalling flags from H.M.S. Drake." Very pretty they looked, no doubt, but why should public property be loaned in this way to private individuals? I dare say the flags were none the worse for it, but the principle is wrong. If I were giving a party, and sent round to the Admiralty to ask if they could lend me a little crockery or a few knives and forks, I suppose I should be referred—and quite properly—to Mr. John Barker or Harrods' Stores. But if flags are supplied for private entertainments, why not table furniture; and if to hunt balls, why not to a fashionable soirée at a newspaper office?

The Sleaford Guardians met with an unaccustomed check last week in an attempt to enforce an order which they had obtained against a farm labourer for the payment of a shilling a week towards his father's maintenance. The order was made in November, and the Guardians summoned the defendant before the Sleaford Bench for the amount due with costs up till the end of December. In cases of this description, unfortunate men have frequently been committed to prison on hearsay evidence by a poor law official as to their means. On the present occasion, however, a solicitor instructed by the National Agricultural Labourers' Union appeared for the defence, with the result that the facts were properly placed before the magistrates, and the summons was eventually dismissed on the ground that during the period in question the defendant's earnings were insufficient to enable him to comply with the order. This might have been ascertained by the prosecution if inquiries had been made, but as a rule Bumble does not care to make such inquiries. His idea seems to be that when orders are made, any poor wretch out of whom money cannot be squeezed ought to be sent to gaol.

The poll of the Incorporated Law Society, taken by way of appeal from the vote of the general meeting on December 14, has resulted in a decisive victory for the reforming party. The motion defeated on December 14 has now been carried by a majority of close on two to one, 1,169 votes to 609; and although the aggregate votes polled represent only a fraction of the membership of the Society, it must be taken that those who did not vote have no strong feeling on the subject one way or the other, and that the majority accurately represents the preponderance of feeling among those solicitors who appreciate the importance of the question at issue. Incidentally one may remark that the by-law which requires all votes on a poll of the Society to be recorded by personal attendance is a very stupid one. It must necessarily disfranchise large numbers of the busiest provincial solicitors, and would seem to have been framed for the purpose of defeating the only object of taking a poll, namely, to obtain the opinions of those members who are unable to attend a general meeting.

The result, so far as it goes, is satisfactory to the public, and particularly so to me, because it endorses the views that have been repeatedly expressed in TRUTH. I have been told over and over again that it is hopeless to expect the profession to deal with this question, that the majority is dead against reform, and even that this attitude is justifiable. The last point was never to my mind arguable; the others have now been conclusively disproved. It has always been my opinion, knowing a great many solicitors personally, that the majority are ashamed of the long-standing scandals in the profession, and would even submit to personal inconvenience if it promised any hope of diminishing them, and this is now proved to be the true state of the case.

What effect the measures proposed will have in the desired direction remains to be seen, and, in point of fact, all that has been decided by the vote just taken is that a committee shall be appointed to consider and report upon these measures, which will remind the public that the Council of the Law Society has before now managed to burke the report of a reforming committee. Even when the report has been made and has been approved and put into force, it will not remove many of the opportunities which a solicitor necessarily has for committing breaches of trust. No professional definition of the proper and regular course of business, even backed by an official inspection and audit of books, can effect as much as that. But what it can do is to limit materially the opportunities for confusing meum and tuum, and to prevent weak but well-intentioned men from exposing themselves to irresistible temptation by handling other people's money in an unbusinesslike way.

An eminent anti-reformer, Mr. Sampson, spoke sympathetically not long ago of the "misfortunes" of Benjamin Lake—misfortunes which led him and his firm to make away with about £200,000 of their clients' money. So far as the defalcations of solicitors can be regarded, from their own point of view, as "misfortunes," the measures of which, in principle, the majority of the Law Society has expressed approval will put an end to them altogether. Beyond that point, I suppose clients will always have to trust chiefly to the influence of the police, the Old Bailey, and the assize courts. In the meantime, the profession has really done something at last to relieve itself of the reproach of conniving at all these regrettable incidents.

The resignation of Lord Kyllachy has caused the first vacancy in the Court of Session since the Liberals came into office. Six of the present Scotch judges were appointed by the late Government. Lord Kyllachy was raised to the Bench in 1889 at a time when he held the distinguished office of Dean of the Faculty of Advocates. He was a remarkably strong judge, and his decisions were almost invariably affirmed by the Inner House of the Court of Session and the House of Lords. He will be a great loss to the Court, and his retirement is very much regretted in the Edinburgh Parliament House.

Apropos of some remarks last week upon local legal appointments, a correspondent mentions that at Banbury the clerk to the borough magistrates is likewise the coroner, and also holds several other public offices. This sort of pluralism is, of course, very common, especially in small country towns. In Banbury, however, comment has been evoked by the fact that the gentleman in question now employs his son, a very young solicitor, as deputy-coroner, and also by the fact that the same son frequently appears as an advocate in cases before the magistrates to whom his father acts as clerk. The latter arrangement is manifestly objectionable. Of course, there is not the least likelihood that the impartiality of the advice which it is the clerk's duty to give to the magistrates would be affected in any way whatever by the circumstance that his son represented one of the parties to a case. But, as has been found in the analogous case of barristers practising in County Courts in which their fathers sit as judges, ideas of that kind are sure to get abroad among ill-informed and suspicious-minded persons, with the result that a slur is cast upon the administration of justice, and as another consequence of such an arrangement the rest of the legal profession are subjected to what is virtually an unfair competition for the business before the court.

A Radical friend of mine writes deprecating any general substitution of stipendiaries for honorary magistrates. He is a county J.P. himself, and he recognises the faults of many of the Great Unpaid—their inclination to be unduly severe in dealing with poachers, and to regard any offences against property as more serious matters than offences against the person or acts of cruelty to animals. Still, my friend seems to think that with all its faults the present magisterial system has some considerable advantages, and that for one thing a J.P., knowing the ways and habits of the poor people of his neighbourhood and possessed of some amount of common sense, tact, and sympathy, can often dispose of petty matters more effectively and suitably than a stipendiary would do. I have no doubt that there are J.P.s who render good service in this way. But, on the other hand, there are many who, judging from their performances on the Bench, are as destitute of common sense and mercy as they are ignorant of law, and, with all respect to my correspondent, what he says certainly does not outweigh the very strong arguments that exist for the abolition of the Great Unpaid.

For the past few days I have been bombarded with newspaper reports of a case at Ayr Sheriff Court in which Major Ian Stewart, of the Scottish Rifles, was indicted for having (1) assaulted John White, farmer, by presenting at him a gun and threatening to shoot him, (2) assaulted Duncan McFarlane, gamekeeper, by striking him on the head with the gun "to the great effusion of blood, and to the serious injury of his person," and (3) assaulted James Ferguson, farm manager, in the same manner. These charges, to which the accused pleaded guilty, arose out of a remarkable affair on January 1. It seems that Major Stewart was the guest of a relative who is the shooting tenant at Montgomerie Castle. McFarlane is a gamekeeper on the estate, and on New Year's Day, finding that his services were not required by his employer, he invited some farmers to join him in rabbit shooting. He does not appear to have had any express authority to do this, but on the other hand, I am told that it is customary in the district for the tenantry to have such shooting parties on New Year's Day.

During the afternoon Major Stewart and his brother came across the party in the neighbourhood of the Castle. Though the gamekeeper was with them, the Major treated them as poachers. He obtained their names, and then took possession of two guns. White refused to give up his gun, whereupon the Major loaded one of the guns he had already seized and threatened to shoot White. The latter replied that two could play at that game, and the Major then walked away, carrying off the two guns. Ferguson followed, and asked for the return of his gun. The Major replied by hitting him on the head with it, inflicting a wound which bled profusely. McFarlane, who next came up and asked for his gun, was also struck, the blow rendering him unconscious for a couple of hours, and the wound having to be stitched up by a surgeon. While admitting the assaults, Major Stewart's solicitor suggested that they were committed under the apprehension that it would have been dangerous to give up the guns to "men with their tempers raised and with drink in them." It was, however, denied that the gamekeeper or any of his friends were drunk, and as to temper, the accused seems to have been the only person that was dangerous.

The Court was informed that both the injured men had received substantial pecuniary compensation from Major Stewart, and presumably Sheriff Shairp took this fact into consideration in deciding that a fine of £10 would meet the case. But I am not surprised to find that this very lenient decision has provoked a great amount of unfavourable criticism in the district. It is being asked whether a fine would have been deemed a sufficient punishment if one of the farmers or the gamekeeper had stunned Major Stewart by a blow on the head with a gun, and afterwards pleaded that this was done lest he should shoot somebody. The general idea that in that event the offender would have been sent to gaol is probably correct.

The failure of the prosecution under the Lottery Act against a concern styled the International Securities Syndicate is not surprising in view of the facts and the judicial decisions to which the magistrate, Mr. Curtis Bennett, referred. The prosecution was based on the issue by the defendants of advertisements, pamphlets, and circulars relating to various continental municipal and other bonds, which, besides being interest-bearing securities, offer the attraction of a gamble by means of periodical drawings for cash prizes or premiums. It is obvious that, though such bonds present one of the features of a lottery, they nevertheless stand in a different category to ordinary lottery tickets, which give the purchaser no return whatever for his money if he fails to win a prize. In spite, however, of the dismissal of the summons, I hope that the case will do something to put people on their guard against the International Securities Syndicate. In the course of his judgment, Mr. Curtis Bennett remarked that it was well that the public should know that "the prices charged by this syndicate were greatly in excess of those charged by members of the Stock Exchange for the same bonds"; and quite apart from the question of price, it would be very imprudent for persons desiring to buy such bonds to do their business through an outside firm of unknown individuals.

"What are prisoners charged for being shaved?" This curious question, asked by one of the magistrates at Salford Hundred Quarter Sessions last week, elicited the information that if a prisoner awaiting his trial desires to be shaved he has to pay eighteenpence for the attendance of a barber. The chief warder from Strangeways Gaol said that the services of a barber could not be obtained for a smaller fee, but probably it will be found that this is a mistake, seeing that there are plenty of penny or twopenny shaving shops close at hand, and not a few prisoners ready to pay a reasonable price. Eighteenpence is, of course, a prohibitive fee, and if a prisoner wishes to appear in court with a clean face he ought not to be debarred from doing so. A magistrate observed that a man's appearance in the dock unshaven might help to give the jury a bad impression of him, and though this is scarcely flattering to the intelligence of jurymen, it is not at all unlikely.

The Clerk to the Gloucester Magistrates has written to me as follows with reference to the appearance in my Legal Pillory last week of a case in which one Samuel Knight was fined 10s. and 9s. costs for assaulting Elizabeth Moseley:—

> Your report of the case is based entirely on the evidence given by the witnesses for the complainant, but three witnesses, one of whom was his wife, were called by the defendant, and swore that he did not assault his wife at all, that he and his wife and a friend had come home from a walk when the complainant came into their house and used very bad language, and broke some of the furniture, and they admitted that the defendant knocked the complainant down after great provocation. The magistrates had to determine which of the witnesses were telling the truth, and having seen and heard all the witnesses, they believed those for the defence.
> I may say that Mr. Ward did not take any part in the case, as he did not hear all the evidence.

Of course, if the version of the affair put forward for the defence was correct, an ample penalty was imposed. But if the magistrates were convinced of the correctness of that version, it is a little difficult to understand why the Chairman of the Bench should have stigmatised the man's conduct as "cowardly and brutal." The use of those strong epithets—a point on which the Clerk is silent—scarcely conveyed the idea that the defendant had only struck the woman under the extreme provocation suggested in the above letter.

Included in my Legal Pillory are half a dozen sentences of imprisonment for thefts of boots from shops—samples of scores of sentences that are being passed week after week for precisely similar thefts. Recorders and magistrates have frequently condemned the practice of exposing goods for sale in front of shops, where they are neither secured nor watched in any way; but protests and admonitions from the Bench do not seem to have any effect. The practice in question is a prolific cause of petty larceny, and it appears to be especially prevalent in connection with cheap boot shops, the result being that as boots displayed in this way are articles that can be easily taken and concealed, they offer a particularly strong temptation to men and women who have the slightest inclination to be dishonest. It is undoubtedly in consequence of this temptation being placed in their way in the streets that some at least of the offenders first become thieves; and it seems to me a shocking state of things that such a system of manufacturing criminals should be tolerated. With regard to the following list, it will be observed that the magistracy, while showing no lack of severity in the punishment of all kinds of trivial thefts, are full of the most tender consideration for ruffians convicted of violent and cruel assaults:—

Andover Petty Sessions. Before Mr. R. Purcell Llewellin and other magistrates. David Williams, charged with assaulting two County Court bailiffs, who were levying an execution on his premises. He struck, kicked, and bit them, and both still bore the marks of his teeth. The chairman said he must be a bit of a savage. Fined 20s. and costs for each assault.

St. Helen's Police-court. Thos. Docherty, charged with assaulting a policeman. While conveying a prisoner to the police station the officer was attacked by the defendant, who struck him a severe blow in the face, and also kicked him. Fined 20s. and costs.

Halstead Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. G. Courtauld, R. Hunt, C. E. Brewster, M. Stephenson, F. A. Vaizey, G. Wier, R. L. Hughes, H. H. Portway, and A. Blomfield. Martin James Diss, charged with assaulting his wife, and also with being drunk and disorderly. His wife had obtained a separation order from him, but he persisted in annoying her, and on the occasion in question he assaulted her twice at the railway station. Fined 15s. and costs for the assault, and 5s. and costs for drunkenness.

Melksham Police-court. Before Messrs. G. Lopes and A. Stratton. Reginald Francis Phillips, charged with assaulting Rose Melinda Price by knocking her down and striking her several times. A woman said that she saw the complainant bleeding from the mouth and the nose, and when she told the defendant that he ought to be ashamed of himself he threatened "to serve her the same." Fined 20s., and bound over.

Lindsey Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. W. Embleton Fox and other magistrates. Henry Hasling, charged with stealing a pair of boots from a shop. Six months.

Chorley Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. Whitehead, F. E. Crosse, and G. T. Brown. Wm. Westwell, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. Fourteen days.

Faringdon Petty Sessions. Before Sir W. Throckmorton, Viscount Barrington, and Messrs. G. W. Habgood, W. J. Butler, and W. R. Shute-Barrington. Henry King, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. One month.

Rotherham Borough Police-court. John Swift, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. Three weeks.

Brigg Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Cliff, J. Popple, H. G. Dent, and J. Spilman. Charlotte Hopkins, aged 13, charged with stealing coal, value 3d., and her mother, charged with receiving the coal. The child was bound over to be of good behaviour for six months, and the mother sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

Preston Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. R. B. Walmsley and other magistrates. Elizabeth Durkin, charged with stealing a shawl. Six months.

Grimsby Quarter Sessions. Before the Deputy Recorder. George Green, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. Five months.

Grantham Police-court. Wm. Smith, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. One month.

CANNES.—HOTEL DES ANGLAIS, First-class. Numerous Self-contained Suites, with Private Bath-Rooms, etc. Central Heating. Renowned Cuisine and Cellars. Large Park.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

Barnsley West Riding Police-court. Before Messrs. C. Brady and W. Dutson and Dr. Horne. Henry Emmerson, convicted of assaulting Enoch Parry. He was knocked down and kicked in the face, and owing to his injuries was unable to work for eight days. Fined 10s. and costs.

St. Rollox Police-court, Glasgow. Before Bailie Maclay. A young man, named M'Lean, charged with assaulting his father. The latter, who was aged and feeble, was dragged out of his bed and knocked about in a brutal manner. Fined 21s.

Smethwick Police-court. Samuel Cooper, charged with assaulting his daughter, aged eleven years. He went home drunk and his wife left the house. He then intimated his intention of "giving it" to his daughter for an alleged theft of a penny. The child ran away to a relative's house, but defendant followed her and struck her a savage blow in the forehead with the buckled end of a belt. The girl's eye was cut and closed, and she also sustained a bad wound in the head. The Bench "considered defendant's conduct amounted to cruelty." Fined £2 14s. 6d.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. W. Legge and R. W. Spriggs. James Conway and James Wilson, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. They pleaded guilty, saying that they were out of work and starving. Fourteen days each.

Paisley Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Darling Lyall. Joseph Black, Michael O'Neil, and Wm. Hannah, convicted under the Poaching Prevention Act of being found in possession of several rabbits and nets when searched on the highway. Fined £3 each.

Derbyshire Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. E. W. Barnes and other magistrates. Ada Salt, aged 42, charged with stealing two fowls. Twelve months.

Oakham Petty Sessions. Before Sir A. J. Fludyer and Messrs. G. H. Finch, E. Worrall, and P. C. Evans Freke. Joseph W. Walker, labourer, charged with stealing a hare from outside a shop, and Ernest Needham, labourer, charged with receiving the hare. Three weeks each.

Nuneaton Police-court. Wm. Storer, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. One month.

One of the innumerable dissatisfied customers of Mr. H. J. Gasson, of Rye, sends me a little note that he has received from that gentleman apropos of a recent paragraph in TRUTH. He had been refusing for many months to pay Gasson's bill of 14s. for some rubbish purchased through an advertisement, but had offered half that amount in settlement. On receiving a further application for an immediate remittance "to save proceedings," he repeated his offer of 7s., and called Gasson's attention to the current issue of TRUTH. To this Gasson replies that he will accept the 7s. in settlement, but as regards TRUTH it would be well that I should note that "we have given you eight months' credit for 14s." The knowledge does not impress me much, now that I have it. On the contrary, all that it shows is that for eight months Gasson has been endeavouring—even to the extent of threatening legal proceedings—to obtain 14s. where he now accepts 7s. as an adequate payment.

Should this meet the eye of any one who has recently heard from the individual formerly known as G. R. Hatton, and more recently as Guy Rosslyn, I should be glad to be favoured with the man's address. As mentioned in TRUTH a few weeks ago, he has lately disappeared from his secluded retreat at Canvey Island, on the Essex coast, and I have no doubt that his removal was due to his having swindled so many people out of payments for "biographies," which he has no means, and probably no intention, of publishing, that his position was becoming a little dangerous. He will probably, however, be at the same game before long under a new name, for he has had no other visible means of subsistence of late, and I should be glad to trace him, because one or two cases of which I have particulars seem to offer a good opportunity of putting him out of the way of doing further mischief for some time to come.

I have often laughed at the victims of Hatton, or whatever his name is, as silly gulls who deserve to suffer for the childish vanity that leads them to pay money for the pleasure of seeing notices of themselves in publications only printed for private circulation. But I have somewhat modified my views after what I have heard from one of the latest of Hatton's victims, and after seeing a copy of one of the few of his publications that have made their appearance in recent years. The victim in question is a professional musician, and he observes that Hatton laid himself out specially to catch artists, musicians, actors, etc., to whom a personal advertisement is of business value. This is borne out by a copy of a publication which Hatton, under the name of Guy Rosslyn, brought out in June, 1905. There are some eighty "biographies" in it, mostly of people whose names can hardly be known outside their family circles, and among them a good many "professionals," including a pitiful array of young girls starting in the musical profession. It is, of course, very natural that such people should be willing to pay a few shillings for a notice in print, and buy copies for distribution, and they deserve nothing but sympathy when a rascal gets their money out of them and produces nothing in return.

In regard to one of the questions that have been raised by the Tooting Slate Club affair, I have had an interesting letter from Mr. Frank G. Harris, honorary secretary of the National Federation of Dividing Friendly Societies, who points out the great need on the part of large classes of the community of banking facilities late in the evening. The matter seems worth the attention of the joint stock banks. Mr. Harris observes that large numbers of tradesmen and other business people frequently have large sums of money on hand which they would like to bank after the usual bank closing hours, but he is more particularly concerned about the friendly and building societies, which collect in the aggregate tens of thousands of pounds in the evening, and are consequently compelled to leave large sums in the keeping of collectors or treasurers until the following day. "I was talking the other day," says Mr. Harris, "to a trustee of a building society, who frequently has to take charge in the evening of sums of money running into hundreds of pounds, and he assured me that on the nights when he has this money the knowledge that many other people know the cash to be in his charge makes it impossible for him to sleep for fear of what might happen."

There cannot be much doubt that there is a real need of increased banking facilities in these directions. In country towns on market days the banks generally keep open until six o'clock, but the ordinary tradesman can bank little of his cash before the bank closing hour of 4 p.m. In these days of competition, in banking as well as in other businesses, I wonder that no bank has ever tried the experiment of keeping its doors open until the rest of the world has finished its day's business—so far as it ever does finish it. If I were starting a bank I think I should ask myself the question whether the convenience of trade customers would not be better suited by my keeping open till six o'clock in the evening than by my opening at nine o'clock in the morning. The chief reason why I feel reluctance in raising this question is that bank clerks are among the worst paid classes of the community, and no one would wish to see them working another hour or two per diem unless their pay were proportionately increased. But remembering the general scale of banking profits, it can hardly be said that banks generally could not afford to work longer hours.

At the same time it is out of the question that banks generally should keep their doors open late enough to suit the convenience of the officials of friendly and building societies, who collect large sums of money after ordinary working hours. In the letter above referred to Mr. Harris recognises this difficulty, and asks whether the Government could not make arrangements for entrusting money under such circumstances to the custody of the police during the night. This is rather a novel idea, but I do not know that there is anything impracticable in it, and probably many persons, like the one above mentioned, who are kept awake at night by the knowledge of the large sums of money in their possession, would cheerfully make a small payment for the purpose of having the money lodged at the police station until it can be banked. The only other alternative is that the Post Office should offer facilities for this purpose, and I really think it is worth consideration whether arrangements could not be made, at any rate in large towns, to keep a certain number of Post Office Savings Banks open until a later hour than even 8 p.m.

It was often said in Truth when the fiscal question was with us—and, indeed, long before—that the growth or diminution of foreign trade is not necessarily a conclusive test of the general trade prosperity of the country or the reverse. It is amusing to see this opinion making headway among the exponents of tariff reform after two years of unexampled growth in our foreign trade have knocked all the wind out of Mr. Chamberlain's arguments. 1905 was a record year in the Board of Trade returns, and particularly in regard to the export trade. 1906 makes a fresh record. The total volume of foreign trade has reached the amazing sum of 1,069 millions. Only two years ago we were congratulating ourselves on having for the first time exported British goods to the value of over 300 millions in the course of a year. Now the total has jumped up to 376 millions, not counting goods imported and re-exported to the value of 85 millions more. In all branches of our export trade there was an increase last year of over 50 millions upon the record figures of 1905.

What do the Protectionists say to this? One or two admit frankly enough that the Chamberlain cry about "dying industries" was absolutely unfounded, and a few of the more cautious spirits suggest that it may even be desirable to drop the tariff reform agitation until the ebbing of the wave of prosperity once again furnishes "facts" which have for the present proved to be fictions. For the rest, all they can say is that the value of trade is to be judged by its profits, not by its volume; that, owing to increased prices, the actual growth of our trade is exaggerated in the money valuation of it; that, after all, our sales and purchases abroad are no conclusive proof that our industries are in a flourishing condition; and that we really only participate in a general revival of trade throughout the world, which extends to all countries doing business with one another regardless of local tariff arrangements. All this is perfectly true, and no free trader would trouble to deny it. But it is a pity that the other side did not think of it before, and it would be well that they should remember it when the Board of Trade figures for a year or two appear to favour their views. The arguments cut both ways; and may be as applicable to times of depression as to times of inflation.

Possibly I shall be considered in some quarters a heretic if I confess that I am disposed to agree with the tariff reformer when he tells us that we are participating in a general revival of industry and commerce throughout the world, which local tariff conditions do not very materially affect. In other words, I suspect that as between nations the desire to exchange goods in one another's markets is too powerful to be controlled to any great extent by artificial restrictions. This was the view of Sir Robert Peel and the Manchester school of his day. As Sir Robert Peel put it, the best way to fight foreign tariffs is to open your own market. If foreigners come to you and sell their goods, they must accept your goods in exchange, regardless of any tariff that their Governments may impose for the purpose of preventing them doing so. If their tariffs are high enough to prevent them taking your goods, then they cannot sell their own goods to you. As long as they sell to you they must buy of you. We thus find that as soon as the nations which have fortified themselves with "tariff walls" produce any considerable quantity of goods for export, the tide of trade flows to and fro over the wall just as if it never existed. There are, of course, many incidental arguments in favour of protection which this view of the matter does not touch; but it seems to contain the common sense of the fiscal question, and if it does, the efficiency of tariffs, both for good and evil, is very much over-estimated both by protectionists and free traders. They are simply rather futile contrivances for interfering with the course of nature—very much of the same class as Mrs. Partington's broom.

Whether in time of inflation or depression, you must look elsewhere than to statistics of foreign trade for proof that you are prosperous or the reverse. One side of this argument was accentuated by free traders at the time when we were in the dumps about our foreign trade. Another side of it may be seen to-day in countries which are enjoying, like ourselves, the wave of prosperity. I read the other day in the Daily Mail—an unimpeachable source—that "according to the statistics published by Bradstreet's, the price of food, clothing, and building material in New York has risen 20 per cent. in the past year." Skilled labourers were earning from £8 to £12 per week, but the generous rise in wages was "inadequate to compensate for the unprecedented growth in the cost of living." "Everywhere," said the Daily Mail correspondent, "complaints are heard of the pinch of prosperity."

Just after this I found in another unimpeachable source, the Pall Mall Gazette, a similar tale from highly protected Austria. "It is hard to mention," said the Vienna correspondent of that paper, "any article of food, dress, or household necessity, which has not gone up in price during the past year." He went on to specify meat, which "has almost disappeared from the tables of the working classes," potatoes which have doubled in price, butter which is "continually going up," boots, shoes, and even "cheap German sausages," which have "become dear." In Germany itself we know that the food question has become acute, and that it may possibly play a bigger part than any other in the pending elections. Such is the condition of things in the principal protected countries of whose prosperity, according to the tariff reformers, our own increased trade is only an accidental accompaniment. The best justification of our own tariff-less condition seems to be that we feel less than our neighbours both the pinch of adversity and this new and remarkable phenomenon, "the pinch of prosperity."

It is something that we are beginning to discuss the question how to deal with the House of Lords, but the discussion seems in danger of becoming a little wild. Mr. Stead's scheme, under which the Crown, fortified by a general election, is to begin by withdrawing writs from "negligent and absentee peers," while the remainder are to be reduced to impotence by a creation of life peers, even verges on the absurd. Neither is Mr. Hobson's proposal, in the Independent Review, that Bills rejected or mutilated by the Lords should be submitted to a popular referendum, and on ratification thereby should receive the Royal assent, likely to find favour with the majority of Liberals. The Peers could have their referendum as often as they pleased, without any fear of the consequences, and under this arrangement might be more disposed to obstruct and mutilate Liberal legislation than they are at present—not effectually, perhaps, but still at a cost of endless expense, trouble, and delay.

The first thing to be done, in my opinion, is to get rid of the Lords' veto. For this purpose I would proceed by Bill, on which, when the Lords rejected it, the Government should appeal to the country. The details of the Bill I do not stop now to discuss, but I think the principle of it should be that any measure rejected by the Lords and passed a second time in the following session by the Commons should receive the Royal assent irrespective of the Lords. If the opinion of the country were frankly and squarely taken on such a Bill as this, and a decisive Government majority obtained on the issue at a general election, I doubt if the Lords would fight it further. But if they did there is the remedy of a creation of peers, and when the Sovereign had assented to this course, the Peers would, of course, give in, as they did in 1832. They would have no object in forcing the contest to the last extremity in such circumstances.

In this way the whole difficulty would be solved. The Lords would be disarmed once and for all, so long as a Bill can be passed through the Commons in two successive sessions. The ground would thus be cleared for the reform of the House of Lords itself. A Bill for this purpose would in due course be presented to the House of Commons, and on being passed, if necessary twice, by that assembly, would become law without regard to any objections of the Peers to it. Without being enthusiastic about second chambers, I recognise that they have advantages, especially in remedying oversights in drafting and legal and technical matters such as a popular assembly is apt to fall into. Moreover, I imagine that there is a preponderance of opinion in this country in favour of a revising chamber.

The constitution of the chamber is a matter requiring a good deal of consideration, and might possibly be considered by a Royal Commission. The great point to be aimed at is that the assembly should be independent of party politics, and have no interest in the coming in or going out of any Government. It should consist, therefore, of experienced men in all departments of public affairs, including a reasonable proportion of men who have been elected a certain number of times to the House of Commons, but should contain no one holding any paid post under the Crown. In short, it should be a "senate" in the best sense of the term, capable of giving real practical assistance in the business of legislation, without regard to party considerations, and without any temptation to exercise its suspensory veto capriciously or from indirect motives. But for the present this is an academic question, and should be treated as such until the preliminary question whether the Lords' veto is to continue to exist in its present shape has been decided by the country.

THE SAGACIOUS CARRION CROW.

Out in the far-off Hebrides,
Those Islands of the Western Seas,
There throve and bred, in wondrous Way,
Innumerable Birds of Prey:
Eagles, both "Sea" and "Golden" Sort,
And Ospreys feathery Plumes who sport,
Falcons and Ravens, Carrion Crows,
And what besides—well, Goodness knows.
These all, as just above, I've said,
In wondrous Manner throve and bred;
For there they found a constant Store
Of Sea-gulls' Eggs and Young galore,
Whereon, with little Toil of Pain,
A fat Existence they sustain.
Now, bred these Birds of Prey so fast,
A horrid Panic rose at last,
Lest, at this Rate, it soon be found
Their Food-supply would not go round.
So met the predatory Race,
And, anxious all, discussed the Case.
Then one said this, and one said that,
As they in solemn Conclave sat,
Till from his Perch at length arose
The eldest of the Carrion Crows:
"Unfounded, Friends, is this Disquiet,"
He cawed, "in re our future Diet.
For, breed as fast as e'er we will,
The Sea-gulls breed yet faster still."

Moral.

Sharpers may view, with placid Face,
The constant Increase of their Race;
Nor need they fear, whate'er befall,
There won't be still full Scope for all;
Since, though they multiply like Rats,
Still faster multiply the Flats.

SCRUTATOR.

PEACE AND PIOUS OPINIONS.

"PERHAPS," said Mr. Haldane, at the beginning of his weighty address to the students of Edinburgh, "perhaps the time is near when armaments will count for so much less than is the case to-day, that they will tend to diminish, and ultimately to become extinct." For months previously the speaker has talked of little but the improvement of our own armaments, so far as his own department of State is concerned. Having expressed the foregoing pious aspiration, he went on to discourse lengthily and learnedly on the armaments of the Germans and the Japanese, and to hold them up to admiration as triumphs of organising skill and individual devotion to practical ideas. Two days later he was able to announce a big scheme for the reorganisation of our military forces for war. All this somewhat discounts the reality of the vision which Mr. Haldane sees behind his "perhaps." In fact, what could be less convincing than a prediction of universal peace from a particularly active and wide-awake Secretary of State for War? It is much as if a physician should preface a lecture by suggesting that perhaps the time is coming when disease will be extinct and doctors be no more needed; or as if a judge should open the assizes by contemplating the time when theft and violence will disappear and criminal courts cease to sit. It brings out the contrast between pious opinions and ugly facts, and suggests that we have a long way to travel before disarmament will pass from the ideal to the practical stage.

The Hague Conference, which is before long to meet, may do some good to the cause of peace, and can do no harm. I doubt, however, whether it is possible for nations, under existing circumstances, to come to any agreement in regard to a general reduction of armaments, still less do I believe, as some enthusiasts have suggested, that any nation that goes to war with another instead of referring the issue in conflict to some third Power, or to all neutral Powers, will ever be put under a general ban, so that all neutrals will refuse to aid or countenance it commercially or financially. Let us take the case of reduction of armaments first. On what possible principle is this reduction to be based? Is it to be population, or wealth, or what? If population, Germany would be entitled to a larger army than France; if wealth, France might possibly be entitled to a larger army than Germany. But Germany has many frontiers open to invasion, whilst France has only two—that marching with Germany and that with Italy. Germany might plead that she might possibly have to defend her territories at the same moment against Russia, Austria, and France—all great Powers with formidable armies—to say nothing of a British attack through Denmark or the Netherlands. At present there is an alliance between France and Russia, and this has been met by a Triple Alliance between Germany, Italy, and Austria. The terms of both alliances are, however, somewhat vague, and it is quite conceivable that circumstances might arise in which France or Germany might find its ally either remaining neutral, or even joining the enemy. We have an entente cordiale with France. Only the other day we agreed to let France assume what is practically a protectorate over Morocco. The Sultan of the latter country was to become a mere dummy, and to all intents and purposes was to be replaced in all relations with foreign countries by France. With some point, as I thought, the German Emperor gave out that he had recognised Morocco as an independent Power with which Germany had relations, and that such a fundamental alteration in its international position could only be brought about by an international agreement. We, however, vowed that if it came to a fight we should join our forces with those of France, in order to prove the union of hearts between that country and us. Supposing that such a war had broken out, Germany would have had to defend itself against us and France, and it is to say the least doubtful whether she would have received any assistance from Austria or Italy, whilst it is well within the bounds of possibility that Russia might have sought to direct attention from its home troubles by declaring war against her. Considerations of this kind show the impossibility of arriving at any standard to which nations differently situated can agree to reduce their armaments.

A reduction of all navies is a still more difficult question. At present, when all nations have realised that industry supplies the real strength of a nation, and all are seeking an outlet for their manufactured goods, we claim that we ought to have a navy, which places the command of the high seas in our hands. We justify this on the ground that we are entitled to make ourselves secure against invasion, not only from any one foreign country, but from any two; that we have a larger commerce than any other nation; and that our territories are spread over the whole globe. But in the event of a war, this vast naval strength would enable us to sweep the flag of any enemy off the ocean, to blockade his ports, and to wage an offensive war without any risk to ourselves. Is it likely that foreign nations will agree to any general arrangement that would perpetuate this state of things for all time by international law? If we were to say, "We have a small army, we are an island, and we need a strong navy to hinder an invasion of our shores," this might be accepted. But even then, I doubt whether any foreign Power with a great over-sea commerce would agree ever to remain, so far as naval armaments are concerned, in a position of inferiority to us.

Europe is ruining itself by the immense armaments that it maintains. This is greatly to be regretted, but any plan of deciding what each Power is to spend on its armaments seems to me to be a counsel of perfection. Each Power will consider what armaments it needs for its protection, and will never consent to make this dependent upon an international arrangement. It would never be really kept. When Napoleon had overrun Prussia and forced her to become his ally, one of the stipulations was that she should only have an army of 42,000 men. But after his Russian campaign he found that she had evaded this stipulation by a system of short service, and when she became his enemy, he found that she really had a fairly drilled army of above 150,000 men.

The idea of obliging each country to refer to arbitration any dispute with another, and to put any country declining to do this under an international ban is even more difficult of realisation. In such cases each Power will look after its own interests, and will act upon its own view of them. The international ban would practically convert a local into a general war. Supposing that France and Germany were to fall out, and that France agreed to arbitration and Germany did not, and that the alliance between France and Germany had lapsed, does anyone suppose that Russia would refuse to sell its goods to Germany, and thus almost ruin itself in order to maintain a general principle? The first step to the acceptance of such a general principle would be to forbid all separate alliances involving the rendering of mutual aid by the allies in case of war. I never have thought that such alliances make for peace. But this certainly does not appear to be our opinion just now.

If an independent tribunal could be brought into existence to which all international disputes should be referred, it would sometimes have a useful effect. But the independence of the tribunal could only be secured, if at all, by limiting it to representatives of the smaller Powers exclusively, and by these representatives being lawyers or practical men outside politics rather than politicians. We profess to be heart and soul for arbitration. But I have always observed when the matter has been discussed that we assert that where the honour and fundamental interests of the Empire are concerned, we will never consent to arbitration. Other countries probably entertain the same view. But to what does this really amount? That we are to be the judges of what concerns our honour and our interests, and so long as this attitude is that of the Great Powers generally, it is idle to talk of a Court of Arbitration that will prevent wars.

No one can be more strongly opposed to wars than I am, no one more strongly opposed to an expenditure that converts nations into armed camps. I do not even favour the development of a martial spirit by drilling children and waving Union Jacks in schools. Our Jingoes seem to regard us as a herd of cowards, ready to accept defeat rather than fight. I have a better opinion of our citizens. I place my reliance for the maintenance of peace upon public opinion in all countries regarding war as the greatest of curses, and a peaceful spirit replacing the blood and thunder spirit which is deemed patriotic. Almost all wars have been due to statesmen. They have got their respective countries into some silly dispute which might easily be settled by the exercise of common sense. But a bellicose spirit has been aroused on both sides, and for the nonce all peaceful suggestions have been thrust aside. After thousands have been killed and millions have been spent, the war becomes unpopular, and people begin to perceive that lives and money have been recklessly wasted. This was the history of the Boer war. And we are now spending far more money on armaments than is necessary to secure us against dangers which do not exist, except in the minds of martial alarmists. The great sufferers from war are the working classes. This they are beginning to realise. In all countries they are the strongest opponents, not only of war, but of the maintenance of ruinous armaments in peace times. It is on them that I place my reliance. If the Hague Conference can do anything to prevent statesmen from dragging or fooling peaceful men into war I shall rejoice. But we must not exaggerate what the decisions of a conference can do, or imagine that any impossible and unpractical decision in regard to some new international law will help us to maintain peace. I believe that the most effectual preservative of peace would be, in the event of a war breaking out, to hang all the Ministers of the two belligerents. But I do not suggest this, simply because it is a counsel of perfection that never would be acted on.

"SHERLOCK HOLMES" ON EDALJI.

The review of the Edalji case by Sir Conan Doyle in the Daily Telegraph is very convincing, and may perhaps prove useful in furthering the ends of justice. But I cannot refrain from remarking that it contains scarcely a fact or an argument that was not put forward in TRUTH when I took the case up two years ago, and that if the Daily Telegraph had only looked into the matter at that time, and thrown its important weight into the scale, it is quite possible that the unfortunate prisoner would not have spent another twenty months in penal servitude. As it is, Mr. Edalji has been a free man since last October, solely owing to the exertions of TRUTH, and whatever may be done for him now can only be in the nature of reparation to him, possibly supplemented by measures for protecting other people against such misfortunes.

In this connection I may mention that there is one false point in Sir Conan Doyle's articles, which other writers have taken up. "At the end of his third year out of seven," says Sir Conan Doyle, "the young man, though in good health, was suddenly released without a pardon. Evidently the authorities were shaken, and compromised with their consciences in this fashion." This is described as "irregular and illogical." The point does not touch the real merits of the case; but it is a pity to give "the authorities" an opportunity of justifying themselves even on a side issue. The prisoner was by no means "suddenly released," and there was no secret about the reason for the release, which was quite intelligible. After the principal facts had been brought out in TRUTH in a series of articles, I made an application to the Home Secretary for permission to inspect the anonymous letters put in by the prosecution at the trial. The application was refused, and subsequently Mr. Akers Douglas explained privately to Mr. Labouchere in the House of Commons that official traditions precluded him from recognising officially any locus standi on the part of a journalist to intervene in a matter relating to the business of the Department; but he added that if Mr. Labouchere as an M.P. chose to lay a statement before him regarding the case of a prisoner he had a right to do so, and it would receive full consideration.

Either then or subsequently the Home Secretary explained that such a statement could only be considered so far as it related to new matter which had come to light since the previous petition to the Home Office—a point which is worth noting, because it shows that the Home Office declined to reconsider, even on the representations of a Member of Parliament, the facts on which it had previously made up its mind, except as far as new light might be thrown on them by fresh facts. In consequence of this negotiation a statement was prepared and transmitted by Mr. Labouchere to the Home Secretary. Owing to the limitation imposed, it was necessarily not in the nature of a presentation of the whole case, though a good deal of additional evidence bearing on the conviction had come to light since the first petition to the Home Office, including the conviction of the man Farrington for sheep maiming at Great Wyrley in March, 1904, and the disclosure of the anonymous letter-writing at Great Wyrley vicarage in 1888. Advantage was also taken of the fact that Farrington had only been sentenced to three years' penal servitude, as against the seven years imposed on Mr. Edalji for an offence of precisely the same character, to impress again upon the Home Secretary the monstrous severity of the sentence in the Edalji case, even if he really had been guilty of the crime of stabbing a pony. The result was that Mr. Akers-Douglas eventually informed Mr. Labouchere that his official advisers were unable to alter their previous decision upon the justice of the prisoner's conviction, but that he himself was strongly impressed with the argument as to the undue severity of the sentence, and he had therefore decided to order Mr. Edalji's release at the end of three years—the term imposed in Farrington's case. This was in August, 1905. The decision of the Home Secretary was subsequently announced in the press, and Mr. Edalji was duly released in accordance with it in October, 1906. It cannot be said, therefore, as Sir Conan Doyle will recognise, that he was released suddenly, or that his release indicated any attempt on the part of the Home Office to "compromise with their consciences." The attitude of the Home Office has been unyielding from first to last. All that was done was to release the prisoner at the end of three instead of seven years, on the ground that the sentence was excessive—as it most certainly was.

I recite these facts now, not only because it is important not to introduce any false points into the discussion of the case, but also because they show very plainly how futile is any ventilation of such a case in the press unless accompanied by other action which the Home Secretary is bound to respect. On this I shall have a word more to say presently. But it is worth while to add here that shortly after the change of Government, thinking that the new Home Secretary might be more open to reason than his predecessor, I submitted to him copies of the TRUTH articles, and invited his attention to the case. But all I got was the usual stereotyped answer that "The Home Secretary regrets," etc., etc. I do not say that Mr. Gladstone was personally to blame for this; having only just come into office it is fair to assume that his hands were too full to enable him to go personally into so complicated a case. But it all helps to show that in a case of this nature we have to fight not this or that Minister, but "the Office," with its sacred traditions, its corporate instincts of self-defence, and its immutable "quod scripsi scripsi."

I am glad, however, to have had the judgment which was so long ago pronounced in TRUTH on the Edalji case confirmed by the investigations of Sir Conan Doyle. As that gentleman has observed to an interviewer, there is a considerable difference between fiction and real life. But the inventor of "Sherlock Holmes" is something of an expert in the analysis of evidence, and his arguments and opinions will justly carry weight with a large section of the public which might not trust to its own judgment. Those who read his two articles in the Daily Telegraph—as I would wish every one to do, for every member of the public has an interest of his own in this case—should bear in mind that he started on his investigation without any preconceived opinion, having become interested in the problem it presents almost by accident. Starting in this frame of mind, he is led to the firmest conviction that Mr. Edalji was the victim of a gross miscarriage of justice, and I believe every one who approaches it in the same frame of mind must arrive at the same conclusion. My attention was first directed to the case by a gentleman who had started with something of a prejudice against the prisoner. He was in no way connected with the case or the parties, but he told me that he became interested in it in consequence of the reflections that were cast upon the conduct of the police, and that he proceeded to look into the facts with the view of showing that the police were free from all blame. He went to Great Wyrley for this purpose, and collected his information at first hand from all who had any to offer, including Mr. Edalji's family. He arrived at the conclusion that the prisoner had been grossly wronged, and he sent me the result of his investigations, begging that the case might be taken up in TRUTH. I candidly confess that I was reluctant to do so, for Mr. Edalji had then been in prison for over a year, public interest in the case had evaporated, and it did not tempt me from the journalistic point of view. But I looked into the statement that I had thus received, having then forgotten the little I ever knew about the facts, I made some further inquiries on my own account, and I arrived at the same conclusion as the other gentleman before me, and as Sir Conan Doyle after us. The TRUTH articles were the result, and as this fresh publicity led by degrees to the disclosure of fresh information, the case for the prisoner became stronger and stronger. The case was unfolded in TRUTH gradually. Sir Conan Doyle has the advantage of presenting it in one connected whole, with each point in its proper logical place. The effect is thereby concentrated and strengthened, and I do not understand the mental condition of anybody who does not find it irresistible.

In one instance Sir Conan Doyle has imported a new element into the case, namely, the question of Mr. Edalji's eyesight. This point was brought under my notice, but for two reasons I disregarded it. The point not having been raised at the trial, and Mr. Edalji being in prison, there was no direct evidence available as to the real condition of his eyes; and if there had been, I am disposed to distrust all professional evidence, which can generally be answered by more or less plausible evidence of equal authority but to the opposite effect. As soon as Mr. Edalji came out of prison, I advised him to have his eyesight examined by a specialist, and he went to two, one in his own name, and one as an anonymous patient. The results were striking, but it is not necessary to go into them now in view of what Sir Conan Doyle has said. He is of opinion that this evidence alone is sufficient to prove that it would have been a physical impossibility for the prisoner to have made the midnight excursion which he was alleged to have performed for the perpetration of his crime. As a medical man himself, Sir Conan Doyle's opinion on the point must have great weight; but the pitfalls besetting all scientific evidence are already shown by the fact that another "expert" has come forward to correct or dispute some of his conclusions. It is really unnecessary to go into this matter. The central point in the case is that the evidence actually given against Mr. Edalji at his trial was inadequate, open to suspicion wherever it looked strongest, and utterly inconclusive in the face of the inherent improbabilities of the case for the prosecution, and the impregnable alibi established for the defence. A conviction upon such evidence would have been impossible before a judge of the High Court, and it is a disgrace to our judicial system that a conviction so arrived at should be allowed to stand.

Sir Conan Doyle urges that there ought to be an inquiry into this case on similar lines to those followed in the case of Mr. Beck. This is what I myself have repeatedly pressed for. Apart altogether from the question of justice to Mr. Edalji, there are features in the case which call for exhaustive investigation in the interest of the public. The whole conduct of the police is open to unfavourable reflection, from the first evidence of an inexplicable animus against the prisoner on the part of the Chief Constable nine years before the charge, down to the last evidence of the same thing in a letter written by the Chief Constable to the prisoner's counsel after his conviction. The bearing of this on the preparation of the case and the conduct of the prosecution at the trial—the arrest of the man without a particle of evidence beyond the accusations in anonymous letters, the subsequent compilation by policemen of evidence open to question at every step, the attempts to conceal material evidence at the trial—all these matters require to be cleared up, if any man within the jurisdiction of the Staffordshire police force is to be safe in future. The treatment of the appeal by the Home Office, the reference back to the police authorities, whose conduct the appeal impugned, and the determination of the appeal on the strength of some secret official dossier, concealed from the accused avowedly in accordance with "the practice of this Department," are matters of vital importance to every one of us, about which we are all entitled to know the full truth. The trial of the case before a lay magistrate, without even the assistance of the clerk of the peace, the course of procedure at the trial, and the general question of the propriety of trying such a difficult and perplexing case at Quarter Sessions, are also points calling urgently for consideration by some authority whose findings and recommendations will command respect. The only way of obtaining an investigation and report covering all this ground is that adopted in the Beck case. This, therefore, is the end for which those who feel strongly the scandals exposed in Sir Conan Doyle's articles should work. But it is no use to suppose that the walls of Jericho will fall down before a few blasts on the journalistic trumpet. The position is not the same as in the Beck case, where the iniquity of the proceedings burst on the public in a moment, and led to an agitation which the Home Secretary thought it prudent to bow to. In this case the Home Office has been resisting outside influences successfully for over three years. It has gradually got into a position from which it cannot retire voluntarily, and moreover, its experience in the Beck case was not of such a nature that it is likely to incur a repetition thereof if it can be avoided. Ministers being bound to their staffs by a sort of esprit de corps, and Mr. Gladstone having already repeated the non possumus of his predecessors, it may be taken as certain that he will do nothing whatever in the Edalji case except under force majeure applied in the House of Commons. I do not say all this by way of discouraging Sir Conan Doyle, the Editor of the Daily Telegraph, or anybody else who desires to take up the cudgels on behalf of Mr. Edalji and of the public at large. All I desire is that the situation should be properly appreciated by them, and efforts applied in the right direction if at all. By all means let public opinion express itself; but nothing will come of it until it is voiced by some one in Parliament, who will get the case up properly, and find an opportunity of enlightening the House adequately about it. Then the thing will be very quickly done.

A CAPE TOWN COURT-MARTIAL.

A court-martial was held last summer at Cape Town upon a sergeant of the Army Service Corps with what seems to me, after carefully studying all the proceedings, to have been a most unsatisfactory and indefensible result. The case was the subject of a question asked by Lord Turnour in Parliament a few weeks back, and the reply of Mr. Haldane was virtually that the Judge-Advocate-General had carefully reviewed the proceedings and approved the result, and that he (Mr. Haldane) saw no reason for interfering with the sentence. With all respect to the Judge-Advocate-General, I cannot understand his view.

The prisoner, Sergeant Pitt, had been caterer of the garrison sergeants' mess at Cape Town, and he was charged, first, with embezzling the sum of £33 13s. 2½d. belonging to the mess, and secondly, with negligence in supervising the business of the mess, whereby a loss of the above sum was occasioned. He pleaded not guilty to both charges. He was acquitted of embezzlement, but found guilty of negligence, and was sentenced to be reduced to the ranks, and to be put under stoppages until the said amount of £33 odd was repaid. As regards the alleged embezzlement, there does not seem to have been a particle of evidence worthy of the name, and it is astonishing that the charge should ever have been preferred. All that could be shown at the court-martial was that according to the amount of stock (principally beer) on hand at the stocktakings at the end of March and at the end of April, the caterer should have paid in during April £155 5s. 7½d., whereas he actually paid in £121 12s. 5d. The Court was invited to infer that the prisoner had embezzled cash to the value of the difference between these two figures. It very properly declined to do so. Not only was there nothing but vague and inconclusive evidence to connect the prisoner with the alleged deficiency of cash, but there was no definite proof that the alleged deficiency had arisen during the period alleged if at all. That being so, it is difficult to understand how the Court arrived at the conclusion that the prisoner had been guilty of negligence which caused the unproved loss. The evidence, as recorded in the minutes, is extremely vague, and the only thing clearly shown is that the mess had been managed very loosely and irregularly all round. The valuation of the stock on April 1 at £155 5s. 7½d. was based on the calculation that the prisoner had 305 gallons of beer in stock on that date, which would be over eleven barrels. But the evidence for the prosecution showed that the cellar would not hold more than eight barrels—the prisoner maintained that its capacity was less than eight. The figure 305 must therefore have been wrong. It further appeared that as the accounts were first made up at the stocktaking only 197 gallons were in stock at the end of March. The figures were so entered in the prisoner's writing, but had been subsequently altered in pencil. The N.C.O. who was president of the mess up to March 31 stated that he made this alteration in pencil, having found out on April 4 that 108 gallons of beer had been received during March, and not entered in the accounts. He stated that he had a conversation with the prisoner on this point when going through the stock book for March, and altered the figures in consequence of this conversation. The prisoner absolutely denied such a conversation, and maintained that the original figure 197 which he had entered was the correct figure, which is borne out by the fact that the cellar would not hold 305 gallons. Thus the fact which was the foundation of the whole case against the prisoner, namely, the amount of beer in stock on March 31, was in dispute, and the books showed that the original figures arrived at had been subsequently altered against the prisoner's entry, which is enough to discredit the whole case for the prosecution.

Other features in the case were these: Pitt, the prisoner, was a clerk in the office of the Staff Captain, Naval Base. During his absence the mess waiter had the handling of the cash. It was never proved what the prisoner's hours of duty were at the Staff Office. The Staff Captain, who was called for the prosecution, merely said that his duties would not take him more than about four hours a day. The prisoner states in his letter to Lord Turnour that he was on duty at the Staff Office daily from 9 a.m. till 6 p.m., and that he made this statement at the court-martial, but that it has not been recorded. Obviously this point ought to have been cleared up in the evidence; but whether it was settled or not, it is obvious that the man could not justly be held answerable for what happened to the cash during the time that he was absent from the mess on duty. It also appeared at the trial that certain pages of the stock book for the month of March had been gummed together, and could not be examined. The mess president who came into office on April 1 stated that he first noticed the gumming of the pages about May 9. The prisoner had been relieved of his duties on April 30, and in view of the fact that the new president had gone into the question of the March stock with him a month previously, it is incredible that the gumming together of the pages would not have been noticed before May 9 if it had been done during the prisoner's time. It is these incidents which make the Judge-Advocate-General's decision incomprehensible to my humble mind.

While there was no definite irregularity proved against the prisoner, beyond the fact that he had not been in the mess when his duty required him to be somewhere else, there were plenty of other irregularities proved against other people in the management of the concern. The Staff Captain, who helped to make out the case against the prisoner, admitted that it was the custom to pay all the mess money directly over to him, although he was not the treasurer, and other treasurers had been duly appointed. The rules for the management of such messes require that the money shall be handed to the treasurer. Again, Para. 994 of the King's Regulations expressly lays down that the mess caterer shall be "exempt from other duties." This regulation was obviously violated in this mess, and that fact should be noted in estimating the evidence of the Staff Captain that the man's office duties only occupied him for four hours a day, for the officer would naturally be disposed to minimise a breach of regulations. The prisoner's predecessor as caterer stated in his evidence for the prosecution that "the King's Regulations as regards the treasurer taking stock once a week were not carried out during my tour of caterer," and evidently they were equally ignored during the prisoner's time. We have thus a mess managed in defiance of the regulations, and irregularities resulting which are directly traceable to this breach of the regulations—particularly to the fact that the prisoner was not exempt from military duty. In the face of this it seems a most iniquitous thing that the man should have been convicted of causing a loss to the mess by his negligence, while that of the officers who were responsible for the regulations not being observed was not taken into account at all; and the injustice is aggravated by the fact that on the evidence there is no clear proof that the mess had incurred the specified loss at all, at any rate during the prisoner's time. I should have thought that on all these facts being brought to the notice of the Judge-Advocate-General, the sentence would have been annulled, if the whole of the proceedings had not been quashed; and, seeing that the unfortunate prisoner—a man with a wife and family—has not only been required to refund the £33 which was supposed to be in question, but loses heavily in pay by his loss of rank, as well as all his future prospect of pension, it seems to me that the case ought to have received further attention at the War Office when Lord Turnour asked his question of the Secretary of State. I suggest that such attention should yet be given to it.

A MOTORING TALE OF WOE.

One might say tale of "whoa"—but this would be flippant. Enough that "woe" and "whoa" were both ingredients of this melancholy story, which tells of the hiring by an Englishman of a motor-car in Italy, with results anything but satisfactory. I give it, not only for the benefit of those more immediately concerned, but also as a warning to others who might elsewise be similarly victimised.

In April last, then, Mr. Alfred Farquhar, a member of the well-known banking firm, was travelling in Northern Italy with another Englishman, and being minded to take a short tour by motor-car, entered into an arrangement with one Strina, carrying on business at Milan under the name of the British Motor-car Company, to supply him with a vehicle suitable for the purpose. The price agreed for a tour of 1,000 kilomètres was £83 14s. a charge which, being at the rate of about £6 a day, was certainly a sufficiently high one (about £5 a day would be fully sufficient for a car of the first class); and, to make matters worse, Mr. Farquhar consented to pay the whole amount in advance. One can well believe that the latter arrangement was not one which commended itself to Mr. Farquhar, but Mr. Strina, who knew what he was about, held out, and Mr. Farquhar gave way. Events speedily showed the unwisdom of the proceeding. An affidavit made on the subject of their experiences by Mr. Farquhar and his friend lies before me. It is a painful record. Almost from the first the car, which was driven, of course, by a chauffeur supplied by Mr. Strina, revealed the perversity of its nature by coming to a halt and refusing to proceed on every possible occasion. Mr. Farquhar and his friend seem to have exercised extraordinary patience, but all to no avail. Breakdowns were of practically daily occurrence.

Lucca to Florence was one of the proposed stages. The car reached Pescia, and then came to grief. Mr. Farquhar and his friend continued their journey by rail to Florence, and there had to remain four days while the chauffeur at Pescia got the car going again. Between Bologna and Verona the same thing occurred. To quote from the affidavit:—

> April 19.—Started for Verona. Car broke down again about three kilos from Bologna. Returned to Bologna Railway Station on one cylinder, and, having engaged rooms at a Verona hotel, proceeded there by rail, thereby missing Modena and Mantua, which we had intended visiting en route.

Between Bruscia and Como it happened again, Mr. Farquhar and his companion being compelled to complete this stage on foot. A fly was sent back from Como to bring on the luggage, but returned with the report that the car was nowhere to be found. Eventually it was run to earth in a shed in a neighbouring village in charge of the unlucky chauffeur, who intimated that he could do nothing more. Under the circumstances there was, of course, nothing for it but to recognise the inevitable, and abandon the tour. In the meantime, it may be stated, the sum of 150 fr. over and above that originally paid had been advanced to the chauffeur in respect of the various repairs which had been effected on the road. As to the annoyance and inconvenience experienced by Mr. Farquhar and his friend, it is unnecessary to say anything.

Unfortunately, worse was to follow. Not content with palming off upon his clients an absolutely worthless car at a rate which would have been excessive in the case of the finest procurable, Mr. Strina seems to have added insult to injury by preferring an additional charge in respect of the whole transaction, while resisting, of course, Mr. Farquhar's claim for reparation in respect of his own breach of contract. The car having managed to reach its destination on six days in all, Mr. Farquhar suggested that Mr. Strina should retain six days' hire, or £36, and refund the balance. Finally it was agreed to settle the dispute by arbitration, a gentleman named Fabbro being nominated by the Automobile Club of Milan to act as arbitrator. Previously, Mr. Farquhar had had communication with the British Consul at Milan, and at the same time had learned from other sources that the so-called British Motor-car Company was merely an alias for the resourceful Strina, who, in his turn, was a man of straw. Under the circumstances, he would have saved himself much trouble if he had therewith dropped the matter altogether, rather than throw good money after bad in a vain attempt to recover what he had lost. In the public interest, however, he resolved to see the thing through, and with the assistance of a local solicitor prepared his case and submitted it to the so-called arbitrator. The result was, however, to put it mildly, disappointing. The parties to an arbitration are not seldom dissatisfied with the result, but it may be doubted if a more singular award has ever been delivered in any similar case than that which was in due course transmitted to Mr. Farquhar.

Mr. Farquhar himself seems to have been to some extent at fault in not ascertaining a little more clearly beforehand precisely what were the terms of reference upon which the arbitration was to be based. Unfortunately, he took it for granted that these would be satisfactorily determined by the British Consul, and having submitted his own sworn affidavit as to the facts, assumed that Mr. Strina would be required to do the like, and that an impartial award would follow. As it turned out, however, Signor Fabbre took a different view of his functions. Instead of requiring a sworn statement from Mr. Strina, he had that worthy before him, and lent a sympathetic ear to whatever he chose to tell him. Strina's regard for strict veracity may conceivably be such as would have put George Washington himself to shame; but one cannot be too careful in these matters, and one may certainly agree with Mr. Farquhar that, if only as a matter of form, it would have been desirable if he had at least been enabled to learn what were the statements upon which his opponent's case was based. The Italian arbitrator evidently thought otherwise, however, and having had his little friendly chat with Mr. Strina, proceeded on the strength thereof to deliver himself of the aforesaid remarkable judgment, in which, as Mr. Farquhar puts it, he "states that in his opinion the justice of the case is on my side, but the verdict is to be in favour of the other."

Briefly, Signor Fabbre seems to have adopted Mr. Strina's suggestion that the various daily breakdowns and mishaps which Mr. Farquhar experienced were all in the nature of those little hitches and incidents which were to be looked for as a matter of course by any one rash enough to embark upon a motoring tour. As he puts it: "Considering that in carrying out the terms of a lease as regards motor-cars a strict adherence to the same is not possible, owing to circumstances generally beyond the control of the contracting parties, it is clearly evident that everything that was possible has been done on Mr. Strina's part to conform to the terms of the agreement." Yet on the other hand, "It is equally certain that Mr. Farquhar has been put to exceptional expense for railway fares, compulsory sojourn, etc., in consequence of repeated damages sustained by the machine," whereby "the breakdowns and interruptions were so frequent as to render the intended journey incomplete and unsatisfactory." Therefore, is the final conclusion, "I hold it to be fair and proper that liberal treatment should be extended to Mr. Farquhar, all the more so on account of his being a stranger, and that Mr. Strina should content himself with the £83 10s. already received from Mr. Farquhar."

Is it surprising that Mr. Farquhar was not precisely satisfied with this award? He hires a motor-car at a high rate, pays for it in advance, is subjected to the utmost annoyance, mortification, and expense through having been supplied with an absolutely worthless vehicle, and then is calmly told not only that he has no claim for indemnity, but that he must think himself lucky in not having to pay still more to the ingenious foreigner by whom he has been victimised! What additional claims Mr. Strina can have preferred against him Mr. Farquhar is utterly at a loss to conceive, and it is perfectly certain that no such claims could in point of fact possibly be substantiated. Yet the arbitrator's award is that set forth, and Mr. Farquhar having been abominably imposed upon in the first place, is invited to believe that he has really been treated with extraordinary consideration, in virtue of his being a stranger, inasmuch as he has only lost the amount which he originally paid, and no more!

The morals of this melancholy tale are sufficiently obvious. In the first place, it should serve as a caution to those who hire motor-cars, whether at home or abroad, to make sure that they are dealing with reputable firms who may be relied on not to treat them as Mr. Farquhar was treated by Mr. Strina. As Mr. Farquhar himself puts it, the custom prevailing of only letting out motor-cars on payment of the entire hire in advance is obviously a very one-sided one, and one greatly diminishing the chance of obtaining any compensation in the event of a breach of contract. Seeing, however, that these are the only conditions on which motor-cars are usually to be hired, it is obviously of the first importance to have dealings only with firms of the first repute, or in the case of foreign firms, through intermediaries in a position to insist on reparation being made should it so happen that the terms of the agreement are not honestly carried out.

Another conclusion to be drawn from this edifying narrative concerns more particularly the Automobile Club at Milan, which I assume to be an institution of good standing, corresponding to our own similar organisations. This being so, it certainly would seem desirable for such a body to re-consider the qualifications of the gentleman who has been named to conduct on its behalf any subsequent motor arbitration cases. Apart altogether from the question of the justice of his award in this particular case, it is manifest that either his knowledge of motoring matters must be seriously defective, or he must be capable of deliberate statements surprisingly at variance with the truth. Certainly it would be interesting to learn the opinion of Italian motorists in general regarding his assertion that such a series of mishaps and breakdowns as Mr. Farquhar experienced were to be regarded as the natural and inevitable incidents of modern motoring. In point of fact, such an assertion was preposterous, and one of a kind to cast the gravest suspicion upon the good faith of any one professing to know anything about motoring who could be capable of making it. It is to be hoped, therefore, that for its own credit the Milan Automobile Club may deem it advisable to give some attention to the matter.

THE THEATRES.

"Nelly Neil," at the Aldwych.

Mr. Frohman "presented" Miss Edna May last week in this new musical play. He presented also to our eyes a series of captivating costumes, much fine stage scenery, and a great deal of vivacious romping, both with words and legs. For the fact about the libretto of "Nelly Neil" is that the dialogue and the doings of those on the stage proceed, often zigzag, sometimes in a retrograde manner, but rarely take a straight line for more than a few minutes together. It is, in fact, a glorified variety entertainment, with Miss Edna May, always winsome, and graceful, and natural, as the most important turn. One good turn, however, deserves another, and we have many opportunities of admiring the fair socialist, Nelly, who executes with her eyes. A group of haughty hereditary legislators come to complain that she leads away their sons and daughters by the flowerless patter of socialism; but they remain to pray that she will lead them also. So it is with all her environments, whether they be Fripp's Fruit Shop in Regent-street, Simplicity Farm, or the Courtyard of the Savoy Hotel, Nelly Neil has but to appear to conquer anarchist and aristocrat alike. Vainly does Miss Kitty Gordon, as the wicked Russian Princess, plot against her. The very detectives love Nelly, and Mr. E. Dagnall, as the chief among them, proves this in and out of his disguises. Chief among her admiers, however, is the amusing and mercurial Mr. Joseph Coyne, as the rich young banker, full of quaint quips and quivers, alert of lip and limb. He courts Nelly, despite the vigorous attentions of the sisters Tizzle, who dog the rich young banker's steps; he follows her down to Simplicity Farm, where, as his sister, Lady Rokeby, Miss Mollie Lowell lives a dignified and simple life. Here comes also the wicked princess, Miss Kitty

Gordon, singing to us delightfully of the ephemeral life with a lighted cigarette to give a ruby point to her most successful song.

The original story of Mr. McLellan is, as I have said, so overgrown with his own lyrics and with the multitudinous chance happenings of the piece that to give a complete account of it would mean copying about three-quarters of the book. Suffice it, then, to say, that Miss Edna May passes through many trials on her way to triumph and marriage with the rich young banker, and passes through them all in picturesque costumes of an ascending scale of gorgeousness. The scene in the cornfields is a very beautiful tableau, arranged by Mr. Hugo Baruch, in which Miss Edna May occupies the central position, habited in cloth-of-gold, with a great wreath of dark blue cornflowers climbing over her left shoulder. Mr. Ivan Caryll's music follows the action in a very lively manner, but I did not carry away with me any particularly catching air.

Mr. Frohman has gone "Nap" on "Nelly Neil," and his rivals will probably prefer to "pass."

"THE REFORMER" AND "THE CAMPDEN WONDER" AT THE COURT THEATRE.

The former of these plays is by the actor, Mr. Cyril Harcourt, and is, as he describes it, a very light comedy, so light, indeed, as rather to surprise one in a theatre which one has of late found dedicated to more serious or at any rate more ambitious work. Being by an actor, none of the little stage devices which raise a laugh or a smile among the audience are neglected, the worst of this being, that having smiled, one realises the little trick that produced the smile.

A fair reformer, Miss Eva Moore, who is also a lady of social position, proposes to set the mad world to rights by excluding from her society all the social black sheep, or rather all those who seem to her to be black. Petulant and pretty, Miss Moore carries her rather heavy, because improbable, load lightly and gracefully, until she deposits it and herself in the arms of Mr. Allen Aynesworth, who plays one of those omniscient middle-aged gentleman whom one associates with the genius of Sir Charles Wyndham. But the plot does not stand analysis, for why, to give an instance, should Sybil Cardew, influenced to break off her engagement by Miss Eva Moore, not write and ask for her photograph back from the man to whom she had given it? Instead of doing so, she entrusts the omniscient Sir Rupert with the mission, which he executes so successfully as to drive out of England the foolishly emphatic Earl about to marry the beautiful reformer, whom he secures for himself in the last act. He has also arranged that Sybil Cardew should not be deprived of her young lover, and social reforms are laid aside by general consent in favour of matrimony.

Of "The Campden Wonder," by Mr. John Masefield, I can only say that I did wonder. The appalling miscarriage of justice, by which innocent son and mother are accused and executed on the evidence of the other son who hates them did, I believe, actually take place in Gloucestershire in the seventeenth century.

The admirable work put into it by Mr. Norman McKinnel as the accuser, and by Miss Carlotta Addison as the piteous old mother, to mention but two of a fine cast, did not, to my mind, save this long-winded tragedy from being wholly gruesome and painful to contemplate. One needs some redeeming element of beauty, either in the language or in the plot, to tolerate, or, indeed, to endure, this harrowing-up of the strongest feelings of one's nature—filial affection and the sense of justice. It is too nearly a pathological study to be suitable for dramatic performance. No moderately sane individual would have behaved as this elder son, and the moment you make the doings of a maniac your main theme, you are outside the domain of drama.

* * * * *

A number of small societies are springing up for the purpose of performing plays that would not otherwise be likely to pass the managerial barriers which at most theatres stand between the new dramatist and the footlights. Among these is Mr. Herbert Dansey's society, "The Argonauts," which sprung into pulsating life on an afternoon of last week in the Victoria Hall, Bayswater. It turned out to have been well worth the trouble of a visit, for Mr. Whiteley's play, "A Point of View," has much in it to arouse and hold the attention.

On Saturday evening, at the Haymarket, Mr. Frederick Harrison gave us a new one act playlet by Mrs. Henry de La Pasture and a revival of Mr. Carton's "Lady Huntworth's Experiment."

"Her Grace the Reformer" is discovered lolling exquisitely upon sofa cushions of incredible softness, and holding forth to her butler, secretary, and lady's-maid on the equality of everybody, much in the way which I presume that the socialists, aristocratic and otherwise, hold converse with one another. With such aid to reflections as is afforded by the last French novel, the Duchess sends away her satellites and disposes herself to rest before dinner. Enter to her a burglar from under the toilet table. Having bound a scarf over the mouth of the Duchess, he pockets her pearl necklace and the articles on her toilet-table. Enter to him the secretary, a man of socialistic convictions strengthened by a recent inheritance, which makes him independent of the Duchess. He argues with the Duchess, swinging the burglar nonchalantly from side to side, a pigmy in his grasp. His main point is that the man has done no wrong, on her grace's own showing, and proceeds to quote her recent utterances as to the community of property. Meanwhile the burglar struggles loose, evades the butler, who seizes the secretary in his shirt-sleeves, laying down the law to the silly little Duchess, whose anxiety about her pearls shows that her belief in community of property does not extend to pearls.

A pretty trifle, well enacted. Every one regretted the absence, through illness, of Mr. Henry Kemble, whose humours as the Vicar of Stillford were among the gems of "Lady Huntworth's Experiment." But I must say a word in favour of Mr. Fred Lewis's careful study and competent playing at the last moment in Mr. Kemble's manner Mr. Kemble's part. I was pleased and surprised (I am always truthful) to find how well this revival stood the test of a second hearing. It is full of witty things, well placed, and now, with Mr. Charles Hawtrey, Mr. Weedon Grossmith, Mrs. Calvert, and Miss Wiehe as the principal personages above-stairs, Mr. Holman Clark (admirable, amorous, seneschal Mr. Clark!) Miss Pollie Emery, and Miss Compton as the omniscient cook-countess below-stairs, jaded as Gandy's (the butler) palate must be his who does not enjoy "Lady Huntworth's Experiment."

Managers, a word in your ears! I believe none of you have seen "The Naughty Little Princess," a fairy play by Miss Evelyn Sharp. I have, because I took the trouble to go all the way to Primrose Hill; in fact, I "scaled the heights" of that celebrated eminence, and descended again to its base ere I discovered the St. Mary's Church-room where this delectable entertainment was thrice given last week. "The Naughty Princess" lives in a country "several thousands of miles on the way to Fairy Land." Owing to an unpleasant enchantment, it is so cold in this land that even the strawberries are always strawberry ice. The little Princess, sweetly played by Miss Katherine Hannay, alone can remove the spell by meeting the Flame-haired Fire Boy at the gates of Fairyland. This she does, being very self-willed and very naughty, under the auspices of "a really nice dragon," and other delightful animals, quite the equal of Mr. Barrie's fairy folk. Lack of space precludes my telling all the story of the beautiful little Princess, but next Christmas I hope to see it unthawed and luxuriant in one of the West End theatres. Managers, I have said.

My recommendation of Payne's "Arabian Nights" as a superior library edition to that of Burton, in the course of my remarks upon "Sindbad" at Drury Lane, has elicited a letter from a friend of the late traveller. His suggestion that, "like the Times," I bear ill-will to Burton, is quite unfounded, and arises from a confusion of thought, common to many. Burton, whom I greatly admire as a distinguished traveller and student of Eastern manners, was but a mediocre writer of English prose, and almost always turgid and strained in verse. But it is quite wrong to suppose that because, for instance, one does not admire a man's writing, that should imply bearing him ill-will. It is possible to admire the good and ignore the mediocre qualities of the same person. Proof of Burton having borrowed from Payne is to be found in the parallel passages adduced by Wright in his life of the former. He was often seen at work on his version, with Payne's by his side. Payne is always lucid in his prose, poetic and lucid in his verse renderings. I agree with my correspondent, though it has nothing to do with my former remarks, that no satisfactory life of Burton has appeared. Those he mentions have all something to be said against them, though the most illuminating is, perhaps, that of Wright.

On Monday the Hippodrome had its exhibition of musical thought transference by "Trilby and Svengali." They "communicate thought at a vast distance without word or action." Trilby sits at a grand piano and plays anything suggested secretly to Svengali. Telepathy seems to be becoming so common that one wonders if it cannot be taught. I have myself hitherto failed to give accounts of theatrical performances held "at a vast distance" from the place at which I happened to be, but I have heard of its being done by others, though unfortunately the actual happening did not always coincide with the telepathic vision of the writer.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

SHAHS PAST AND PRESENT.

I HAVE seen three Shahs during this Third Republic. The original Shah, who led the way, appeared to me a terrible Kurd. His manners were of a piece with his methods of government. His successor, one of the most amiable of Orientals, and the handsomest when he came among us as heir apparent, became, for the sake of the Contrexéville waters, an annual visitor to France. The Shah now reigning attended with his father when the latter was only heir apparent, and passed almost unnoticed. The first appearance of Nasr-ed-Din was brought about by the Moral Order Government to reconcile Paris to monarchism. The Shah made his début amid public festivities and all the military and civic pomp the government could command. The receptions given in his honour were about the most brilliant that ever came off in Paris. To snub the principle of parliamentary institutions the semi-barbarous despot from the East was, with his endless suite, assigned the Petit Bourbon for a residence, and he made himself at home there. His title of King of Kings amused the multitude, and the magnificence of the diamonds which he wore gave it a semblance of reality. The white thoroughbred which he mounted at the Longchamps review, with its splendidly jewelled reins and saddle and its long pink tail, enhanced the master's prestige. It all made him seem a monarch in the "Arabian Nights'" genre. Nasr-ed-Din looked what nature made him, ferocious, cruel, crafty, and in short an awful "Tartar." If in company he wanted "forty winks," he said so. He was le Shah sans gêne, poked la Maréchale MacMahon in the ribs at dinner, felt her dairymaid arms, which he admired, and assured her, through the former dragoman of a French Embassy, that were she less old she would be entirely to his taste. The Maréchale had remained an assez gentille petite femme, rondelette et fraiche. At the Louvre, Nasr-ed-Din begged the dragoman in Turkish, which he spoke equally well with Persian, to tell the Fine Arts Minister, who took him round, that he detested European paintings and sculptured things, and wanted to go away. "The way out, the way out," he peremptorily added. Oriental monarchs seldom see company, and, their will being law, do not affect any grace or graciousness which nature has not bestowed on them.

The late Shah had for his gentleness and beauty been preferred to his elder brother, Prince Zil, as heir to the throne. Zil is a man of far higher ability and of an iron will—a reason, perhaps, why the despotic Nasr-ed-Din sent him off to Ispahan and kept him in that far distant place as Governor. The government of Azerbeidjan, which fell to the lot of the late Shah at the age of nine, is on the verge of Turkish Asia Minor and the Caucasian territory of Russia. It is the province nearest to European influence. The late Shah there learned to speak Russian, and to fear Russia. He spoke French fairly, but rather in the Ollendorff style, in brief, abrupt sentences which led to no others. His natural amiability (the most salient of his qualities) tempered his frankness, which also was remarkable. As the Director of the Jardin des Plantes took him round, he stopped before the cage of Hyder and Lallah, two Indian tigers. "Wretched beasts," said the Shah. "In my youth, when I liked tiger hunting, I should have scorned to chase such miserable things." There are still tigers in the Persian jungles along the Caspian, and they afford good sport to Imperial governors. The Shah, on being brought to the elephants' enclosure, said to the Director: "Is that all you can show me? I have three hundred elephants in my stables." On the terrace of Versailles, as the grandes eaux played, Muzaffr-ed-Din stopped his nose, and wanted to know why water that smelt so bad had been brought there? The playing of the jets d'eaux amused him, but he preferred Gulistan, with its wealth of roses and its pure waters in channels lined with bluish green porcelain, to any royal residence he had seen in Europe. On seeing the bed of the Fourteenth Louis, the Shah asked did that monarch often fall out in sleeping.

The late Shah had a soul alive to music, but peculiar taste. His numerous pianos, pianolas, and other instruments were "massed" to form a domestic orchestra. His sons and daughters received good musical training, and the present Shah is an accomplished pianist. Railway travelling upset the late Shah's nerves. By insisting on a twenty-four mile an hour pace, and taking with him a great retinue, he made his tours in the West incredibly expensive. He had not the same objection to the motor, and used those motors he imported, on the excellent road—the only good road in Persia—between Resht and Teheran. He proved an excellent customer to the Dion-Bouton Company, and paid it the compliment of attending an entertainment in his honour at the Automobile Club. Most of the members attended. The Shah asked Comte de Dion what they all did there. The Comte quite seriously answered: "Nous étudions, Majesté." "I admire," said the Shah, "the application of Europeans of fortune to their studies. That is why you make such wonderful improvements and discoveries." "Just so, sire." Had the Comte been as sincere and serious as he appeared he would have told the Shah that most of the members who often came to the club did so to indulge in games of chance, and that all the study went on at the Dion-Bouton factory.

It is a mistake, I have been told, to suppose that the late Shah admired the bazaar trash which he took back with him to Persia. He had different reasons, some benevolent and some patriotic, for importing great cargoes of articles de Paris. The road I have spoken of was made by a Russian company in return for a toll monopoly and the exclusion of European merchandise, save Russian at the Persian port in which it terminates, on the Caspian. The Shah has a personal privilege to import in his own baggage. The late Shah took advantage of this to bring back to his wives, concubines, eleven daughters, and to his courtiers, for their domestic use, all the pretty things that took his fancy. His keepsakes and souvenirs of Europe, the Lyons silks, gauzes, laces, muslins, and other Bon Marché things, brought joy into his own harem and the harems of the great lords about him. He placed many of the porcelain articles he brought back near those of Persian to show the æsthetic superiority of the latter. He took a just pride in Persian carpets and porcelains, and in his rose gardens, which a Frenchman named Simon directs. Another Frenchman, M. Lemaire, directs the Imperial Conservatoire at Teheran, from which, of course, young ladies are excluded, and M. Gaffery, the Minister of Public Works, which has been perhaps a rather sinecure appointment, is a Polytechnic Old Boy.

Mohammed Ali Mirza has no harem and lives on the footing of a comrade with his one wife, who has a Parisian couturier attached to her household and two aides. The new Shah kept at Tauris twelve Frenchmen—serving as blacksmith, vet., chemist, gardener, tailor, confectioner, artificer of fireworks, piano tuner, architect, civil engineer, chauffeur, and a maître d'hôtel, who had been an assistant at the Foreign Ministry. His new Majesty is a man of few words. Otherwise he could earn a name for speaking French fluently, as he possesses that tongue so thoroughly. I do not see why he should not gladly co-operate in the constitutional reforms which have been latterly called for in Persia. As things stand, he has no more power than the early Capets, beyond that of naming his sons governors of provinces under the tutelage, if they be mere boys, of sub-governors. The governors squeeze the governed in the Shah's name, but pocket most of the money they squeeze out of them. If the late Shah had a good time personally through his ten years' reign it was on borrowed money. "Après moi, le déluge" might have properly been his motto. None of his sons inherited his easy-going mansuetude. They all resemble the grandfather in disposition and character, and the three elders have as governors of provinces shown themselves as cruel. The third, Abou'l Fatz, is as much the desperado as any of the Kurds he governs and drives into revolt by his fiscal oppression.

I once asked the late Sir Robert Murdoch Smith, who passed twenty-three years in Persia and connected it, telegraphically speaking, what the limits of the Shah's power were. He said: "In fiscal matters he has hardly any power. But his name has great moral force in other things. He can cut off heads, or he can grant concessions, or tell his subjects what they ought to do, consistently, of course, with the teachings of the Mollahs. He generally exerted his power (except to decapitate) in conformity with the advice given him by his French doctor Theluson, one of the most just and obliging men it has ever been my good fortune to meet. He helped me to obtain a decree to forbid the use of the new mineral dyes in carpets and other things. In many ways he helped me in my mission."

I am not surprised at the terrible fate which has befallen General Pavloff. His views of government were much like those of the Duke of Alva. I met him some years ago at St. Petersburg. At that time he had the rank of colonel. I found him an interesting, courteous man, though too inquisitive to be altogether pleasant. I gathered from him that he was entrusted with police arrangements for the safety of the Czar; in fact, that he was a sort of glorified detective. He was about to start for Warsaw, and I was struck by his hatred of the Poles. Colonel Pavloff envied the laurels of Muravieff the Hanger. Somebody remarked that the Poles were just as disaffected as they were half a century before, and that if Russia were ever busy anywhere else another insurrection might break out. "If the Poles revolted again," said Colonel Pavloff, "we would have to—how do you say in French ausrotten?" "Exterminate," I said. "That's right; we would have to exterminate them, and it would be a pity, because, after all, they are the most gifted of the Slavonic nationalities." The grim manner in which he said this gave me a shudder.

The Colonel was open-minded enough in some respects. Thus he spoke to me of a certain young Grand Duke as a "good-for-nothing young scoundrel." His feelings towards the Emperor were those of love and veneration. At any rate, he said so.

"Kitty" has been distinguishing herself. The opposition of the grande couture to the Minister of the Interior against "Kitty" and her misdeeds is too good. She has, at the Cercle Charras and other places of the kind, so cleaned out the pockets of the grandes dames who order their dresses at the Place Vendôme as to leave them without the means of paying for them. The cagnotte in these cercles is sweeping. But the business of all cagnottes is to sweep the money of the gamester into the pockets of those who run the tables. In principle it is always the same thing. In practice some brooms work faster than others, but in the end all make décavés of those who stake and winners of the others.

As a great Parisian interest is now bound up in la haute couture, the Minister of the Interior is inclined to put down hells, which are generally run by Belgians. As I never could get baccarat, "chemin de fer," "pontes," and "refaits" into my head, and think the subject uninteresting save for "those who win or lose," I do not go into details. Among the latter are the Marquise du Moulin Rouge, who bemoans her hard fate, and Otero, who now confesses the richissime Monsieur Webb to be a myth. She has had to liquidate her losses in selling her jewels, and goes to Rome, St. Petersburg being practically cut off.

The statute passed four years ago to authorise "open cercles constituted for lawful objects" has given us as many hells as there used to be not long since in Belgium, and directed, too, by Belgians. The Minister of the Interior has been taking legal advice as to the best way to put them down. His advisers assure him that he has the power to suppress all that are formed for the purpose of promoting gambling.

The Archbishop of Paris is still the guest of M. Henri—what did I say?—Denys Cochin, and will probably remain in his well-warmed house until the weather is milder. The telegraphic style is now so often applied to names colloquially that one's pen is liable to slip, as mine has just done, in writing those given at the christening font. We are getting into the way in speaking of men hors texte or simply eminent by their surnames only. We never dream of saying, when we talk about them, M. Aristide Briant, M. Armand Fallières, M. Georges Clemenceau, M. Raymond Poincaré, M. (I forget his baptismal name from dropping it for a number of years) Pichon. One still says M. Henri Brisson, because familiar with the "Henri" long before the telegraphic brevity infection passed into conversation. For the same reason one always said M. Emile Deschanel. In speaking now of his son we say Deschanel merely. I never thought of paying any heed to the baptismal name of the poet Coppée. Were he only a mere poetaster, I should learn it, to distinguish him from other Coppées. It is scarcely a compliment to remember well the given name of any one who has risen to eminence within the last quarter of a century. To address a letter to M. "Georges" Clemenceau would be like Lord Lyons addressing one to M. Victor Hugo, Senateur. The poet, on reading the address, felt nettled. This got back to Lord L. He spoke about it to me in a tone that showed him to be uncertain whether to laugh or feel angry, and asked what the address ought to have been. I replied, "Merely 'Victor Hugo, Paris,' or 'Victor Hugo dans son Avenue.'"

I am afraid that a fortnight or three weeks ago my pen slipped in speaking of the Archbishop's host as M. Henri instead of M. Denys Cochin. He, if he saw the little portrait I gave of him, would be too much l'homme d'esprit to trouble about so small a mistake when there was so much very complimentary truth.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

MONEY was not made for man, dear Lady Betty; man was made for money. All other considerations are superfluous, except insomuch as they facilitate the acquisition of pounds, shillings, and pence. The most perfect modern man is he who possesses the greatest ability for obtaining money; in him are overlooked all deficiencies in other directions, such as the disregard of moral and human laws, disfigurements of character, and disadvantages of appearance and behaviour.

It is a glorious victory of money over mind.

In those conditions, however, it is not surprising that virtue, manners, literature, and the arts are decaying in this country; there is but one poetry, the poetry of the Three per Cents.

Self-made superiority is a matter that deserves more attention than it is receiving in our time. The neglect is regrettable. The number is growing rapidly of those curious men and women who assume the attitude of superiority without having earned by their qualities or achievements the sanction of their fellows to adopt the condition. Here is a politician who seldom opens his mouth in the House, or has little or no reputation in that assembly, who assumes a masterful attitude amongst his companions, and is accepted as a surpassing person in consequence by the less intelligent of them. There is the "poet" who writes books which the publisher cannot induce the public to buy. This self-constituted "genius" assumes a condescending attitude in his conversation with others; casts his eyes upwards as if he were communing with the Muses whom tradition has placed above; and is regarded by the weaker-minded as intelligent because he insists that he is. There are the would-be socially superior, men and women who have neither birth, wit, worth, nor wealth, but who affect the greatest contempt for the generality of their fellows, and attract respect because of the offensive attitude they assume. The mental condition of those people is obviously defective; they should be examined and reported upon by a specially appointed board of experts on diseases of the mind, and, if of impaired faculties, should be withdrawn from the social currency for the convenience of their fellow men and women and for their own benefit.

It has always been our boast that the English are the Apostles of Cleanliness. Perhaps it would now be advisable to reconsider that contention. The American has replaced our dingy, dirty-looking tramcars with clean, airy, and roomy vehicles; he has transformed our dismal and filthy underground railways into reasonably bright and well-ventilated systems; and he has substituted for our dreary private hotels the speckless palaces we have seen arise almost as if by magic. All those improvements we could have effected ourselves if we had really been so devoted to cleanliness as we imagine we are.

How surpassingly charming we English would be were we not so perfect—in our own estimation!

Sir Hubert Jerningham made a tour round the world in the winter of last year, and he has recorded his impressions of the places and peoples he visited in "From West to East," a book which has been published by Mr. John Murray this week. As is generally known, Sir Hubert has throughout life had exceptional opportunities of seeing the best that the many countries he has visited, officially and unofficially, possess, and has added to those opportunities an intelligence which enables him to form peculiarly correct views. For both reasons "From West to East" is a book which will attract widespread interest, an interest which will be kept alive, moreover, throughout, in consequence of the charm of style of the writer and the many anecdotes which the volume contains.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THERE has been a little skimble-skamble betting on the Derby, but the prices offered by the bookmakers are ridiculously short, and are certainly not calculated to stimulate speculation. It seems inconceivable that any one suffered to go at large could be so infatuated as to accept any such odds as 4 to 1 about either Slieve Gallion or Galvani. Both colts were beaten when last seen out, but there was a good excuse for the defeat of Slieve Gallion in the Middle Park Plate. I would be very sorry, however, to invest one penny on Captain Greer's colt until he has been well tried for stamina. Slieve Gallion did not impress good judges last season as likely to turn out a stayer. As to Galvani, he will not start before the Derby, and if he pleases the touts during the spring he is sure to keep at a short price, but the chances are that the odds now offered will be forthcoming on the day of the race, as the winner of the Two Thousand is tolerably certain to be the favourite at Epsom. Twelve months ago people were cackling about Major Loder winning some of the big races with Admirable Crichton, but nobody even mentioned Spearmint seriously in connection with the Derby until long after the Two Thousand had been run. History may repeat itself in this stable, and Galvani might ultimately turn out inferior to Baltinglass. It is quite certain that the son of Isinglass and Sibola was never within reasonable distance of being fit last season, and he is a rapidly improving and remarkably good-looking colt. At all events, I am told that Weathercock will want a lot of time, and that he is not at all likely to be fit and in form during the early part of the season, so that Baltinglass is certain to be Major Loder's best for the Two Thousand, and if he runs prominently for that race it will be easy for this stable to estimate correctly the Derby prospects of Galvani. Major Loder may have a dangerous candidate for the One Thousand and Oaks in Adora, own sister to Pretty Polly, who was not trained last season. She is a beautiful filly, and very racing-like, but nothing whatever is known about her capacity for racing.

A bet has been taken about M. E. Blanc's Ouadi Halfa at the more rational price of 25 to 1. The owner of this colt, however, moves in mysterious ways, and it will surely be better business to wait until the day, and then take very much shorter odds, with the certainty of a run. Ouadi Halfa is not M. E. Blanc's only Derby candidate, as he has also accepted with Myram, own brother to Jardy. It is stated that Ouadi Halfa is really an Irish colt, his breeder being Lord Clonmell. This is true enough, but people must not be misguided by this announcement into supposing that Ouadi Halfa is therefore ineligible for most of the French big races, as this colt was foaled in France after his dam had been purchased by M. E. Blanc, and he is engaged in the Prix du Jockey Club (French Derby), which race is run at Chantilly on the Sunday in Epsom week. Ouadi Halfa who is by Persimmon out of Yesterling, was backward last season, and it was the opinion of many who watched him closely that he will turn out a non-stayer. In any case it is desperate fatuity to back such a horse now for the Derby at any price whatever, as the odds are considerable enough even against his being sent to England next May.

The Duke of Westminster's colt Dusty Miller, own brother to Rydal Head, wanted time last season, and he is quite likely to train into a very useful three-year-old. This is quite the sort of colt to win one of the big stakes at Ascot, in which he would have an advantage in the weights. He is said to have come on during the winter in a very satisfactory manner. The Duke's colt, Vamose, the two-year-old brother of Flying Fox, is also reported to be a remarkably nice colt, but I have a dismally distinct recollection of the rhapsodies of which Pipistrello (own brother to Vamose) was the object during the spring of 1905, and yet, good-looking as he was, he retired from the Turf without having won one farthing. If Vamose turns out to be smart (and it is surely full time for Vampire to produce something again, which can win a race) I dare say we shall see him making his début at Ascot in the New Stakes, as he has been entered for that race. It was in the New Stakes that Flying Fox made such a brilliant début in 1898.

There is a splendid entry for the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, 130 two-year-olds having been engaged in that race, which will be worth £2,300. The King is the largest subscriber with six, and next comes Lord Rosebery with five, and then Lord Derby, Sir R. B. Jardine, and Sir R. Waldie-Griffith with four each. M. E. Blanc, who has frequently patronised this race, has not entered anything this year. The most interesting items in the list are two colts nominated by Count Lehndorff, but which really belong to the German Emperor, Anklang, by Ard Patrick out of Alverle, and Kakadu, by Saraband out of Kari Kari. They were bred at the Prussian Government stud, and are now under the charge of S. Darling at Beckhampton, as well as a third colt in the same ownership, Golden Gulden, by Ard Patrick out of Girton Girl.

There are twenty-nine entries for the All-Aged Stakes, and notable names in the list are his Majesty's Cynosure, Mr. W. Hall-Walker's Colonia, Mr. S. Joel's Polymelus, and Lord Howard de Walden's His Eminence. I expect, however, that this race is merely a question of health for Captain Greer's speedy horse Rocketter.

It is remarkable that 104 two-year-olds should have been entered for the Windsor Castle Stakes, inasmuch as the added money to this race is only £300. His Majesty and Sir R. Waldie-Griffith are the largest subscribers, each with four. The two German colts engaged by Count Lehndorff in the Coventry Stakes have been entered for this race also.

There is an interesting entry for the Wood Ditton Stakes at the Newmarket Craven Meeting, which race is limited to three-year-olds that have not won £200. The most notable names are his Majesty's dark colt Perambulator, Major Loder's Adora and Baltinglass, and Lord Derby's St. Claire II.

A fine entry for the Ascot Cup has so often resulted in a melancholy and ludicrous collapse when the numbers came to be hoisted that it would be prudent if sporting writers refrained from indulging in florid gush about the grand prospects of this year's race. I read last week how we may anticipate a struggle between Spearmint, Keystone II., Maintenon, Troutbeck, and Sagamore, to say nothing of the Russian and Hungarian cracks which have been entered, and putting aside the other French horses in the list, several of which have shown excellent form. Spearmint has reappeared at exercise at Newmarket, after a long course of veterinary treatment, and it is asserted that he now seems to be quite sound, and that he is expected to stand another preparation. He may be at present perfectly sound, but it is in the greatest degree unlikely that he will stand the long and severe training which is absolutely necessary in order to get a horse fit for such a race as the Ascot Cup, and especially as the ground is tolerably certain to have become hard by the time that the critical period in his preparation for that race has arrived. Even supposing that Spearmint did get through his training, it seems pure gasconading to describe him as so good a horse that he may be relied upon to defeat all comers at Ascot if fit and well. He defeated a very poor field in the Derby, and he really had nothing to beat in the Grand Prix but Maintenon, and it has since been asserted that there was a good excuse for the collapse of Mr. Vanderbilt's horse at Longchamps. Moreover, how on earth can any one presume to write with such confidence about Spearmint's chance at Ascot, considering that we have yet to learn that he can stay the course? People are so hare-brained that the practical lesson to be derived from the defeat of Pretty Polly and Cicero at Ascot appear to be already forgotten. As to Keystone II., I do not for a moment believe that Lord Derby's mare has any pretensions to stay the Ascot Cup course, and I expect she will undergo a special preparation for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, when the distance will suit her admirably. Bridge of Canny has made a remarkable improvement during the winter, and, being a good stayer, I fancy he is likely to be his owner's best representative in long-distance races. Troutbeck will in all probability be defeated by The White Knight whenever they meet in a Cup race, and Buckminster will be hopelessly outclassed in such a race, and he is far more likely to distinguish himself by winning a good handicap.

Of all the Spring Handicaps the most successful, far and away, has been the Esher Plate of £1,000, a race for three-year-olds only. There are eighty-three entries, owners having been lavish in their patronage (as times go) because the minor forfeit is only one sovereign, but only a few years ago there would have been at least one hundred and fifty entries for such a handicap. The most notable names in the list are Baron de Forest's Bellatrix and Mr. Clarke's Linacre, and they will doubtless be the top weights.

Lord Rosebery has half a dozen horses at Beckhampton, these being animals which were owned last year by Lord Dalmeny, and Ramrod is included in the lot.

Lord Ilchester and Captain Greer are the joint owners of Rocketter, who is a very speedy horse, and probably there is nothing in training capable of beating him over a T.Y.C., now that Thrush has retired from the Turf. Captain Greer has only three horses of his own at Beckhampton—Slieve Gallion and a couple of two-year-olds.

Orwell appears to be generally expected to win the One Thousand, judging from some dissertations on that race which I have perused. It seems decidedly premature to discuss the prospects of such an event, but I hear that Lord Rosebery is quite likely to have a dangerous candidate in his dark filly Prunella, by Persimmon out of Tressure. She is also engaged in the Oaks and in the Coronation Stakes at Ascot.

Lord Ellesmere has been very unlucky with his racehorses for a long time past, as his winnings have never been large, and his colours have but seldom been successful in any important event. He will begin next season with twenty-two horses in training at Newmarket, twelve of which are two-year-olds, which were bred on his own farm at Stetchworth. Seven of these animals are sired by King's Courier, who has therefore been afforded an excellent chance of distinguishing himself. None the Wiser, a mare bred by the late Duchess-Dowager of Montrose, was expected to prove a great success at the stud, but she has been a sad failure. Her two-year-old of this season is a filly by Proclamation or King's Courier.

Only thirty-five horses have been engaged in the Newbury Spring Cup of £1,250, a most miserable entry, considering that the minor forfeit is £3 only, and the distance is one mile. It is perfectly idiotic and ridiculous to close a handicap of this class on January 1, when the race is not run until April 13, and the blunder of publishing the weights on January 24 is a suitable consummation of the original folly. It would surely be more in accordance with common sense to have held these weights over until after the Liverpool Spring Meeting, i.e., to have published them in the Calendar of March 28. Seven owners are doubly represented. There are four French entries, M. Ephrussi's Ob and Champ d'Or and M. Caillault's Tyrol and Camisard.

Seventy-five two-year-olds have been entered for the Beckhampton Plate of £200, and this event is not likely to cost the fund one penny.

The final forfeit has been declared for the Princess of Wales's Stakes of £6,000, which race will be run at Newmarket on Thursday, July 4. There were 216 entries when this race closed in December, 1903, and twenty-seven horses are now left in. It is obvious that fully half of the animals which remain in for this race must have accepted by mistake. Spearmint has, of course, been left in by Major Loder on the off chance of his standing a preparation, and another doubtful candidate is Mr. Neumann's Llangibby. Mr. Hall Walker has accepted with Merry Moment (12 lb. allowed), and with Black Arrow (9 lb. allowed), and the latter bids fair to be the most dangerous of the four-year-olds. His Majesty's Nulli Secundus, Lord Howard de Walden's His Eminence, Sir R. Waldie-Griffith's Shilfa, Duke of Portland's Wombwell, and Mr. Belmont's Lord Hastings are all in the list, but it seems to me that the race is likely to prove a good thing for Polymelus if Mr. Joel's horse is then in his best form. It would be interesting to see a meeting over the Suffolk Stakes Course between Spearmint (9 st. 5 lb.), Polymelus (9 st. 7 lb.), and Black Arrow (8 st. 13 lb.). Nulli Secundus would carry 8 st. Spearmint is nominated for this race by his breeder, Sir Tatton Sykes.

Thirty horses are left in for the Eclipse Stakes of £10,000 at Sandown Park (to run on Friday, July 19), and the best-known of the four-year-olds are Mr. Bass's Sancy, Mr. Hall Walker's Colonia, Mr. Clarke's Gingal, and Mr. Purefoy's Lally. The list of three-year-olds, however, is much more interesting, and this includes Lord Rosebery's Traquair and Bezonian, Duke of Devonshire's Hillsprite, Lord Wolverton's The Welkin, Lord Derby's Olympian (colt by Orme out of St. Victorine), and the Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller. Two dark colts of which more is likely to be heard in the spring have accepted—His Majesty's Perambulator and Lord Falmouth's St. Martin. I note that M. E. Blanc has left in his mare Blue Fly, by Flying Fox out of Bluette. There are here the materials for a most interesting race, and it appears to be good odds on a three-year-old being the winner. There were originally 165 entries for the Eclipse Stakes, which closed in November, 1904.

The Jockey Club Stakes of £10,000, to be run at Newmarket on Thursday, October 3, closed in September, 1904, with 194 entries, and forty-two horses are now left in. The list of four-year-olds includes Sancy, Mr. J. de Rothschild's Beppo (12 lb. allowed), Black Arrow (9 lb. allowed), and Colonia. Among the three-year-olds are Perambulator, St. Martin, Lord Cadogan's The Sun (12 lb. allowed), Olympian, Hillsprite, Sir R. Waldie-Griffith's Simon Square, Major Loder's Adora (the dark own sister to Pretty Polly), Bezonian, and The Welkin.

There are thirty-four acceptances for the Atlantic Stakes of £2,000 at the Liverpool July Meeting, and among the four-year-olds are Gingal, Buckminster, His Eminence, and Black Arrow. The list of three-year-olds include The Welkin, Gnome, Knight of Tully, Silver Heeled, Linacre, and The Sun.

Two French horses are left in for the Princess of Wales' Stakes, M. Michel Ephrussi's Tralle, 4 years, and Comte H. de Pourtales' Narvaly, 4 years. There are also two in the Jockey Club Stakes, M. Caillault's Master Blink, 4 years, and M. de St. Alary's Korrigan, 3 years, who has a breeding allowance of 9 lb.

I have received the winter edition of "Ruff's Guide to the Turf" (139, Fleet Street, E.C., price 7s. 6d.). It contains, brought up to date, all the information which has so long made Ruff an indispensable book of reference for all who take an intelligent interest in racing.

THE FOOTBALL TRUST AND ITS CHATTELS.

Last week I said that professional Association players who had no representation on the Council, and who, by the laws of the Football Association, are not permitted to be represented, had their grievances. An apt illustration was given in the Star of the hardships of the transfer system. Briefly, a man who signs on for a league club team cannot play for another league club until his transfer has been arranged or the period for which he has signed on has expired. The case referred to shows how cruelly and selfishly this rule may work in practice. At Accrington a professional player was charged with stealing a pair of boots. He was driven to theft by poverty. He was penniless. His wife was about to be confined. Of course, there was the union or the workhouse or prison. The magistrate leniently fined him ten shillings or seven days. The money was paid by friends present in court. For it was no fault of the wretched man that he was not earning fifty shillings a week. The Burnley Club were willing to pay him that sum. But they found that he had signed on for Grimsby Town, whereupon they offered five pounds for a transfer, but Grimsby wanted fifty pounds. And so negotiations fell through, and the man's means meanwhile ran out. He hoped in Accrington to get an engagement with a non-league club. The bald facts, therefore, are that a man willing to work finds an employer ready to engage him at a good market wage, but he cannot be employed because another employer, who does not pay him a brass farthing, requires fifty sovereigns as a condition for letting him earn his livelihood. I have no doubt my learned and legal friends will say that such a contract is not enforceable in law, and that the man cannot be subject to any penalty if he breaks it. The politician will declare that it is contrary to public policy that a man should be prevented from earning his living because another requires to be paid before he will license him to do so. The Radical will call it a state of slavery. The Tory will dilate on the inviolability of contract. Both will find nothing to praise in the system, and the child of light will preach on the ways of the Philistine who makes sport a business. And yet there is no way out of the trouble at present. The Law Courts are powerless to interfere. There is a sanction, as Austin would say, that is far more powerful than the writs of Chancery or King's Bench. It is the sanction of co-operation. Let a club employ such a man and the other clubs will refuse to play them. The club will be starved out and killed. It is far better that one man and his wife should be starved and go to gaol or the workhouse than that a corporation without soul or conscience should suffer. Sport is sport, business is business. Both simple propositions, but when sport is business, then the proposition and its consequences become complex.

Of course, the evil of which the case I have taken is an illustration can be met by suitable rules. It could be provided that a player so signing on should be entitled to a living wage, and that the amount of transfer fee should be on a sliding scale, depending on the number of matches in which a player figures and on the amount of his wages. But what is the chance of such a code? The wage-earning power of a player is limited by the laws of his local tribunal—that is, the Football Association. This was done in the interests of sport, so that rich clubs might not overpower those who are less wealthy than their competitors. A very self-denying ordinance, and so self-sacrificing! Just as though any fool could not observe the wink in the eye. The rich club would have all the more money to buy up a big reserve of players, and the funds with which to pay a large transfer fee. For no limit is set upon the number of players a club may employ. So much the better for the players. It increases employment. But the less wealthy club is at a disadvantage. No limit is put upon a transfer fee. So much the worse for a player. He cannot until his contract is out go to another club. He may be shut out from all chances of improving his position unless the price offered is big enough to tempt his employer. In that price he has no interest. He is but a human chattel, to be haggled over, and to be bought and sold. He may be the subject of a judicial inquiry before the Football tribunal. He will not be a witness. He is, so far as the proceedings are concerned, as incapable of expressing himself as a horse or a motor-car. This is football as a business. It is all lop-sided and one-sided. Legislation is compiled in the interest of the employer, who is alone represented on the Council of the Association. Some fine day the players will organise, and on one given day they will all refuse to play until their grievances are remedied. At present they are under the thumb of a trust which is run in the interest of sport.

It is certainly a matter for extreme regret that a game so popular as Association football should be dominated by a trust of such a tyrannical description. The popularity of the game was aptly illustrated by my experience in a country village some five miles from a station. At the little post office and general shop there was a small crowd waiting for the maildriver to come up from the neighbouring town with a football edition of results of the first round of the cup tie played last Saturday. There is this marked distinction between football and racing. Practically speaking, only those who bet in any class of society take any interest in horse racing. That there is a good deal of betting on football results, I do not doubt. But the majority of those who are interested never have a penny on the game. Nearly all of these village lads and men could tell you the position of every club in its respective league, and which was playing at home. No doubt the Board of Education will regard this interest as scarcely intellectual. But therein is a common topic for conversation which lightens the long winter evenings. It is a safe subject, and so far as the talkers are concerned a healthy one. It is well that those in high places should understand the pride with which these villagers talked of the good fight that Oxford City had put up against Bury. The Oxford City is an amateur team, and that is what pleased them. Their local team just formed were amateurs as well. There is not a public school boy in the team. But they are strictly amateur, and goodness only knows what hopes the prowess of Oxford City did not excite in their breasts. The public school amateur must remember that in pressing on the cause of amateurs, he is not fighting only for his own class. The professional element on the council should realise that there are a large number of amateur clubs of all classes of society who require careful attention. The Football Association must not exist for the sake of the employers of professional players. Nor must the control of these business concerns be forced upon amateurs, who have quite enough to do to keep their own nest clean and healthy.

Over four hundred thousand people were present at the thirty-six matches that were played in the first round of the competition proper for the cup. The levelling up of all clubs in recent years was shown. These games are no longer a picnic for the North and Midlands. Thirteen matches have to be replayed. The surprise of the afternoon was the success of the Crystal Palace, a moderate team, according to Southern notions. They went to Newcastle and they beat the United, who have for two years been in the final. Their enthusiastic supporters are already asking what will happen if they are in the final. Will it be played at the Palace? These anticipations are rather premature.

Mr. E. C. Breed has resigned the amateur billiard championship. He complains that he cannot get his expenses for going to play exhibition matches. Amateur footballers and cricketers can, and why not he, the champion of the cue? But there is all the difference in the world between representing a club and playing for one's own hand. He is in the position of an amateur runner or swimmer. I cannot see that he has any grievance. Presumably he became champion without these jaunts. If he cannot exist without them he must turn professional.

The death of W. W. Read recalls old cricket scores. He was the first to bring the pull stroke into popular favour. If he had not been so much under the influence of Jupp at first he would, no doubt, have been a much finer bat than he was in his early days. His finest performance was in 1884, when, for some unknown reason, he was sent in ninth wicket down for England. Scotton blocked imperturbably, and Read scored a century and saved the game. If I remember rightly Punch honoured the partnership with some verses.

Mr. Hillyard, the old Leicester cricketer, and well known lawn tennis player, has been elected secretary of the All-England Lawn Tennis Club. He has a position which will require a great deal of tact, and in order that he may not be hampered in any way by conflicting interests he will be well advised to resign his position on the Council of the Lawn Tennis Association.

England went under very badly in the Rugby football match with Wales. It was played at Swansea, and the Welshmen worked with the New Zealand formation. Their forwards were more than a match for the Englishmen. Stoop was not up to form at half, and goodness only knows why Cooper was brought in at three-quarter. In London, one of the best club matches seen this season was between the Old Merchant Taylors and the London Scottish. The Old Boys played a good combined game, and thoroughly deserved to win. For the losers MacLeod was in brilliant form, dropping a goal and scoring a couple of tries.

The old Oxford Rowing Blue, Mr. Reggie Rowe, has been appointed secretary of the New University Club. Undergraduates will be interested to know that if elected within six years of matriculation, only half the usual entrance fee is payable. The paternal caution money can be usefully employed.

MAMMON.

Stock Markets Inactive—End of a Nineteen Day Account—Prospects Improving—Money Easing Off—Investors More Venturesome.

On the Stock Exchange during the past week the volume of dealings has been restricted and the tendency has been irregular, although with an upward inclination, and the general outlook is satisfactory. Money rates are growing easy and they are a great aid to business, and the general trade of the country is broadening out in a highly encouraging manner. Investors in most departments have just now an opportunity of picking up stocks at bargain prices, and I would commend to their attention Home and Colonial Railways in addition to the gilt-edged group. You can scarcely improve upon the best, as I have more than once had occasion to observe, and these issues bring in a fair return, while giving the best security for one's money. Among mines, rather more activity is looked for in South Africans, but no real briskness need be anticipated there until the end of the political campaign. It would probably be more advantageous to look to copper or tin shares for an early profit.

Money very Usable—Modified Views of the Bank Rate—Heavy Gold Withdrawals.

There is now a distinct change of sentiment in regard to the monetary position, and this is reflected in a material modification of the general impression concerning the possibilities of the Bank rate being immediately reduced. The market has taken too much for granted and permitted itself to become too enthusiastic. In fine, it had under-estimated the extent of the probable gold withdrawals on Argentine and Brazilian accounts, which are now proving somewhat heavy, while indications would seem to give the impression that a still further substantial amount may be taken to the same quarter.

The American Exchange, too, is not so favourable, and while it is not yet actually threatening, it constitutes an element of uncertainty. Owing to the continued prosperity of the United States it is recognised that gold will be urgently required there, and whether or not there would be a resumption of the raid upon London's stock of the metal, were a reduction in the Bank rate to be made now, it is clear enough that the Bank in its present condition, and having regard to the uncertainty of the position in other aspects, is not strong enough to risk such a contingency, however remote. In addition there are the possibilities connected with the "earmarking" of gold on account of India, and altogether the consensus of opinion seems to be that the 6 per cent. Bank rate will be retained into February. As a natural result discount quotations have been gradually marked up, a further contributory influence being the fact that money remains very usable. With bills maturing at the Bank daily until the end of the present month, any superabundance seems improbable, though in this connection it has to be remembered that the release of Treasury balances for account of the Sinking Funds will minimise the effect somewhat. However, a maintenance of money rates is to be expected. The Bank return came up to expectations. Owing to the return of money from circulation the reserve improved by £1,730,000, the stock of gold being £1,371,000 larger, notwithstanding the loss of £54,000 abroad on balance, while this was accompanied by a contraction of £359,000 in the note circulation. The drop of almost £6,733,000 in Other Securities reflects the repayments by the market.

CONSOLS GOOD—MARKET NOT UNATTRACTIVE—NEW ISSUES—JAPANESE FAVOURED.

Everything considered, there is little cause for dissatisfaction in regard to conditions prevailing in the gilt-edged market. The buoyancy is less pronounced, perhaps, because of the recognition of the fact that Bank rate possibilities were discounted rather prematurely, not to mention the beginning of the flood of new issues almost inevitable at this season. But this is not reflected in any significant alteration in values, because the sentiment in regard to the course of money, to which the market is keenly susceptible, remains hopeful enough. Within a month at the outside a retention of a 6 per cent. Bank rate ought to become quite unnecessary, a factor of considerable importance, while as regards the flood of new issues, there seems to be plenty of funds about waiting investment, and, with confidence growing, they ought to be absorbed without indirectly affecting to any material extent the market generally, especially as there will before long be less inducement to deposit money with bankers, owing to a gradual lowering of the interest allowed, following the relaxation of the pressure in Lombard-street as the year progresses. Ultimately values ought to be established on a higher basis, and gilt-edged stocks are therefore still fairly attractive. Amongst the borrowers are the Cape Government and the Colony of Natal. The former requires £994,350, offered in the shape of Three and a Half per Cent. Consolidated stock at 95 per cent. In point of yield this is rather more attractive than the existing 3 per cent. stock, which would bring in about ⅛ per cent. less. The same applies to the Natal issue of £725,000 Three and a Half per Cent. Consolidated stock, offered at 95. The most interesting of the new loans is that of the Chinese Government. This is for £650,000 Five per Cent. Bonds of the Imperial Chinese Railway (Shanghai-Nanking line), offered at par, or about a couple of points below the current price of the existing stock. The Chinese Government unconditionally guarantee the stock both as to principal and interest. An interesting feature of the Foreign market is the growing favour towards Japanese issues, stimulated by satisfactory budget figures and the recent good trade returns. Another point is the impending redemption of the 6 per cent. "war" loans. With the country in a prosperous condition, there is no obvious reason why a purely "war" interest should be paid longer than is absolutely necessary, hence the 6 per cent. issue will be redeemed as quickly as possible. From the investment point of view, the 4 per cent. bonds of 1905, which give 4⅝ per cent., are most attractive, because they have a long currency, and the 4½ per cent. issue ranks next, giving a return of almost 4¾ per cent. Russian bonds have lost some of the cheerfulness which has distinguished them recently, consequent upon a greater recognition of the continued unsettled state of the country and the uncertainty attaching to the future.

HOME RAILS FAIRLY CHEERFUL—EFFECT OF THE WHITE STAR DECISIONS—SOUTH WESTERNS DEFERRED BOUGHT BY INVESTORS—A DEMAND FOR DIDCOT, NEWBURY AND SOUTHAMPTON SHARES—NORTH WESTERNS SOLD—A NERVOUSNESS OVERDONE—THE LOSS "AN INFINITESIMAL DROP IN THE BUCKET"—FORTHCOMING DIVIDEND DATES.

Interest in the Home Railway market during the last few days has centred upon the news—to which I briefly referred a week ago—that the White Star Line had decided to transfer its Wednesday service of boats from Liverpool to Southampton. This decision of the White Star has caused no surprise to those who have been aware of the way in which Germany has been competing with us during the last few years for American traffic. In some quarters an idea prevailed that the step was due to grievances harboured against the Liverpool dock authorities, but we have it direct from the White Star officials themselves that the change has been decided upon solely in order to meet the growing demand of travellers that facilities should be provided to enable them to embark and disembark at either a Continental or a British port. The leading German steamship Companies have long recognised the desirability of meeting this demand, and their New York steamers have been calling at both a British and a French port, and there is no doubt that they have thereby been materially assisted in competing with other lines for first-class passenger business. Obviously the news is a strong "Bull" point, for the South-Western Railway will gain not only from this increased traffic over its line, but from the enlargement in the receipts at the docks of which it is the owner. As already outlined, the new departure involves four liners, and the arrangement is to come into force in June. In shipping circles the belief is entertained that before long the Cunard will follow this example of the White Star; indeed, it is understood that the Cunard Directors have for some time been considering the question of when they shall avail themselves of the facilities offered by the Channel ports. Under the circumstances, I am not surprised that there has been a strong demand for South-Western Deferred on behalf of people who are willing to ignore the indifferent dividend outlook as regards the past half-year in favour of the future possibilities promised by the rising fortunes of Southampton. There was last week some profit-taking by those insiders who heard of the White Star's decision a week or two before the news became public property, and this sent the price back from 55½ to below 54. The reaction, however, will probably be only temporary. For similar reasons to those affecting South-Westerns there has lately been an inquiry for the Preference and Ordinary shares of the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway. This little line, which was originally intended to run from Didcot to Southampton, stopped short at Winchester, but in 1891 a short line was opened connecting it with the South-Western Railway at Shawford. By means of this junction the railway serves as a link, enabling the various Northern lines to run into Southampton, and, therefore, its traffics are bound to grow with the expansion of business at the port. The capital of the Didcot-Newbury line, including Debentures and loans, is not quite one and a half millions. Debenture interest is now being met, but interest on the £138,000 of loan capital is only being partly paid. The railway from Didcot to Newbury is worked by the Great Western. At present, with only a single track, the Great Western takes 60 per cent. of the receipts, but on a double tracking being completed the terms are to be reduced to between 51½ and 52½ per cent. of the receipts. Those fond of taking long views might regard the Company's shares as likely to meet with their requirements. There is, of course, a very limited market in them; the present prices are about 26s. for the Preference and 15s. for the Ordinary. Both are of the denomination of £10, and are fully paid. The White Star's action appears to have caused a good deal of alarm in Liverpool, and has led to some selling of North-Westerns. It does not need my own assurance that this nervousness, so far as the Brum is concerned, is uncalled for, seeing that we have it on the authority of one of the Directors that the loss, so far as his railway is concerned, is "an infinitesimal drop in the bucket." The South-Western, in fact, stands to gain far more than the North-Western is likely to lose by the altered shipping arrangement. The former has a monopoly of the railway service to Southampton, and is the owner of the docks; there is no monopoly of the railway traffic to Liverpool, which is shared by several lines, and the dock and railway interests are quite distinct. As regards the Home Railway Market generally, the tendency continues fairly cheerful. The forthcoming dividends have so far aroused the speculative spirit in only a very slight degree, but there has been a moderate investment demand, stimulated doubtless by the release of the January interest payments on Consols and other stocks. Lancashire and Yorkshire and North Staffordshire, it is interesting to observe, continue to creep upwards, and there is not much "give" about York Deferred or Hulls, in spite of their recent substantial advance. The first of the dividends—that of the Metropolitans—should be known by the time these lines reach my readers. Other Companies have announced the dates of their declarations as follows: January 18, Great Eastern; January 21, South-Eastern and Chatham (Joint Committee's statement); January 23, Brighton and Great Central. Appended is my usual table of quotations:—

AMERICANS IRREGULAR—DEALINGS MAINLY PROFESSIONAL—READINGS PROMINENT—MONEY OUTLOOK UNCERTAIN—RECORD "CLEARINGS."

The movements in Americans during the past week were not very violent nor significant. As usual both the English and the American publics left the market alone, their reason being that the whole game is in the hands of a small group of New York financiers, and that they are not permitted to obtain any inkling of the movements of the game. Business during the week was irregular, and the feeling very much unsettled, although some improvement occurred towards the close. Dealings, as I have implied, were mostly of a professional character, and "Bear" tactics alternated with pool manipulation, which was strikingly manifest in Readings. Perhaps the best feature was that on all weak spots there was substantial absorption of stock. A cable states that the leading adverse influences were first the high rates for call money, and the investigation into the Harriman administration; then the litigation against the Great Northern Company's new stock issue, and the suit to annul the merger of the Gould roads; lastly, the announcement made by the Pennsylvania Company, and fears that other large systems would also seek to increase their capital issues. Some decreases in earnings, especially in net, also did not escape attention. On the "Bull" side the stimulating factors were the postponement of the return of the Government deposits, and towards the end of the week the improvement in the market for call money, and the better monetary situation abroad. The strength of the Copper and Steel groups was the feature in the Industrial department, and contributed to the general confident feeling in an ultimate improvement. The money market outlook is still considered uncertain, and this is believed to be the chief reason of the indifference of the public, who are guided by the advice of commission houses to exercise caution in stock operations. My table is appended:—

It is a satisfaction to know that, despite a small falling off in December clearings, as compared with those of the same month a year ago—the first falling off from the preceding year shown for over two years past—the total clearings at all cities in the United States broke all records, and set up new standards of financial measurement which dwarfed all previously existing. The aggregate clearings at ninety-six cities for the calendar year, 1906, as reported to Bradstreet's, totalled $158,823,847,914, a gain over 1905 of 10.9 per cent., and to this extent were the greatest clearings ever reported. Of this vast total New York City contributed $104,675,828,656, a gain of 11.5 per cent. over 1905; while at ninety-five cities outside of New York the total was $54,148,019,258, a gain of 10 per cent. over the preceding year. As bearing upon the monthly figures it may be noted that those for December, while 5 per cent. larger than those of November, fell off 1.2 per cent. from December a year ago, this being due to a decrease of 4.7 per cent. at New York, because the clearings outside of the metropolis gained 6 per cent. over 1905. As bearing upon these figures also, it might be added that, except in January, August, and May, when stock speculation was active—during the latter at declining prices—the year was one of repression in security dealings. Stock sales, it is true, were larger by 7 per cent., but bond dealings were smaller by 33 per cent. than in 1905. Grain speculation also was at no time very active, being very dull in the latter part of the year, though cotton was dealt in heavily. Land speculation early and mining-share speculation later helped to enlarge clearings, but it is probably safe to say that New York clear-

Canadian and Foreign Railways—Canadian Earnings—Mexicans—Argentines Prominent.

By way of a change, the Grand Trunk market has this week received an agreeable shock. Operators looked for a gross increase of £10,000 or thereabouts, and instead they have got £29,294, which is not a bad start for the first week of the New Year. This increase follows upon £6,778 up for the corresponding period of 1906, and makes a good start for the New Year. It is impossible, of course, to gauge the values of this total in relation to the possibilities of the current year, but at least the start is a very good one, and with Canada in a condition of extreme prosperity there is every reason for concluding that we shall have a further succession of good figures this year, on top of the increases of 1906. It seems to me that Grand Trunk Junior stocks will make admirable lock-up investments, in view of the prospects, and the prior-charge issues down to the Second Preference stock inclusive can be relied upon to return your capital with a very respectable profit upon it. On the subject of Canadian Pacifics, there is little that is fresh to say. The shares are well favoured from this as well as from the other side of the Atlantic, and they keep round about 199-200, at which I think they are not dear. Earnings remain on a large scale, and although the figures do not look so striking, owing to the big increase of a year ago, they are still progressive, and reflect the prosperity of the country and the Company. I look for higher prices for "Canadas." My table will be found below:—

Foreign Railways have presented next to no feature. Mexican Railways have been helped to some extent by a good traffic, but the response has been insignificant, and on balance the changes are small. Argentine Railway issues may be recommended to the attention of investors for the good yield which they give, coupled with good security. Below will be found a table of investments in this class which can be recommended:—

West Africans Stagnant — Zinc Corporations — Mount Lyell Position — Great Cobars — Mount Morgan Profits—Sensational Siberian Slump.

The West African mining market remains as stagnant as ever, and is utterly devoid of the remotest semblance of interest. This state of affairs has now become virtually chronic, and I am more convinced than ever that nothing short of an earthquake, metaphorically speaking, would stimulate any rehabilitation of the market in general esteem, let alone reduced railway charges, which have recently been made the pretext for the marking up of prices here and there. As regards the Broken Hill group, they still absorb a large degree of speculative interest, and at the moment Zinc Corporation shares are most prominent. Before long this concern ought to be operating on a commercial scale. The enlargement of the No. 1 plant has been completed, and within a few days will be regularly working up to its full capacity of between 12,000 and 15,000 tons monthly. By March next the No. 2 plant, which has a capacity of 15,000 tons per month, capable of being enlarged to 30,000 tons, will also be working, and is to be noted that the Company is to acquire large smelting works at Swansea. The purchase and option over tailings from the mines of the group cover 2,000,000 tons, carrying between 17-22 per cent. zinc, 7-10 per cent. lead, and 5-8 oz. silver per ton, while the future output, estimated at an additional 2,200,000 tons, has also been contracted for. When operations are in full swing, the profit-earning possibilities of the venture are considered bright. The boom in copper shares shows no signs of abatement. Mount Lyells have gained exceptional prominence on the strength of satisfactory development reports to the effect that ore of high grade has been located at the 850 ft. level. This is calculated to add materially to the value of the property, but apart from this it is believed that with copper at the existing level the mine is earning profits at the rate of £750,000 per annum. Another prominent Australian share is the Great Cobar, on rumours of an impending first dividend payment, and I may mention that the rise in these was hinted at in this column some weeks ago. Mount Morgans are coming in for greater attention, on the knowledge that the third copper smelter is to begin operations within a week or two. It is being calculated that with copper at the present price the profits, including those from gold, will be at the rate of something like £600,000 per annum, which on a capital of £1,000,000 would permit of quarterly dividends of 2s. 6d. per share, as against 9d. now being paid. The market, too, professes to believe that an enhanced dividend will be paid in respect of the next quarter. A feature of the utmost importance is the sensational slump in Siberian Mining shares, and more especially Proprietarys, Orsks, and Iroitzks. This is the result of clever "Bear" manœuvring, based principally upon the statements that the titles are defective. The Board have promptly vindicated the reliability of the titles so far as they are able. The fact of the matter is that conditions in Russia generally are not conducive to confidence, and, in addition, the gamble has been obviously spectacular, intrinsic merit being unknown and consequently ignored. But even so, it would be hazardous to predict the end of the movement in view of the determined efforts of the insiders. I have received particulars of the Providence Mine, a tin property situated in the parish of Uny Lelant, near St. Ives, Cornwall, which has recently been acquired by the Tasmanian Exploration Company, Ltd. It is claimed that this is one of the most promising of the unworked mines in Cornwall. It was worked continuously, on the cost-book system, from 1838 to 1877, and the original shareholders, who subscribed the sum of £11,569 8s. 1d., received in dividends no less than £110,000, or about 1,000 per cent. Ore to the value of £600,000 was produced, with black tin at less than £57 per ton (it is now about £120 per ton), and the mine was only closed down when black tin fell to £40, and it could not be extracted at a profit. There are known to be rich lodes in the mine at a comparatively shallow depth, and the Tasmanian Exploration

Company has begun to clear and unwater the workings, after which it is believed that with the aid of modern machinery the property can be made to yield substantial profits. Here is my usual table:—

KAFFIRS BUOYANT—STILL ADVANCING—RECORD GOLD OUTPUT—NEARLY £25,000,000 FOR 1906—CHEERFUL OUTLOOK—RAND MINING RETURNS.

The Kaffir revival has made further progress this week, and there is every appearance that the improvement is not a mere flash in the pan. While the uncertainty as to the monetary situation has to some extent acted as a drag on business in other sections of the House, South Africans have been very active, and prices exhibit a considerable advance on those ruling a week ago. The surprising and serious break in Siberians on Friday and Saturday temporarily checked the forward movement in Kaffirs, but a spirited recovery occurred in the Street after official hours on the last-mentioned day, when the leading shares, including Rand Mines, East Rands, Gold Fields, Modders, and many others were in demand, and closed at the highest prices touched since the present improvement began. Nineteen-day accounts are not usually held in very high esteem by members of the Stock Exchange, as they have the reputation of exerting a depressing influence on business, but the settlement which began on December 29 and concludes on the 16th inst., must be regarded as an exception to the general rule, at least as far as Kaffirs are concerned, for during the whole of the Account South African Mining shares were active, there being a big Home and Continental demand, the effect of which may be seen in the numerous substantial advances shown in last Friday's making-up prices—advances ranging from 2¾ down to ¼. Practically all the active shares in the long Kaffir list shared in the revival, and there is every prospect that the movements will continue in favour of holders for some time to come. Already a very large business has been done for the new account, and the record Transvaal gold output for December has not only been received with satisfaction in interested circles, but has had a stimulating effect on the market, which accepts the figures as an assurance that the Rand Mining industry is flourishing and progressing. The total output for last month amounted to 550,167 oz., of the value of £2,336,961, being an increase of 16,794 oz. in weight and £71,336 in value as compared with the month of November, constituting a record of 9,558 oz. over the previous highest output. In December, 1905, the output was 431,594 oz., of the total value of £1,833,295, or more than half a million sterling below the value of last month's return. That, of course, is a great stride forward considering the difficulties under which the industry has struggled as a result of the insufficiency of the unskilled labour supply, and it is clear that every effort is being made to utilise the material at the disposal of the mine managers to the best advantage. For the whole of 1906 the value of the Transvaal gold output amounted to the enormous sum of £24,579,987, being an increase, compared with the year 1905, when the total was £20,802,074, of £3,777,913. Since the carry-over there has been a further appreciation in Kaffir share values, Rand Mines being 7½, East Rands 5 3-16, Gold Fields 4 15-16, and Modders 7¼, while others show proportionate gains. De Beers have led the Diamond division, being now 26⅛, Jagersfontein are 10 9-16, and New Vaal Rivers are 6¼. Premiers, after their recent soar, have dropped to 13⅜, but Reginas, after making-up at 1 and falling to ¾, are once more in the ascendant, being about 1⅜. Some time ago these shares touched 1⅜, and purchasers at that price who had to carry over at 1 or sell at ¾ must have felt very sick indeed. The Regina Syndicate is prospecting a mine that was years ago proved unprofitable, and until there is something tangible put before them investors would do well to give the shares a wide berth. The news from the New Vaal River property continues to be most encouraging. Some fine stones have been picked up in the course of digging operations, and in places the rich gravel wash has been tested to a depth of 15 ft. It is expected that the waterworks will be completed in a few weeks, and that in about a month the public will have access to the new diggings. I append the usual table of prices:—

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

RHODESIANS LIVENING UP—CHARTERED POSSIBILITIES—BANKET MOVEMENT PREDICTED.

Any sustained movement in the Kaffir market sooner or later "overflows" into Rhodesians, because of the natural affinity between the two, and it would now seem that the latter are going to receive considerably more attention than has been the case recently. Already there is substantial buying of Chartered, which is generally regarded as being of a "good and knowing" character, and this is not without some significance. Chartered, I may emphasise, are purely a gambling counter, and are likely to remain so for many years to come, but at the same time it must be understood that the country is now progressing in a distinctly promising fashion, which is a very important consideration in relation to the shares. The Company may or may not ultimately justify its founders' hopes to the full, but this apart, the annual report, which will put in its appearance within a few weeks, ought to make a more satisfactory showing than we have grown accustomed to. To anticipate the passing of the era of deficit would be altogether too sanguine, but a better financial position is highly probable. Not only has the gold production industry made appreciable headway, but in other respects, agricultural and mineral, the country has progressed, and then there are also the ultimate potentialities of the diamondiferous discoveries to consider as well as the fillip to progress generally which ought to follow the completion of the railway project throughout Rhodesia. It is generally considered, too, that we are on the eve of another "firework" display in the Banket group. This strikes me as being highly probable. The Eldorado mine is opening up promisingly, and regarded as a gamble pure and simple I consider Bankets rather attractive at the relatively low price ruling. As to Tanganyikas, the shares seem to have gravelled, for the time being at all events, and with the sentiment generally cheerful a gradual advance appears probable. Here is my usual table:—

WESTRALIANS FAIRLY ACTIVE—HORSESHOE DEVELOPMENTS—KALGURLIS LESS BUOYANT—DEEP LEAD ITEMS.

Although the Westralian Mining Market is not exactly bristling with features of exceptional interest it nevertheless continues to receive quite a fair amount of attention. This is principally of a professional character, it must be allowed, but perhaps there will be a broadening out of business as confidence is engendered. In point of interest Horseshoes are most conspicuous because of the encouraging developments recorded in depth. At the No. 15 level a well-defined lode has been located, giving an assay value of 13 dwts. per ton over a width of 16 feet. This is considered promising, and has induced some of the customary support from Paris with the result that the shares have advanced substantially. On the basis of the past quarterly dividends these shares would give a fairly good return, but I am inclined to believe that by waiting a little the prospective purchaser would be able to "get in" on much better terms. After the sustained strength recently observable Kalgurlis are inclined to dribble away to a rather lower level, though this is not very marked. This may be ascribed to profit-taking on the recent steady advance rather than any untoward developments, and having regard to the general position of the property and the prospects it does not seem likely that this process will make further progress. Oroyas continue somewhat sensitive to the knowledge that the mine is virtually at the end of its tether as a high-grade proposition. Of course, its existence will be prolonged as a low-grade mine, and there are the interests acquired in the Oroya Black Range to be reckoned with, but, nevertheless, a reduced dividend seems inevitable before long. As regards deep lead decriptions, a large stream of liquidation has been in progress to depress prices. When this comes to an end the big interests are credited with the intention of creating more activity on the strength of the results achieved by the Loddon Valley. It is now announced that altogether 20 fathoms of wash have been taken from the side of the lead, averaging 48s. per fathom, which, though not so good as the initial results, is nevertheless considered "very satisfactory." With expenses at 32s. per fathom a good profit is thus shown, and richer stuff is looked for in deeper ground which will be entered a few weeks hence. Here is my usual table:—

INSURANCE NOTES—THE BEGINNINGS OF LIFE ASSURANCE—SECURITY INVOLVES PROFIT—PROFESSIONAL AND COMMERCIAL CONTROL—NEW POLICIES OF AMERICAN LIFE OFFICES.

Life Assurance, as becomes a complicated matter of great importance, has been of very slow growth. For practical purposes real life assurance, as we know it to-day, was started by the old Equitable Society in the latter part of the eighteenth century. The Royal Exchange and the London Assurance Corporation were previously doing life assurance of a sort and strenuously resisted the formation of the old Equitable; but it was the Equitable, the first of the mutual life offices, which taught life assurance to the world. It originated the idea of mutuality—the notion that by association the financial uncertainties to which we are all subject, owing to the time of death of each individual being unknown, could be converted into financial certainty by association in a life office. The old Equitable, founded and continued ever since on a mutual basis, revealed the fact that uncertainty could be converted into certainty without paying excessive amounts to shareholders. This conception of mutuality has now become universal. In olden times there were three classes of life assurance Companies—mutual, mixed, and proprietary. The mutual offices consisted solely of the assured. The proprietary Companies issued nothing but non-profit policies, and gave the assured fixed benefits in return for fixed premiums, which was a very expensive arrangement for the policy-holders. Proprietary offices in this sense have now disappeared and what we now call proprietary Companies correspond to the mixed offices of former times. The affairs of these Companies are mainly in the control of the shareholders, but the greater part of the profits, usually nine-tenths, are distributed among the policy-holders, the remaining one-tenth being paid to the proprietors.

The old Equitable not only introduced the mutual principle into life assurance, but it practically founded the whole theory of the subject, which in later times has been extended and established on the soundest possible basis by the labours of British actuaries, especially as represented by the Institute and by the Faculty of Actuaries. In comparatively recent times much valuable work has been done by Continental and American actuaries, but the English Institute and the Scottish Faculty are the recognised pioneers, and are still looked up to as the leading actuarial associations of the world. Speaking generally, British life assurance Companies have applied actual theory to practise more efficiently than the Companies of any other country, and the best foreign offices owe their present condition to a great extent to the example of British Companies. In many most important ways the superlatively strong position of English and Scottish offices is due to their freedom from legislative interference. The result of this freedom has been to bring about a healthy competition between the Companies, which has produced in a conspicuous degree two features which, in life assurance alone among financial institutions, inevitably accompany one another. These two features are security and profitableness. In all other financial institutions which I can call to mind, great security means small profits and vice versâ, but in life assurance the greatest security is of necessity a cause of the largest amount of profit. A life office is most secure when it holds reserves sufficient to meet its liabilities if interest is earned at a very low rate, when it assumes that mortality will happen at a heavier rate than is likely to be experienced, and when expenses are provided for at a higher rate than is likely to be incurred. The differences between assumptions and experience constitute not merely security of a nature unequalled by other institutions, but a degree of profit which increases with the margin provided for security.

These fundamental virtues of life assurance have had their origin and their principal development among English and Scottish life offices, but in order to translate this excellent theory into practice, and in order to give people the benefits which result from this theory, it is necessary to embody the notions of the actuary in popular and attractive policies. In this respect we have a great deal to learn from some of the American and Colonial Companies. In the United Kingdom the actuary is supreme in a life office and only too frequently is tied and bound by custom and hopelessly out of touch with the needs of the people. The agency manager, the branch manager, and the agent, appeal in vain for the issue of policies which will really meet the needs of would-be policy-holders. There are a few exceptions, but for the most part the British actuary has no knowledge of outside work, no conception of what the public really need, and a profound belief in the sufficiency of his own limited ideas of what people ought to want.

The Americans have very conspicuously broken away from these notions. They have made the business-getter supreme, and have relegated the actuary to a back seat; in doing this they have gone too far, and with disastrous consequences, as the events of the last year have proved. There is, however, a happy mean between the professional Britisher and the commercial American; this is to be found in the co-operation of the actuary and the business manager, too seldom seen in British Companies, and only recently adopted to any adequate extent by the great American life offices. It seems to me that this conciliation of professionalism and commercialism is at its best in the new policies introduced this year by the Mutual of New York, the New York Life, and I suppose, though I do not know, by the Equitable of the United States. I have seen specimen policies of the Mutual and of the New York Life, and, frankly, in regard to their conditions and their guarantees they are superior to any British policies with which I am acquainted. In technical language, there are no "conditions" at all. The wording is: "This policy is free of conditions as to residence, occupation, travel, habits of life, and manner, time, or place of death. No permit or extra premium will be required for military, or naval service in time of war or in time of peace. This policy shall be incontestable except for non-payment of premiums from its date." This is real assurance. You have only to pay the premium and you are sure of the benefits.

The policies further embody specific guarantees for every year of policy duration as to the amount that can be borrowed, the cash surrender value, the paid-up insurance that can be obtained on surrender, and the length of time for which the policy can be kept in force for its full amount without payment of further premiums. There are other valuable features in connection with the policy prior to its becoming a claim, but for the moment I must pass these by in order to describe the methods of settlement which are offered and specifically tabulated in the policies. A policyholder may, of course, take the sum assured in cash. If he wishes he may be paid by any fixed number of annual instalments varying from two to twenty-five; for instance, if assured for £1,000, he can have two payments of £507 each, or ten payments of £113 each, or twenty payments of £65 each, or twenty-five payments of £56 each. These are conditions which one or two British offices are ready to comply with.

Another method of settlement is offered and tabulated in detail in the policy, and is a plan which seems to me of superlatively great importance. The policy may be settled by the payment of what are called "continuous instalments." The number of these annual instalments is in no case less than twenty-five, but if the beneficiary survives the assured by more than twenty-five years, these annual instalments are continued at their full rate for the entire lifetime of the beneficiary. For instance, if a man dies leaving a beneficiary aged thirty-five, annual payments of £45—supposing the policy to be for £1,000—are paid during the entire lifetime of the beneficiary, however long he or she may live but in no case can the number of these annual payments be less than twenty-five, or £1,125 in all. This last feature, and indeed all the other features of these new American policies, seem to me of the very greatest value, and cannot fail to appeal to every business man as being precisely the conditions which ought to appear in a life assurance contract, and which offer the greatest advantages both to policy-holders during their own lifetime and to the survivors entitled to receive the benefits of the assurance. I am not here expressing any opinion as to the probable future bonuses on these policies; I am simply dealing with the form of the contract, which I regard as being superior to any that have hitherto appeared.

"TRUTH" LETTER BOX.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

Wellington.—Brazilian Four per Cent. Recission bonds make a sound investment, and the course of values should be higher. Canada.—1. The firm has a good reputation. 2. I look for a material advance in Irish Land stock within the next few months. Inter Nos.—The stock was incorrectly described; the reference was to the 4½ per cent. issue of 1905.

RAILWAYS.

J. S. C., Holloway.—Put the money into Canadian Pacific Preference, Grank Trunk First Preference, and Brighton Preferred. Nemo.—You are entitled to the dividend. Sardonyx.—I should suggest North Westerns and Canadian Pacifics. Naval Medico.—I suggest that you buy some Great Central 1894 Preference stock.

MINES.

Blackpudlian.—1. The two concerns have no connection with one another. I have not a high opinion of the prospects of the old company. 2. A very doubtful gamble. 3. I should sell out and put the proceeds into a copper property, or something with a semblance of life in it. 4. There is no information available as to the present condition of the company. 5. I should not buy. 6-7. Both are reliable, I understand. Alex.—The high grade ore of the Oroya Brownhill mine is nearing depletion, and big dividends will not be possible much longer. But as a low grade proposition the shares of the mine are worth considering, especially at the present price. J. F. T.—All three shares constitute an excellent speculation. G. C. G.—Probably for the current year. H. W. H.—Buy Arizona Coppers. Bramble.—1. Hold on to Mount Lyells. 2. Lace Diamonds might be kept for a further improvement in South Africans. Cambridge.—1. I regard Goldfields Ordinary as a good purchase to put away for a little time. 2. Mount Yagahongs should give you a profit within another two or three months. 3. I do not know anything at all about the gentleman. C. M. W.—1. I should not have dealings with the concern. 2. All the shares are good, provided you can afford to hold on to them for a bit. North Kerry.—1. The shares make a fair speculative investment. 2. Hold on for the present. 3. I have no information about the company. 4. If you have a decent profit, take it. J. H. H., Reading.—Simmer and Jack shares are all right, but your other holdings are distinctly speculative. S. G.—1. It would hardly be wise to make the exchange. 2. Do not buy. 3. Arizona Coppers and Anacondas. Largs.—The shares are worth buying as a speculation.

MIXED SECURITIES.

B. A.—1. Take your profit, and if you see a chance of getting in at a lower level do so. 2. I know of no reliable paper at the price you name. 3. I should hold. Major.—For the yield desired your selection of shares is as good as could be obtained. Jabez.—1. I have no information, and cannot advise you. 2. Optionally redeemable. 3. I should be rather inclined to buy Kaffirs than sell them just now. Septima.—1. Coronations are a reasonably promising speculation. 2. An option on Anacondas should turn out profitably. 3. A wild cat, which you would be well advised to leave alone. 4. I do not recommend the agency. 5. The shares are unattractive. 6-7. I have no information. Investor, Leeds.—All three stocks are worth purchasing. Kors, Sligo.—You might buy Siberian Mines, Orsks, and Coats. Spartan.—Spread the money over B.A. Western Ordinary stock, B.A. Pacifics, Brighton Deferred, and Lyons. Exile.—Place the money in Rand Water Stock, Johannesburg Fours, and Great Western Ordinary. Perseus.—1. All three investments are worth making now. 2. I understand that the people are reliable. Palermo.—1. Hold on to Brazilian Fives. 2. You would be well advised to consider before long the desirability of exchanging into the Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, as the Sixes are pretty certain to be redeemed this year. 3. A well managed industrial, whose shares are worth holding. 4. Excellent of their class. 5. Deal with an inside broker.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Will.—I cannot recommend a lawyer for the purpose, and, any way, I am afraid you would have no case, because the transactions were essentially of a gambling nature. Bitten.—I regret that I do not know the man's present whereabouts, and, any way, I fear you would have no case against him, because your transactions with him were essentially of a gambling nature. G. H., Balham.—Cancel your application and demand the return of the sum forwarded. J. J. S.—I do not know the gentleman, but am certain that he is of no account in relation to Hudson's Bay shares. Tectona.—The concern is reliable, I understand. The paper is all right. W. H. C.—All could be improved upon as investments. Leave the touts alone. E. Coleman.—I have dealt with Martin Bull's methods more than once. J. F. P.—Not altogether unattractive. Van.—1. No, they do not participate. 2. A fair purchase, in view of the metal outlook. 3. Impossible to say. Aigburth.—You might hold. Waterside, Londonderry.—I regret my inability to advise you. The concern is not mentioned in any of the usual works of reference. O. and R. Railway.—Many thanks for the enclosures. Ceylon.—Fairly desirable, but I have no reason for anticipating a rise. R. N. Agaskar.—You would be well advised to leave the concern alone. They charge exorbitantly for the bonds, which are procurable through any of the Credit Lyonnais agencies. The booklet is frankly an exaggeration of everything. Donata.—Of those named I would prefer Apollinaris and Bovril. As regards British Electric Tractions, a higher dividend is predicted. Nestor.—As you have quite a decent profit, why not take it? It is always the safest plan. Oliver Cromwell.—1. Somewhat uncertain in view of the change in tactics. Wait a little longer. 2. Not a safe investment. 3. Very attractive, in view of recent achievements. Sceptic.—You would be well advised to ignore the pretensions of the concern. Wight.—Hold for a possible recovery. Hovis Breads are a fairly desirable commercial investment. Petroleum.—Your query is a trifle too comprehensive. Scottish Widows and Edinburgh Life, Royal, and the Royal Exchange. Fez.—Fairly attractive. Alamo.—1. I do not consider J. R. Roberts' Ordinary in the least attractive. The preference interest is in arrears. 2. You might ignore the motor shares. 3. A bucket-shop, with which you ought not to do business. Humbers or Daimlers might suit you, but do not put all your eggs into one basket. J. Bevan.—If you are nervous better sell out at once. Which.—1. Do not average. You may see the price if dividend is up to expectation. 2. The brewery share is not unattractive. 3. Better left alone. First Try.—Neither are in the least desirable. The higher interest offered is incompatible with security. The other is a bucket-shop. In both cases the literature is carefully designed to attract the uninitiated. J. A. B.—Yes. Hardy.—Unreliable, and ought to be avoided. B. Horsfall.—The amount involved is so small that it is not worth while troubling about it. Sell out and end the matter. Plodder.—Hearts of Oak. In regard to the liability your views are accurate. Castle Douglas.—Armstrong's, Vicker's, and Fairfield Shipbuilding are all attractive. Nobody ever hurt themselves by taking a respectable profit, but many people have suffered by holding on too long. You ought to digest this. P. L., Ballina.—Do not permit yourself to be led astray by the exaggerated bucket-shop circulars. Of those named Argylls appear to be the most attractive. Bardell.—Both Fine Spinners and Sewing Cottons might be held a little longer. D. H. Evans and Charing Cross Electricity make fair investments. A resumption of dividends on United Alkali Ordinary is expected. Dune.—I am afraid you have no redress. Perplexed.—If you spread the sum over the trust stocks named it would be a good idea. You are liable for the call, and if you do not meet it forfeit the shares. Ernesto.—A payment of some part of the arrears on Linotype Preference shares is not improbable in respect of the current year. St. George.—The syndicate charge an excessive price for the bonds, which are procurable elsewhere.

INDUSTRIALS FAVOURED — BAYS — ANGLO "A" GAMBLE—TELEGRAPH YIELDS — TEXTILES PROMINENT — WESTINGHOUSE CAPITAL SCHEME—DRASTIC MEASURE—NITRATES—GRAMOPHONES.

Although the process may be slow, it is nevertheless satisfactory to observe a gradual broadening out of business in the Industrial market. This may be regarded as a promising augury, and it would seem to imply that the encouraging character of the recent trade figures and the prospects of a still greater revival throughout the country is serving to engender confidence. Everything considered, there is no apparent reason why this market should not loom considerably larger in the public eye, because of the significance of the factors alluded to, and I am still of opinion that Industrials collectively afford promising opportunities for the profitable employment of money. As regards Hudson's Bays, the shares have quickly recovered after the recent decline following the land sales statement. This is in accordance with the views I expressed here, and I am still convinced that the clique who have been so prominently connected with the steady upward movement in "Bays" have not forsaken them entirely, but are waiting more propitious conditions for a resumption of the movement. At the same time, it is worth while emphasising that the shares are now nothing better than a rich man's gamble. As the dividend season approaches, the gamble in Anglo "A" seems to gain momentum. The insiders profess to be very sanguine as to the possibilities of the stock. Whether such expectation will be realised to the letter is problematical, and for my own part I am still of the opinion that at anything like the existing quotation Anglo "A" is a somewhat wild gamble, and consequently unattractive. An enhanced distribution, as I have said before, is quite possible, but whether it will be large enough to justify the prevailing high price, or anything like it, is doubtful. For those readers who have a predilection towards Telegraph stock, which as a group make very good commercial investments, I have prepared the following table indicating the approximate yield they give:

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Anglo-American Pfd.	110	£5 10 0
Direct Spanish	3¼	5 10 0
Do. Pfce.	9½	5 5 0
Direct U.S. Cable	16	5 12 6
Eastern Extension	13½	5 1 0
Great Northern	37	6 5 0
Indo-European	59	5 8 0
Western	14	5 0 0

Owing to the knowledge that the industry continues very prosperous, Textile shares are receiving considerable attention, and this is reflected in a generally high range of prices. Upon any temporary decline they would seem to be not unattractive, regarded as speculative holdings, especially such things as Fine Spinners and English Sewing Cottons. Iron and Steel descriptions remain very much in the background, despite the encouraging advices concerning the activity and general prosperity of the industry and the satisfactory prospect. I adhere to the opinion that as a group the shares are worthy of more consideration, and shares which strike me as being desirable as a holding are Armstrong Whitworths, Vickers Maxims, Cammell Lairds, John Brown, Babcock and Wilcox, amongst many others. At this juncture it seems opportune to refer to the reconstruction proposals of the British Westinghouse Company, an offshoot of the famous American concern with a similar name. Its career has been anything but brilliant, and a crisis has been anticipated for some time past. The trading profits for the past year reached £7,630 in comparison with £113,409, and there is a net deficit of £87,535, against a loss of £18,200, thus bringing the total debit balance up to as much as £102,900. The root of the evil seems to be that orders have been accepted at unremunerative prices for advertisement purposes. The capital reduction scheme, as could only be expected, is somewhat drastic, the Ordinary shares being cut down from £10 to £5 each, and the Preference from £5 to £3. The £1,375,000 thus written off will be applied to reducing the value of goodwill and patents, and in providing for further development expenditure, as well as extinguishing the suspense account and the debit balance. As a sort of compensation for the loss of capital, it is proposed to increase the dividend to which the Preference shares are entitled to 10 per cent. from 6 per cent., and the Ordinary from 6 per cent. to 12 per cent., prior to the distribution of any surplus between the two classes in the proportions now existing. The following table indicates the yield obtainable upon Nitrate shares, which have been gradually subsiding after their recent boomlet:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Anglo-Chilian Nitrate and Railway Pfce.	13½	£7 8 0
Colorado	16½	12 0 0
Lagunas	4½	6 0 0
Lautaro	12½	6 5 0
London	10	8 10 0
New Paccha	2¾	10 17 6
Salon del Carmen	15½	11 0 0
Santa Rita	13¾	6 5 0

A share which is coming in for considerable attention is Gramophone and Typewriter. This concern has been enjoying exceptional prosperity, and as a high-yielding Industrial it does not seem altogether unattractive, though it is as well to point out that the business is one that depends largely upon public favour. I have more than once mentioned Rio de Janeiro Flour Mills Ordinary shares, and it is, therefore, interesting to refer to the report, which indicates a maintenance of profit, and, as a high-yielding commercial investment—the return is about 8¼—they seem to be deserving of consideration.

QUEER STORY.

THE OTHER WOMAN.

SOPHY CRUTTWORTH was distracted between the claims of love and duty. Love was represented by the Hon. Charles Dashbord, a handsome subaltern of Grenadiers and a younger son; Duty, by the Right Hon. the Earl of Carshalton, an elderly and said-to-be-reformed roué, with a castle in the Shires, a house in Grosvenor-square, and an annual rent roll of £60,000.

But Sophy was a sensible and well-brought-up girl, thoroughly instructed in that most important item of the social catechism—your duty towards yourself. And it was not likely that she would prove false to her own high principles at this crisis of her life.

It cost her, indeed, a pang or two. But, courageously regardless of that, she stood firm to the right, and resolutely did her duty—towards number one. In a word, she accepted the Right Hon. the Earl of Carshalton.

But the path of duty (though it may be, as the poet sings, "the road to glory") is by no means always the road to immediate popularity, and Sophy's engagement to the elderly Earl was made the occasion for much spiteful and ill-natured comment about her among her friends—behind her back, that is; to her face, of course, they said the nicest and most congratulatory things imaginable.

The only exception was the Hon. Charles Dashbord, who said nothing at all about Sophy behind her back, but to her face made little effort to conceal his annoyance and ill-temper. In fact—to put it frankly—he was even rather rude in his remarks to the future Countess of Carshalton.

Sophy, however, did not take his rudeness at all amiss. On the contrary, she rather liked it—as indicative of the young man's devotion to herself. If he had not loved her, he would not have been so angry and upset.

She lost no time in soothing, or trying to soothe, his wounded feelings.

"My dear Charlie, you are quite mistaken in supposing that I do not love you. I do care for you very much. That is, indeed, one of my reasons for marrying Lord Carshalton."

"A curious way of showing your love for me, I must say—to marry another man, and a shocking old bad egg at that," retorted Charles, sarcastically.

"Well, you see, in the first place, I could not possibly have married you, Charlie——"

"Why not?" he interjected.

"It was out of the question—on financial grounds," she answered, candidly.

"I don't see that. I'm not rich, I know. But then, I'm not absolutely a pauper, either. I have £1,200 a year."

"Twelve hundred a year!"

And Sophy threw up her hands expressively. "Why, my dear boy, that would hardly pay my furrier's bill."

"Oh, if you think that a sable coat or a chinchilla muff are of more worth to you than my love——"

"Don't be absurd, Charlie. I prize your love beyond everything, and I hope that I shall always retain it——"

"Psha!" he interposed, impatiently. "How can you retain my love when you are the wife of another?"

"Oh, Charlie, how naïf you are! And you a man of the world. You positively astonish me."

"I do not see anything so very astonishing in what I have said. Even men of the world think twice about making love to other fellows' wives."

"Ah, yes. If there is anything—anything wrong in their love," replied Sophy, demurely. "But there is nothing of that sort in my love for you. I care for you deeply—very deeply—but it is with the purest, the most spiritual affection——"

"This is nonsense," he ejaculated, irritably. "Don't believe in that sort of thing. Never did. In my opinion, there's no middle course between merely liking people as friends and loving them as lovers. I know that's my case, anyhow. When I love, I'm what they call a whole-hogger. With me it's got to be all, or nothing."

"Charlie, you are a very foolish and absurd boy. Don't you know that we live in a world, and an age, of compromise? Everything is compromise nowadays, from religion downwards——"

"I say, don't you think we'd better leave religion out of the discussion," struck in her lover, rather brutally.

Sophy flushed, and appeared to be, as perhaps she felt, deeply hurt and offended.

"Oh, if you are going to be insulting," she retorted, holding her pretty head very high, "I have no more to say to you. Let us consider everything at an end between us."

But this was too much for poor lovesick Charles. He at once changed his tone and became abject.

"Oh, come, Soph. I didn't mean that. I—I can't give you up altogether. Only I'm so infernally miserable about your engagement, don't you know, that I hardly knew what I was saying. Don't be too hard on a fellow, Soph. You will forgive me, and make it up again, won't you?"

Sophy gradually relented and allowed him to take her hand.

"I'll forgive you, Charlie, if only you'll be sensible," she answered. "I told you just now that I was marrying Lord Carshalton simply because I wished to retain your love. You see, I must marry somebody, and somebody rich. Circumstances make that imperative. And so I have singled out his lordship, not merely because he is rich, but even more because he is elderly and unprepossessing—just the man to whom I could never possibly lose my heart—just the man who could never, by the wildest stretch of imagination, become your rival in my affections—just the man of whom, you foolish boy, you need never feel in the least jealous. Now don't you understand, Charlie, or must I dot the 'i's' and cross the 't's' still more plainly?" she murmured, plaintively.

Charles Dashbord tugged at his long moustaches in expressive silence. This frank confession was very flattering to himself, no doubt, and also very soothing to his wounded love—but it was rather a startler, all the same, even to a young man of his easy-going ethics.

True, Sophy had energetically disclaimed the least hint or intention of anything wrong; and no doubt, at the moment of speaking, her disclaimer was perfectly genuine. But Charles Dashbord had sufficient experience of the world to know how these innocent attachments of young married women for lovers more youthful and attractive than their husbands generally end. And though he said nothing, he thought the more.

"You see how it is; and you will accept the situation, won't you, Charlie, dear?" she inquired, smiling sweetly at him and holding out her hand.

He took it and kissed it.

"If you must marry that old wretch, I suppose you must," he said; "and yes, Sophy, I accept the situation."

Then he kissed her on the lips, she gently protesting. The protest, such as it was, was merely make-believe. Perhaps it was scarcely worth while going through the form of it. But then, you see, it looks better to affect some slight coyness in these cases.

The above interview took place in a secluded corner of the conservatory at Mrs. Johann Randstein's New Year's Day dance at 300, Park-lane. And it nearly had unfortunate consequences, inasmuch as Charles had scarcely done kissing Sophy before Lord Carshalton himself appeared and claimed the hand of his bride-elect for a quadrille. He nodded carelessly to Dashbord as he offered his arm to Sophy, who rose and took it, making an expressive little moué at Charles behind his lordship's back as she sailed away in her elderly fiancé's company.

"Nice fellow, that young Dashbord, I think," remarked the Earl, who evidently suspected nothing.

"Ye-e-s. Not much in him, though," replied Sophy, with well-acted indifference.

And then she began to talk of other matters.

But how lucky, she thought to herself, that the Earl had not appeared on the scene in the conservatory two minutes sooner. If he had seen Charlie kissing her, it might have caused awkward complications, and she had no wish for any complications to arise—not, at least, until she had safely annexed his lordship in marriage. Then, of course, it would not matter so much.

The marriage duly took place at St. George's, Hanover-square, with great éclat, and Sophy became Countess of Carshalton. Her position was now, of course, one of influence and affluence, and, for awhile, she enjoyed all the advantages of her new life thoroughly. She saw a great deal of Charles Dashbord—more, perhaps, than was quite discreet. Indeed, had the Earl been a jealous or exacting husband, he most certainly would have become suspicious, and would probably have interfered. But, as it was, so far from betraying either jealousy or suspicion, he was always most civil to the young man when they met, seeming rather to encourage his visits than otherwise.

At first Sophy was glad of this, and congratulated herself upon the Earl's being so unsuspicious and easy-going. But before very long circumstances came to her notice which revealed his lordship's behaviour in a very different light.

Among the domestic staff of the establishment was a girl named Ethel Jenkins, daughter of Mrs. Jenkins, the housekeeper, who nominally acted as her mother's assistant in the clerical and account-keeping duties of her office, but who, in fact, spent most of her time in the more agreeable pursuit of her own amusement.

This Ethel was a pretty girl and in manners and breeding somewhat above her station. But, at whiles, she gave herself airs to which Sophy took considerable exception. And that exception was, you may be sure, not diminished when the new Countess discovered the true inwardness of the girl's behaviour.

The fact was that that incorrigible old Lothario, the Earl, appeared to have been taking a good deal too much notice of the young woman, and to have been flirting with her outrageously, under his wife's very nose.

Then, at length, Sophy saw why her husband had been so accommodatingly blind to her affair with Charlie, and why he had encouraged the young man's visits. He wanted her to be continually occupied with her admirer, in order that he might be the more free to pursue his flirtation with that minx, Ethel Jenkins.

Her resentment flamed high. She invaded the Earl's smoking-room (where he sat reading the Pink 'Un after breakfast, that morning) in a white heat of wrath, and charged him to his face with the infamous and degrading behaviour.

His lordship, hardened old sinner that he was, didn't seem to be in the least ashamed of himself, but took the matter quite coolly, and made no attempt to deny the imputation. Indeed, it was evident that he was even rather surprised to learn that his wife had only now discovered the truth.

"What?" he exclaimed, "this is news to you, then? I was quite under the impression, my dear Sophy, that you were all along aware of my regard for Ethel——"

"A likely supposition, indeed. As if, in that case, I should have allowed the minx to remain in the house for a single hour," broke in Sophy, pale with fury and outraged wifeliness.

The Earl looked more than ever surprised at this outburst of passion. For his own part, he never got in a rage; not so much because he was sweet-tempered, as because he thought it too much trouble, as well as bad form, to show strong feeling of any sort.

He shrugged his shoulders slightly, as he replied: "Really, my dear Sophy, I would not put myself out over the affair, in this way, if I were you. Come, now. Do be sensible about it."

"Sensible?"

And Lady Carshalton's look and tone imparted to that single word the equivalent of a whole philippic.

"Yes; sensible," repeated the Earl, with perfect aplomb. "You and I are both people of the world, after all, my dear. And I quite thought it was tacitly understood between us that ours was a marriage of convenience."

"I do not know what you mean," cried her ladyship, angrily.

"Come, come, Sophy. You know very well that you never married me for love, any more than that I married you for that Arcadian, but unpractical, reason——"

"What did you marry me for then?" demanded the incensed Countess.

"Well, since you put it to me point blank," replied the Earl, "it was because I wanted a pretty, well-bred, and attractive woman to preside over my domestic ménage and do the honours of my house, and I may say that I selected you, my dear Sophy, not only because you were quite the prettiest and most attractive among the well-bred girls of my acquaintance, but also because I knew that you were very much attached to young Dashbord, and surmised, therefore, that you would neither expect nor wish from me any tiresome pretence of marital devotion."

"You married me on that account?"

"Yes; why not?" rejoined the old cynic, in his languid, self-possessed way. "I knew that your heart was given to another, whom you could not marry. I knew also that I was in precisely the same position. And, being aware, moreover, what an eminently sensible girl you were, I came to the conclusion that we should suit each other, in the conjugal capacity, down to the ground. I should confer on you wealth and position, which was your desideratum in a husband. You would make an excellent and charming hostess to my friends, which was my desideratum in a wife. Further, you would be quite at liberty to flirt with Dashbord without interference from me; and I should be equally free to flirt with Ethel without interference from you. There, my dear Sophy, is the whole case in a nutshell. Have you anything, as a reasonable and sensible woman, to say against it?"

"It is scandalous! It is infamous!" she cried, passionately, "that you should marry me because you thought I was the sort of woman who would connive at your flirtations—to call them by no worse name ——"

"Tut-tut. It was quid pro quo," interposed the Earl, coolly; "you cannot deny that I have connived, in the most considerate and accommodating manner, at your flirtation with Dashbord."

"That is quite different," exclaimed Sophy, flushing. "My regard for Charles Dashbord is of the most innocent description."

"I accept your assurance on that point most readily," rejoined the Earl. "And I beg you to accept my assurance that my regard for Ethel is, also, of the most innocent description."

"A likely story," cried his wife, sarcastically, with flaming cheeks. "As if you, a married man, would flirt with a girl like that from innocent motives."

"My dear Sophy, you do surprise me," answered the Earl, holding up his white hands in polite astonishment; "I can only suppose that your digestion is out of order, or that you have a chill on your liver. If I were a rude or captious person, I should retort on you by saying: 'As if you, a married woman, would flirt with a young man like that from innocent motives? But as it is ——"

"The cases are not in the least parallel!" cried out her ladyship.

"It seems to me that they are entirely parallel," he answered, coolly; "you married me, meaning still to retain your regard for Dashbord. I married you, meaning still to retain my regard for Ethel. I do not interfere with you. Why the deuce should you want to interfere with me? Excuse me, my dear Sophy, but this is not playing the game, thus to go back on our tacit understanding."

"There has been no such understanding between us, tacit or otherwise," she retorted, indignantly.

"Oh, come, my dear," said the Earl, with an incredulous smile, "you are never going to tell me, as a woman of the world, that you really supposed I was conniving at your flirtation with Dashbord out of pure philanthropy?"

Sophy burst into a storm of angry tears—the woman's invariable refuge when she is defeated in argument.

"You are a wicked, evil-minded old wretch," she cried, "and I hate you—yes, I hate you."

His lordship, hardened by long experience to the ways of women, was not in the least moved by this outburst. He merely shrugged his shoulders, and said:

"If that is so, my dear, it seems to me that you have the less reason to complain of my regard for Ethel. Come now; do be sensible, and——"

But the Countess of Carshalton did not wait to hear the end of the sentence. She flounced out of the room and slammed the door behind her, leaving the Earl upon the hearthrug, still smiling.

Presently he rang the bell.

"Ask Miss Jenkins to come and speak to me," he said to the footman who answered the summons.

In a few minutes the young woman came. She was a good-looking girl, of unusually refined appearance for her position in life, and having the air and manner of one who was accustomed to mix with a society somewhat better than that of the Housekeeper's Room.

And this was, in fact, the case, Lord Carshalton having stood godfather to his faithful old housekeeper's daughter at her baptism, and having made a great pet of her ever since her infancy. In that way, a regard entirely paternal on his side, and entirely filial on hers, had sprung up between them; indeed, at this very moment the Earl was interesting himself, as though he were her guardian, in her forthcoming marriage with a young house agent, and was arranging to make her a comfortable dowry. But before she went, he had required a little service of her.

WEDDING PRESENTS.—A choice selection of beautiful Dinner and Dessert Services, Breakfast, Luncheon, and Tea Sets, exclusive designs. MORTLOCKS, LTD., the Old Pottery Galleries, Oxford-st., and Orchard st., W. Inspection solicited.

What that service was may be inferred from the following conversation that now passed between them.

"My dear child," said the Earl, smiling at her in a fatherly way, "you have played your part so well that matters have reached a satisfactory climax even sooner than I had expected. Lady Carshalton has found out —well, just what we intended she should find out. She will, no doubt, tax you with it. Of course, you will make no attempt to deny the imputation; on the contrary, it will help matters forward if you will appear to glory in it, and vow that you will never, never give me up. Do you see?"

Ethel nodded.

"I would not place myself in so false a position for any one else, godfather," she replied. "But you have been so kind to me, that, as you know, I could not refuse you even this favour."

"And I have been sorry to ask it of you, my dear child," he answered, laying his hand kindly upon her shoulder, while a gleam of genuinely paternal affection shone in his usually cynical eyes; "but there was nothing else to be done. It was the only way."

"If I had been you, godfather, I should simply have forbidden Mr. Dashbord the house," exclaimed the girl, with all the downright directness of nineteen.

His lordship smiled.

"Worse than useless," he said. "It would have made her more set on the fellow than ever. No, my dear child, when your wife comes 'the other man' over you, there's only one sure card to play to bring her to her senses——"

"And what is that?" inquired Ethel.

"'The other woman,'" replied the Right Hon. the Earl of Carshalton.

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH "TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

THE LIST OF THE PRIZE-WINNERS.

ONCE again it is my pleasing duty to sum up the results of the TRUTH Doll and Toy Show and competition, and to award the prizes and thank all the helpers who have so kindly given their services and thus brought about so successful a result—and the result, I am glad to say, has been most exceptionally successful. Not only was the Show in itself more than ordinarily attractive, but I have not this year to express regret that the financial side of it has been disappointing. I could, perhaps, have wished for better results, but when I say that at least a portion of the deficit which we had unfortunately to bring forward from last year has been wiped out, I have every reason for expressing my thanks to our readers. But what is even still more satisfactory, although I have not been able to enlarge as I should have wished the sphere of our operations, I have been able to comply with all the recognised claims that we have had addressed to us. To distribute 30,000 toys is a serious matter, and one that can only be undertaken and carried out if I have the substantial support of my readers. This I have had, and, as a consequence, at least 30,000 children have had a joyous Christmas.

I could have wished that the attendances at the Show had been a little larger. There was unfortunately some falling off in the number of visitors who paid for admission, but no doubt this was due to the fact that the weather was not altogether favourable. Nor did the boxes that were placed in the Albert Hall yield the results that one might have hoped for. But, on the whole, the confidence which I have at all times so unhesitatingly placed in my readers has been fully justified, and we are able to look forward to another Christmas with every feeling of satisfaction and hopefulness.

As last Christmas Day fortunately fell on a Tuesday there was no difficulty in ensuring that all the toys were delivered at the Hospitals and Workhouses in good time for distribution, either on Christmas Day or at such a time as met with the festive arrangements of the different establishments.

And now as to the distribution of the prizes. The editor has been again most kindly assisted by a small committee of ladies, whose expert advice has proved of the utmost value. Special thanks are due to them for the great thoroughness and untiring care they have displayed in the accomplishment of their important duty. The number of prizes, excluding the lady's gold watch, so kindly presented by the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths' Company, Limited, of 112, Regent-street, is this year thirty-nine, in addition to such mementoes of the Show as may be given to the exhibitors who are considered hors concours. But even then it has been found impossible to award a prize in all cases to the competitors included in the judges' award list. As usual, however, the proprietor of TRUTH, besides presenting thirty-nine silver articles for prizes, has also decided once more to distribute a large number of silver brooches, specially designed for the purpose, to serve as what it is hoped will be an interesting souvenir of the recent Show.

Every lady who dressed twelve small TRUTH dolls or one large one will receive one of these brooches; but, in addition to these, brooches have also been given to a number of competitors who dressed dolls or contributed home-made toys to the Show. It may be said, in fact, that in awarding the prizes, special recognition has been made of exceptional industry and originality and ingenuity on the part of the exhibitors. But, as has been stated in this column year after year, it would be unfair to deduce from this that contributions not thus recognised have not been equally welcomed and are not being quite as much appreciated by the children who are now their happy possessors. And the knowledge of this fact is, of course, the source of the satisfaction which is always felt by all who took part in making the recent Show a success. The prize list, it is true, is limited, so far as certain silver trinkets and nicknacks are concerned. But from the real prize list not a single name is absent, for it includes every one who has in any way earned the gratitude of the children, whilst the real prizes are the thanks of those little ones (upwards of thirty thousand of them all told), which have been vociferous enough during the past fortnight to well-nigh reach the ears of those to whose kind co-operation and lavish generosity their enjoyment has been due.

Having thus explained the principle on which the prizes are given, it will now be interesting to print a list in which they are arranged in the order of their cash value. As I have already stated, they are thirty-nine in number. It will be noticed that the whole of the TRUTH prizes are either made of, or mounted with, silver, and it may be added that they vary in value from £6 to 10s. As a rule the articles chosen will be found to be useful as well as ornamental, for it has always been the wish of the editor of this journal that lasting as well as pleasing souvenirs of the TRUTH Shows should be presented to the exhibitors who most distinguish themselves.

Here, then, is the list of the prizes, arranged in the order of their intrinsic value:—

Special Prize—Lady's Gold Watch.
1. Silver Spirit Tots, in case.
2. Silver Box.
3. ,, Mirror.
4. ,, Mirror.

The following are the names of the winners of the prizes:—

Special Prize—Mrs. Stern (700 small dolls).
1. Mrs. Skinner (400 small dolls).
2. Miss Rawson ("Yoko") (240 small dolls).
3. Mrs. Comyns (225 small dolls).
4. Miss E. Lloyd (set piece of 100).
5. Miss Pearson (150 small dolls).
6. Miss E. Oakley (120 small dolls).
7. Miss Finlayson (100 small dolls).
8. Miss Sandbrook (set piece).
9. Miss F. Jacomb Hood (groups).
10. Miss L. Jacomb Hood (groups).
11. Miss Grace Scholefield (set piece).
12. Miss C. Ruffer (17 large dolls).
13. The Misses Beynon (60 small dolls).
14. Miss A. N. Carpenter (60 small dolls).
15. Mrs. Auerbach (50 small dolls).
16. Lady Lange (50 small dolls).
17. The Misses Wood (48 small dolls).
18. Miss Rawson ("Yoko") (6 large dolls).
19. Miss Jacomb Hood (6 large dolls).
20. Miss Plumptre (4 large dolls).
21. Miss F. M. Brendon (set piece).
22. Miss Mitchell Molyneux (30 small dolls).
23. Miss Bailey (set piece).
24. Mrs. F. Byrne (36 small dolls).
25. Miss Nichols (set piece).
26. Miss Foulger (set piece).
27. Miss M. J. Thomas (scrap books).
28. Miss Rawson ("Yoko") (scrap books and 48 knitted dolls).
29. Miss Milne (scrap sheets).
30. Mrs. A. Hall (4 dolls).
31. Mr. Louis Karmel (model engine, etc.).
32. Mrs. Lanham and daughter (one set piece).
33. Miss Effie Dresser (home-made toys).
34. Fraulein von Haesler (large doll).
35. Miss Streatfield's maid (large doll).
36. Miss Connell (scrap books).
37. Miss E. C. Baker (sweets).
38. Miss M. Powell (sweets).
39. Mr. J. Richardson (home-made toys).

Instead of awarding the prizes as numbered specifically to each competitor it is proposed, as far as possible, to let the winners choose articles for themselves in turn from the given list. Thus Mrs. Skinner will have the first choice, Miss Rawson the second, Mrs. Comyns the third, and so on in rotation. It will, of course, be well for prize winners, in writing to the editor, to mention more than one article, so that there may still be some guide to their wishes in case it is impossible to award them the prize they may select in the first instance.

The names of the ladies entitled to TRUTH Brooches, (which will be forwarded on application) are as follows:—

Mrs. Appelby, Mrs. Bentley-Rudd, Mrs. F. M. Brendon, Miss Baughan, Miss M. Baughan, Miss G. Baughan, Miss M. Brooke, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Bond, Mrs. Billigheimer, Miss Benson, Miss N. Bannister, Miss Burgess, Miss Connell, Mrs. M. Cornish, Mrs. E. Corban, Mrs. Cummins, Miss C. Dunstan, Miss Delgado, the Hon. Mrs. Durant, Miss E. Dodsworth, Miss von Diggelen, Miss J. Douglas, Mrs. Falkiner, Miss A. Fenton, Mrs. F. Green, Mrs. J. Greaves, Mrs. Gwinne, the Misses Glave, Miss A. Hurlston, the Misses Horsfall, Mrs. J. Hedingham, Mrs. Humphreys, Mrs. Hargreaves, Miss L. Couch Johns, Nurse Kempster, Miss H. Kleinwort, Miss D. Leaver, Miss B. A. Love, Mrs. Lovet, Miss Lomax, Miss Moulton, Miss A. Mallard, Miss M. Marshall, Miss P. Macdonald, Mrs. W. J. R. Poole, Miss W. Poole, Mrs. Preston, the Misses Pickering, Miss D. Pitt, Mrs. Prochownick, Miss C. Rivington, the friends of Mr. Rogers, Miss A. E. Smith, Miss H. Stevens, Miss Sanders, Miss Strahan, Miss Sandford, Mrs. P. Tennant, Mrs. Tonkin, Miss J. C. Thomson, Miss H. E. Weatherley, Miss J. F. Walker, Mrs. K. C. Wallace, Miss D. G. Watson, Miss A. F. Wilson, Mrs. M. Webb, Miss G. Wood, Miss C. Wetherell, Mrs D. Watson.

In the necessarily hurried writing of the detailed account of the Show which I published on December 26 the occurrence of a few errors in regard to names was almost inevitable. I find that one serious mistake was made in connection with the large doll dressed as a Boulogne Fishwife, and the set piece, "Talking Toys." The former was ascribed to Miss C. Wetherall, and the latter to Miss Grace Scholefield, but they were dressed and sent by Mrs. F. Green, to whom a sincere apology is offered. The minute care bestowed on both deserved more accuracy on the part of the writer of the article, whose admiration of them was very great. By the way, Miss Scholefield (whose name will be seen in the list of prize winners) dressed 36 (not 24) small dolls, arranged in two groups. The second, called "The Days of Our Youth," which was erroneously classified with the home made toys, represented a children's party with a present-laden Christmas-tree, and Santa Claus standing by to distribute the gifts. Miss Sandbrook, who contributed a very successful set piece, was also credited with the dressing of a large doll as Grace Darling. I find, however, that this doll was really dressed by Miss Sanders. The forty-eight dolls credited to "Miss F. L. Wood" were, it appears, dressed by two sisters—Miss Eileen Woods having dressed three dozen, and Miss Kathleen Woods one dozen. Mrs. F. L. Woods, the mother of these young ladies, kindly writes that they hope to do better next Christmas, when they will have more leisure from their studies. Finally, I have to mention that the correct name of the generous donor of sweets (referred to in the article as Mrs. Baker) is Miss Elma Baker.

ART NOTES.

INTERNATIONAL ART INDECENCIES.

ONCE upon a time there was a misguided poet who wrote something to the effect that "Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty: that is all we know and all we need to know." If he had ever had the happiness of going to one of the exhibitions of the International Society he would have discovered that, in painting at any rate, such ideas are hopelessly out-of-date. At the risk of spoiling his metre he would have been compelled to change his lines to "The Hideous is True, Truth hideous; that is all we see and all we want to see." What is more—I judge entirely from certain paintings exhibited at the present show in the New Gallery—Truth is rather unpleasantly minded, with a distinct tendency towards the obscene. Of course, I am ready to frankly admit that it is only an old-fashioned prejudice, but I must confess that, personally, I have a predilection for a picture-show to which I can take my mother without feeling ashamed. And that is just what I should not like to do, so far as more than one of the pictures now at the New Gallery are concerned. For instance, there is a painting, by a distinguished foreign painter, which provides what is no doubt an absolutely correct insight into certain incidents in the lives of the very lowest strata of the demi-monde. It is frankly offensive in its suggestiveness: it is not even offensive in a clean-minded way. I shall be told, I suppose, that a prude like myself could find matter of offence in many of the most famous works by the most famous Old Masters, especially of Teutonic Schools. But this is an altogether different matter. Your old Dutchman was a full-blooded person—the offensive passages in his pictures are merely incidental and without set purpose. He laughed an open, rather coarse laugh; at least, he did not chuckle like a satyr. There is all the difference in the world between a painting of that sort, and one which gloats over the very seamiest incidents of the seamiest side of life. Which is the case with the picture I am now talking about—and not with that one alone.

What a lot of sins against decency the unhappy name of Art is made to cover! Let only a man call himself an artist, and he can produce and exhibit with impunity works of such a nature that, did a foreign bookseller in an obscure street somewhere near Piccadilly Circus deal in them, would probably bring down upon him the attention of the police. He can hang them in the most respectable of picture galleries, and the most respectable of British matrons and maidens will come and look at them there, and be ashamed to blush lest they should be sinning against the canons of High Art. Of course, it is natural enough in a way, just as the excesses of Charles II.'s time were natural enough as a revolt against Puritanism. It is not so very long ago that the British matron professed to be shocked at the very idea of a "nude." Gradually it was impressed upon her that her attitude was Pharisaical and Mrs. Grundyish, and now, by the natural process of evolution, we have come to the exact other extreme, so that the more offensive in whatever way a picture is, so much the more are we expected to admire it. Of course, "internationalism" has helped the process. The average English painter has—or had—certain scruples as to what was permissible, perhaps because he found that the average English picture buyer drew the line somewhere. The pornographic painting is a peculiarly—and peculiar—foreign invention; any one who has attended the Paris Salons regularly knows that for himself. It dates back, I suppose, for its origin, in its present form at any rate, to the French Revolution, though it has travelled a long way since then. Your French painter felt that beauty in a picture represented a sort of discipline. "Voilà!" he cried, "l'ennemi!" So first he made his pictures merely hideous to mark his noble independence. Next he determined, still in his desire to express his defiance of old-fashioned conventions, to choose hideous subjects—murders, absinthe drunkards, the seven deadly sins, and so forth. Finally he arrived at the frankly objectionable, where he now rests rejoicing. Meanwhile the English painter had been told that he was insular, that England was a non-artistic island, that Paris was the one birth-place of the Fine Arts, new style. So, with a lively sense of humility, he proceeded to imitate the Frenchman. He makes his pictures intentionally hideous; he chooses unpleasant subjects; he only stops short of the frankly offensive, for the present, because he is at heart rather a decent-minded individual, but he will get there in time, especially when he sees notable examples thereof hung in the most fashionable picture galleries side by side with his own.

Is it good policy? I don't think so. I do not think that either from the artistic or the business point of view there is much to be said in its favour. You can find many arguments in support of the man who says: "I won't make my pictures 'pretty-pretty;' I will paint the truth as I see it, not caring a jot whether it is beautiful or not, so long as it is true." But when he definitely goes out of his way to make it hideous—when he chooses subjects alike physically and morally offensive—what is there artistic in such a proceeding? While, as to selling his pictures, does he imagine that one British picture buyer out of a thousand is going to purchase and hang up on his dining-room walls paintings that he dare not, for very shame, let his daughters look at? I don't think that even by calling upon the sacred name of Art you could make him do that. I am sure I hope not.

No doubt many very excellent people will regard me as a prude, a Pharisee, and a hypocrite for writing this. They will consider that I have no idea of the true meaning of the word art—they will contend that the artist must not be judged by the ordinary standards—that he must place his art before all else, and that if he believes it can find its truest expression in representing the frankly offensive he is more than justified in so doing. In that case, why prosecute the person who sells indecent literature, or improper picture-postcards? I cannot, for the life of me, see that the difference is anything but one of degree. Again, if he feels called upon to paint such pictures, let him do so by all means—but let him at least refrain from exhibiting them publicly in London galleries. Let him reserve them for the Paris Salon, where he will never have any lack of admirers, and, for all I know, of purchasers. I am not a believer in internationalism in art—so far, at least, as it is avoidable. But even if we find it necessary to take our ideals from abroad—as is, of course, more or less inevitable—that is no reason for becoming purely imitative — imitating the bad as well as the good—subject and technique—disguising our honest British limbs in all sorts of fantastical foreign trappings, assuming foreign leers and grins to mask the natural stolidity of our honest British rosy cheeks. I, for one—and I am not by any means alone in this—prefer my British painter to paint British paintings; and I do very much prefer to look at, say, a painting of a little girl fondling a puppy dog, however cheap and unintellectual its sentiment and execution, to one, however clever, of Parisian cocottes leering over their shoulders at unmentionable old gentlemen. Of course, it is only a matter of taste, and I may be wrong in this preference. But so it is.

It is a peculiarity about the present show at the New Gallery that so many of the paintings give evidence of—if I may say so, in all sincerity—ill-balanced minds. The majority of them, fortunately, are not offensive. But where they are not, quite a large proportion are, nevertheless, frankly "crankish." By which I mean that they have obviously been evolved only by minds whose one aim is to produce something original, something so eccentric as to impress itself upon the mind of the observer in preference to any other works which may be painted from the sane and common-sense point of view. Thus, there is one painting which hangs upon my memory, and in so far certainly effects the painter's purpose. It shows three figures in a field—two of them, a man and a woman, are represented as decent, sober individuals, very nicely dressed, rather prim in their general suggestion. Between them sits a nude woman, in an attitude of deep thought. She is not a dream or a vision, she is a very solid, moderately well-built young person, with nothing classical or ethereal about her. What the purpose of the picture is I do not pretend to understand, but there it is. I suppose, nay, I am sure, that it has some meaning; that the painter has taken his mission quite seriously; the whole is far too solemnly painted for there to be any suggestion of a joke about it. Will the painter sell it? I hope so, for his sake, but I should very much like to know what the purchaser will do with it when he gets it—unless, indeed, he be the president of some Simple Life Society.

Among all these "crank" pictures—not to speak of the offensive ones—there are, I should say, fifty, which appear to be intended as serious works of art. About two dozen strike me as being really worth seeing, and, if I could afford it, buying. Why the others were painted—still more, why they are hung—is, frankly, beyond me. Unless, indeed, a rumour has got about that some new Barnum has arisen who is making a collection of "artistic" freaks. If so, all I can say is, that he will have to sub-edit his collection carefully before he asks his friends to come and see it—unless he wishes his family to apply for a commission de lunatico inquirendo.

MUSIC.

WINTER OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

THANKS to the unexpected gift of the "extra" season of German opera which made a capital start at Covent Garden on Monday, the musical year has opened in an exceptionally auspicious style. It is early yet to speak in detail of the venture which has Herr van Dyck as its capable manager, but all the signs point to a successful season, and one of no ordinary interest from the artistic point of view. The operas which are being given include several, such as "Fidelio," "Der Freischütz," and Smetana's "Die Verkaufte Braut," which have been shamefully neglected in the ordinary way of late in London, while in other respects equal spirit and judgment have been displayed by those behind the undertaking. The performers, conductors, and so on, have necessarily been brought together from all quarters, but adequate rehearsal under competent direction has served to bring about an excellent ensemble, while the promoters seem to have spared no pains in other directions to ensure performances of the highest class and to offer the public good value for their money.

The engagement of Herr Nikisch as one of the conductors was of itself quite a master stroke as a means of giving cachet to the enterprise. Nor is Herr Nikisch the only notable conductor whose services have been engaged. We are also to enjoy the opportunity of gauging M. Ysaye's powers in this unwonted capacity (he has conducted once or twice before in London in the concert-room, but not in opera), and Herr Leopold Reichwein is a still greater stranger, who has already given a favourable taste of his quality. Then in other respects the venture has interesting features. The chorus, for instance, including as it does some twenty students from the Berlin Hochschule, and a contingent from the London German Choral Society (whose conductor, Professor Max Laistner, is one of the chorus directors) has been chosen and trained with an amount of solicitude which it seldom gets in the case of opera in London, while the engagement of the London Symphony Orchestra en bloc is likewise an interesting point about the undertaking. Whether the venture will actually pay is, of course, a matter which cannot be determined in advance. It is quite likely, however, that, regarded as an ordinary commercial transaction, it will not do so, though this is not necessarily to imply that it will thereby have failed to realise the expectations of its promoters.

On the contrary, the present season is admittedly experimental. If, however, the support of the public is sufficiently encouraging to justify a second attempt next year, it is hoped then to reduce expenses in various ways, and by means of a longer season than that contemplated this year to produce better financial results than are anticipated now. Obviously, it is a matter of difficulty to get back the heavy expenses involved in bringing together a large company from the Continent in so short a period as four weeks. It is permissible to hope, too, that in future seasons it may be found possible to employ many more native singers than have been engaged for the present one. There seems no reason, indeed, why in time most of the performers should not be English-speaking, reinforced by just a few imported stars. This, as I recently ventured to point out, would not only encourage native talent, but help materially to reduce expenses. Also it would mean in most cases infinitely more agreeable voices than Germany is usually able to send us, and incidentally might pave the way for the more liberal employment of native artists in the grand season. We have plenty of ambitious singers who would be only too delighted to get up parts especially for a season of this kind, and the services of such might well be utilised. But this is for the future.

As regards Monday's opening performance, it could be heartily praised. "Die Meistersinger" has, no doubt, been sung more brilliantly at Covent Garden before, but for any relative shortcomings in this respect there was compensation in other ways. In particular, the true German atmosphere was secured, as, perhaps, it only can be by a Germany company. Many of the individual performers were excellent also. The Sachs of Herr Feinhals, in particular, was a very sound impersonation. If Herr Kraus is not the ideal Walther, he is hardly the first German tenor to whom the same criticism has been applied. Frln. Bosetti, on the other hand, made a charming Eva, whilst last, but by no means last, the orchestra was first-rate. To the London Symphony players and Herr Leopold Reichwein belonged, indeed, the chief honours of the evening. The reputation of the latter has evidently not belied him. If he hardly eclipsed memories of Richter, he proclaimed himself beyond doubt a master of his craft. For Tuesday, "Tristan und Isolde," under Nikisch, filled the bill; to-day (Wednesday) there is to be a matinée of "Lohengrin," with "Der Freischütz" in the evening, under Nikisch, who will conduct also "Der Fliegende Holländer" to-morrow, repetitions of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan" completing the programme of the opening week.

Concerts began again last week, and a busy time is promised in this respect in the near future. At the Chappell Ballad Concert on Saturday, the presence of M. Maurel and Herr Kreisler, in addition to Miss Marie Tempest, Mr. Ben Davies, and others, served to attract an audience exceptionally large even for the "Ballads." It is certainly a sign of the times when ballad concerts are associated with artists of this order. M. Maurel scored, as usual, in his usual songs. M. de Pachmann gathered his admirers about him on the same afternoon at the Beehstein Hall, and when it is added that his programme was devoted exclusively to Chopin, it is unnecessary to say how rich was their reward. The Broadwood concert, on Thursday, was mainly a Brahms evening—the Harford Quartet being heard in the "Zigeunerweisen" and the first set of the "Liebeslieder Walzer," among other things, while Mr. Leonard Borwick played some piano solos in his usual finished style. Brahms's choral works, of which he left so many exquisite examples, have been sadly neglected in London hitherto, though one need not necessarily go so far as to say, with a recent writer, that he is destined eventually to live by these rather than by his instrumental compositions.

Sir A. C. Mackenzie on "Latest Phases of Music"—the subject of two lectures which he is to deliver at the Royal Institution on the afternoons of Saturday and Saturday week—should be both instructive and entertaining, for Sir Alexander has a pretty wit, which, if he could be induced to give it play on this occasion, would, I am sure, make for the gaiety of his hearers. Some years ago there appeared an amusing drawing in Punch representing a particularly scraggy steed whose owner was trying to dispose of him to a possible purchaser. "He's not without his points, you see," remarked the former, to which the latter replied with withering emphasis, as he scrutinised the animal's unattractive outlines: "Points! He seems made of 'em." In the same way one may say that modern music is certainly not lacking in phases. There is the Strauss phase, the Reger phase, the Debussy phase, the Elgar phase, to name only some of the most conspicuous. Sir Alexander, whether he approaches his subject from the grave or gay standpoint, will doubtless have that worth hearing to say concerning each and all.

A certain amount of comment has been called forth by the recent decision of Messrs. Chappell to adopt the system of fixed net prices in the case of all their publications. One correspondent writes indignantly to complain that for a song which he has hitherto bought for 1s. 4d. he now has to pay 1s. 6d., and others who have had the same experience have doubtless felt equally aggrieved. Messrs. Chappell make, however, a perfectly sound defence. They have resolved in other words to terminate the existing system whereby a song is published nominally at 2s. (or even 4s.) and sold at 1s. 4d., and to substitute instead the system of fixed net prices which has worked so well in the book trade. Everyone knows of the objections and inconveniences associated with the other arrangement, and Messrs. Chappell are to be congratulated on having decided to discontinue it. While in some cases it will mean a slight increase in the price to the public, in other instances—as in the case of vocal scores of popular operas—they will obtain substantial reductions, and in any event there can hardly be any doubt that the new system in the music business, as in the book world, will prove to the benefit of both buyers and sellers in the end. Now that Messrs. Chappell have led the way, other firms will doubtless follow suit.

Signorina Giulia Ravogli's many friends in this country will congratulate her heartily on the announcement of her engagement, and none the less so by reason of the fact that her future husband is an Englishman—to wit, the well-known surgeon, Mr. W. Harrison Cripps, F.R.C.S. Mr. Cripps is senior surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, vice-president of the Pathological Society, and the author of various works on surgical subjects. He is also chairman of the Metropolitan Electric Supply Company. It is some years now since Signorina Ravogli has been heard at Covent Garden, but no one will need reminding of her triumphs there and elsewhere in the past.

Mr. P. Robinson (Rusholme, Manchester) sends me another letter on the subject of Handel's "borrowings" in which he develops further his ingenious theory that what the world at large has been disposed to regard as inexplicable plagiarisms may in reality have been designed as delicate compliments. I have no space for the whole letter, but the following extract will give a notion of the line of argument:—

> The first use of Graun is in "Alexander's Feast" (January, 1736), where Handel has adapted a fugue theme from the "Passion." And where does he use this theme? To illustrate the newer school (divine Cecilia), as opposed to the older school (Timotheus), in which there is generally supposed to be a reference to Carissimi. The words with the Graun-Handel theme are "With nature's mother wit, and arts unknown before." This, again, therefore, looks uncommonly like a compliment to Graun and his admirers; and unless paid openly, by using a known work, it would be pointless.

Unfortunately for this theory, Handel utilised Graun's work not only in this instance, but also elsewhere, notably in the case of "Il Trionfo del Tempo," in which he reproduced, note for note and almost without alteration, two entire choruses of considerable length from the same work. Such attentions on his part are too flattering altogether to be reconciled with the compliment theory—even if it were in the least degree in keeping with Handel's character to deal in subtleties of this kind. The similar "compliments" which he paid to obscure composers long after they were dead, and therefore not in a position to appreciate them, also stands in the way of the acceptance of this rather desperate hypothesis.

It was, by the way, Professor Prout who was the means of bringing to light Handel's depredations in the case of Graun, and this in a curious way. The facts are all set out in Professor Sedley Taylor's interesting volume, "The Indebtedness of Handel," which has lately attracted such attention. It began by the late Rev. J. R. Lunn calling Dr. Prout's attention to the fact that one of Handel's choruses, "Ere to Dust," was substantially identical with one ascribed to Graun in "Latrobe's Collection of Sacred Music." Dr. Prout surmised at once that this was another instance of Handel's pilfering, but to prove it was another matter. Shortly afterwards, however, he was browsing among the Handel MSS. in the Fitzwilliam Library at Cambridge when he came, quite by accident, upon what had till then been regarded as the original drafts for the two choruses in question. With Mr. Lunn's discovery fresh in his mind, Dr. Prout perceived at once that they were not in the form in which they were eventually published by Handel, but in that of the two movements printed as Graun's in the Latrobe collection. Shortly afterwards, looking through a German second-hand music-seller's catalogue, he noticed that it announced for sale an old manuscript score of a "Passion" by Graun which, on being obtained, turned out to be the very work from which Handel had lifted his choruses, and thus placed the matter beyond dispute.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"Sidney Herbert, Lord Herbert of Lea: a Memoir by Lord Stanmore" (1) is certainly in many ways a belated biography, but no less certainly you might say of it, "better late than never." Besides, there are many revelations in it which apply to to-day's, and will apply to to-morrow's British statesmanship as pertinently as they did to our meddle-and-muddle mismanagement of affairs in peace and war fifty years ago. Indeed, I might go farther back and say that an apt motto for this memoir might be found in Burke's description of the statesmanship of his day:—

> Never have the servants of state looked at the whole of your complicated interests in one connected view. They have taken things by bits and scraps, some at one time, some at another, just as they pressed, without any sort of regard to their relations or dependencies. They never had any kind of system right or wrong; but only invented occasionally some miserable tale for the day, in order meanly to sneak out of difficulties into which they had proudly strutted.

To take the business with which Sidney Herbert's name is chiefly associated, and to which his early death is chiefly attributable (since it certainly broke down his strength in his journey and shortened his days)—the Crimean war—many revelations made in this memoir about that big blunder would stand mutatis mutandis for an inner history of the South African war. I wonder, by the way, what Sidney Herbert would have said if he had known that Russell of the Times had given a flattering and patriotic account of the behaviour of our forces in the assault on the Redan in that letter for which the Secretary for War thought he ought to have been lynched.

> I trust the army will lynch the Times correspondent when they read his letter of yesterday. I think it the most scandalous performance I ever read. He brings the most serious and disgraceful accusations against officers and men, who, under circumstances of desperate danger, were risking and laying down their lives.

As a matter of fact, the behaviour of our men at the Redan was put by Russell in the most favourable light possible. Just before taking up this memoir of Sidney Herbert I had laid down the reminiscences of an old Crimean officer, Colonel Robertson, who was heart-broken by the dastardly behaviour of our men at the Redan. Only a handful of men went on the forlorn hope, and these were left unsupported to be slaughtered. "No attempt was made to try a second attack, and the French were left to drive out the Russians single-handed." Next in interest to the disclosure made in these volumes of the inner history of the Crimean war comes the disclosure of the inner history of Gladstone's mind in his frank and affectionate letters to Sidney Herbert. Perhaps the most characteristic passage in these letters is that describing at once the main and the mixed motives inspiring Gladstone's speeches.

> We all believe we shall have to answer before the bar of God for our share in this Crimean war, as much as for any act of our private lives, and I am not able to answer for it on the principles on which it appears to be carried on. I still believe that the question of war is a question of right and wrong, just or unjust; that a great part of strength consists in justice, and that without justice strength is a curse. Now in my speeches I may have mixed up all kinds of follies with these principles, and so far as I have done this I am greatly to blame; but it seems to me that my censurers in the public press and in Parliament, do not admit the principles themselves, but support the war by reasoning of much the same kind as was held conclusive twenty years ago in favour of duelling.

As for the question which chiefly divided, though it failed to estrange Gladstone and Sidney Herbert—the Fortification Loan Bill—"that old common arbitrator, Time," has pronounced decisively in Gladstone's favour. Those fortifications, built at an enormous expense on the plea urged by Sidney Herbert that they would "remain to all time and be useful to many generations," are now seen to be as ludicrously ineffective as the Martello Towers that sentinel our coasts. It is creditable to the magnanimity of Gladstone, and of Sidney Herbert, that this political difference did not embitter their mutual personal relations. There are few more touching things in the memoir than the account Lord Stanmore gives of Gladstone watching from an adjoining house Sidney Herbert as he got into his carriage to be carried home to die, and followed him in a cab to the station to take a last glimpse of his dear old friend on the platform. He wished to see once more his dying friend—unseen himself—as Lady Herbert feared that emotion might precipitate the last few sands in life's glass. Every page of this most interesting memoir testifies to the truth of the epitome of his life as Sidney Herbert summed it up in his last words.

> Well, this is the end. I have had a life of great happiness; a short one, perhaps; but an active one. I have not done all I wished, but I have tried to do my best.

The one fault I have to find with the sweet, simple, old-fashioned, and otherwise altogether delightful "Andrew Goodfellow" (2) is the unnecessary sadness of its close. There was no reason, artistic or other, for the death at Trafalgar of the little lieutenant, except the wanton desire to surprise and harrow the reader by an unlooked-for and tragic close. For the rest, the story keeps the even tenor of its way along the cool sequestered vale of life. The very villainy of the villain—his palming off upon the heroine as his own novels which his sister had written—is the reverse of melodramatic, and though the heroine turns out to be a Duke's daughter, his Grace and the Duchess are as unassuming as the rest of the characters. In a word, Mrs. Watson has written a simple, sweet, and wholesome first novel of much promise. In "The Swimmers" (3) you can hardly see the wood for the trees. The author's own personal experiences of a German boarding-school are convincingly, if tediously, described, but many of the later scenes, described though they also are with a dogged minuteness which sometimes exasperates you, do not strike you as drawn direct from life. Again and again you are reminded of Swift's description of the Scotch: "There are some people who think they sufficiently acquit themselves and entertain their company with relating facts of no consequence, not at all out of the road of such common incidents as happen every day, and this I have observed more frequently among the Scots than any other nation." Yet "The Swimmers" is unquestionably clever, if chaotic. There is nothing commonplace or uneventful, but, I might almost add, nothing strikingly lifelike either, about "Rhoda in Between" (4). If, however, its plot and incidents are far-fetched and melodramatic, your interest in the mystery of the story and in all its baffling windings is continuous and deep. Even Rhoda's fine character is occasionally sacrificed to the exigencies of the plot, since she would never have been so silly as to confirm all suspicions of an intrigue with Murray Randles by consenting to an engagement with that disreputable and repulsive sculptor. Indeed, all Rhoda's relations with Randles are improbable. Nevertheless, the story holds you firmly in its masterful grip from first to last. Speaking as an expert, I can say that the description in "The Millmaster" (5) of life and character (and the book is only a description of life and character in a manufacturing town, for there is next to no plot or story) is true to the very life. I seemed to live my old life of long ago over again as I read it, and to know personally all its scenes and characters. Even those who know nothing of the shrewd, rugged, keen, and kindly race the book describes so graphically ought to be grateful to Mr. Holmes Cautley for such an introduction to them.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

There is now an extraordinary awakening of interest in that strange genius, William Blake, if one may judge from the activity of the publishers. Books about the poet-artist, biographical and critical, reprints of his writings, and reproductions of his drawings, are appearing in considerable numbers. None is more welcome than the new edition of Alexander Gilchrist's classic "Life of William Blake," which Mr. John Lane has issued (price 18s. 6d. net). It has been edited by Mr. W. Graham Robertson, who has judiciously omitted the selections from Blake's writings which Gilchrist incorporated in his biography, but which are now accessible elsewhere. Nearly all the illustrations to this edition are new, including many examples of Blake's art which have not previously been reproduced. Another notable publication is "The Poetical Works of William Blake," edited and annotated by Mr. Edwin J. Ellis (Chatto and Windus, two vols., price 12s. net). It contains the whole of the poems, including the Prophetic Books, and Mr. Ellis's copious notes will be helpful to the student of Blake, though it would be going too far to say that he has succeeded in making clear all the obscurities that baffle the reader.

"The Flight of Marie Antoinette" is a translation from the French of M. G. Lenotre, published by Mr. Heinemann in a volume (price 10s. net) profusely illustrated with portraits of the principal persons engaged in that thrilling episode in the great drama of the Revolution. The story of the escape of the King and Queen, their pursuit, capture, and ignominious return to the Tuileries is related by M. Lenotre with the fullest details, evidently the result of painstaking and minute researches. At times, indeed, the details seem almost too full, but the narrative is, nevertheless, not lacking in vividness of effect, and it is supplemented by interesting biographical sketches of the leading actors in that "pickle-herring tragedy."

Gloomy in the extreme is "The Future of Russia," as predicted in the book of that title—a translation from the German of Dr. Rudolfe Martin—which has been published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. (price 7s. 6d. net). In his view the serious troubles that Russia is already experiencing will be enormously aggravated in the next few months, and the inevitable end will be the bankruptcy of the State. He contends, indeed, that bankruptcy would be unavoidable even without the revolution. Though it may be hoped that Dr. Martin is on this occasion too pessimistic—and the financial statement issued this week suggests that he is—he is able to point to the fact that some of his previous prophecies have been justified by the course of events in the Russian Empire.

An addition has been made to Messrs. Methuen's admirable series of Antiquary's Books by the publication of a volume on "The Domesday Inquest" (price 7s. 6d. net) from the pen of Mr. Adolphus Ballard. He gives a learned yet lucid exposition, not only of the object and methods of the inquisition ordered by William the Conqueror, but of the nature and significance of the mass of statistical and other information embodied in the Domesday Book, whereby so much valuable light is thrown on the economic condition of the country in that age, the various kinds of land tenure, the system of husbandry, and the state of the people. The volume has a number of illustrations from contemporary MSS. and the Bayeux tapestry.

In the Master Etchers' Series Messrs. Newnes have published "Etchings of William Strang, A.R.A." (7s. 6d. net.), a volume containing fifty excellent reproductions of plates by that clever artist. His title to a place among the master etchers is indisputable, and the varied examples of his work chosen for reproduction—including portraits, landscapes, Biblical pictures, and book illustrations—give a good idea of his power and his versatility. Mr. Frank Newbolt contributes to the volume an appreciative introduction.

An experiment in publishing which will be watched with the greatest interest is announced by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, namely, the issue of a number of new novels at the price of half-a-crown net each. The first of the series, "Israel Rank," by Roy Horniman, will be ready this week, and among other novels to be published during the next two or three months are "The Spanish Necklace," by Mrs. B. M. Croker, "The Ghost," by Arnold Bennett, "A Free Solitude," by Mrs. Alice Perrin, "The Obliging Husband," by Frank Barrett, and "Love will Venture In," by Amelia E. Barr. These novels, which have not previously appeared in book form, are of the recognised length of the ordinary six-shilling novel, and the volumes will be of the same quality as regards paper, print, and binding.

Mr. Fisher Unwin is issuing this week a third and popular edition of "The Heart of the Empire," a volume of essays on problems of modern city life by ten young Cambridge men, which attracted much attention when it first appeared in 1901. The writers include Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, Mr. P. W. Wilson, and Mr. G. P. Gooch, who have since become Members of Parliament.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—London, I feel sure, is the nicest place in the world to live in just now. It is warmer than the country, and we have had several sunny days of late. There are several picture shows, and now we have the opera house open again for Wagner and Weber. Curious conjunction! Jim describes it as brandy and milk.

On Saturday, at the Albert Hall, was held the fifteenth annual fête of the Young Helpers' League, established in 1892 by the late Dr. Barnardo, a voluntary union of young people, who, living in happy, comfortable homes themselves, do their best for sick, crippled and ailing children who belong to the needy classes. The League also helps the emigration department. The first president was the late dear and good Princess Mary Adelaide, Duchess of Teck, whose death in 1897 was a sad loss to the League. Our Queen is patron, and the Princess of Wales and Princess Christian are vice-presidents. The Duke of Somerset was in the chair on Saturday, and the Albert Hall was well filled. Mr. Baker, M.A., L.L.B., the hon. director, received a very enthusiastic welcome, his kind face lighting up in response. The boys and girls were very smart and prompt in carrying out the various items of the programme, and, better still, the young faces were all cheery and happy. Mr. Turvey, organist to Dr. Barnardo's Homes, was at the organ, and the Boys' Band of the Stepney Home performed under the conductorship of Mr. Henry Dunkerton, late bandmaster of the Scots Guards.

The Duchess of Somerset was with the Duke, and among others present were the Marchioness of Donegall, Lord Brassey, Lord Kinnaird, Lady Massy, Lady Agnes and Sir Robert Anderson, Canon Fleming, Mrs. Newberry, etc. The choir of 900 voices—the boys in sailor dress, the girls wearing white pinafores over their neat frocks—sang several songs, the most effective being Charles Mackay's "Old Tubal Cain," with anvil accompaniment. Do you know it? Tubal Cain grows low-spirited because the steel blades and other weapons that he turns out are used in war and carnage. So he sits and glooms, but all at once has a happy thought. He jumped up, made up his furnace, and "fashioned the first ploughshare." The children enjoyed the dramatic ring of the old song. Canon Fleming, chairman of the Council of the Young Helpers' League, gave a very clever recitation of Edgar Allen Poe's "The Bells," a fine lesson in elocution and the use of the voice for the youngsters. The small tradesmen of the Homes gave an exhibition of their arts and crafts, including baking, cooking, boot-making, brushmaking, carpentry and joinery, harness-making, mat-making, printing, tailoring, wood-chopping. There were also youthful blacksmiths, tinsmiths, and wheelwrights. What a contrast to the official training which, in one well-known instance, refusing to allow a boy of six to be sent to the Barnardo Homes, turned him out on the world at the age of sixteen with no training whatever but—you would never guess!—that of stocking darning.

The Duchess of Somerset received purses in aid of the funds of the League, and conferred awards, in the shape of badges and silver bars, upon companions and officers who have rendered distinguished service.

In "Sing a Song of Sixpence," four-and-twenty little boys stowed themselves away in an enormous pie dish, in the centre of the arena, and at the appropriate moment they hopped out one by one.

On the evening of the same day, Saturday, there was held at the Hotel Cecil a very pretty fancy dress ball for children in aid of the funds of the League of Mercy, under the immediate patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, Grand President and Lady Grand President of the League. This charming ball was the outcome of the dance organised two years ago by the two youngest vice-presidents of the League, Miss Irene Hentschel and Miss Doris Joel, which was such a success, and was got up for the Strand district. Last Saturday's ball was given by all the various districts joining forces, and was a gigantic success, about a thousand being present, half of them being children in fancy dress. There is every likelihood of its becoming an annual affair. The Hotel Cecil kindly gave the use of their beautiful Grand Victoria and Oak Halls. The cotillon arranged by Mrs. Henry Wordsworth was extremely pretty, the children forming two large rings, and eventually combining in one great ring, from which they danced out of the hall in what looked like an endless string of pretty children.

Prizes were given for the best dresses, and Dora Countess of Chesterfield kindly presented them to the winners, who were Miss Hentschel, as Rainbow, Miss Attwood as Wedding Bells, Baby Woolland as a Fairy, G. C. Ansell as The Last of the Dandies, A. Watson as an Indian, and A. Vickermann as an Incorrigible. Mr. Carl Hentschel looked after the arrangements in his own energetic and indefatigable manner.

Have you ever, when visiting Ireland, seen a field of flax in full bloom on a sunny summer day, when there are gentle breezes? You cannot imagine anything prettier. The stems are about 30 in. high, very light and slender, and are in a soft tone of pale green; on the top of each blooms a delicately petalled flower in a lovely tone of blue, half-way between forget-me-not and cornflower. You can imagine the beauty of this mingling of colours. It always made me think of Jean Ingelow's line, descriptive of a summer day:—

When blue and green are glad together.

The gentle swaying of the stems makes the two colours commingle in an enchanting way, delightful to the eye of the true colourist. The little flower is not of a very robust constitution. The petals soon fall, and then a seed-pod forms which, when given time to do so, produces quantities of what we call linseed ("lhin" is the Celtic name for flax), but when the flax is grown for the manufacture of linen, it is pulled up before the seed has had time to mature. After having been exposed to the air for a few days, the flax is laid in water, and during the fortnight that this process lasts the odious smell with which it fills the offended air is of a remarkably powerful character. The stranger from other lands, when he first perceives it, sniffs interrogatively, just the worst, and yet the most natural, thing he could do. The result is that he immediately protects his olfactory nerves in the best way he can. Some such dialogue as this takes place:

"What on earth is this horrible smell?"

Car-driver: "Shure, it's just the flax fermintin'. It's a powerful smell intirely, but there's no danger in it, glory be to God."

When it is being spread out afterwards on the field to dry, one pities the men and women at work on it, but after an hour or two they get accustomed to it. The soaking makes it easy to separate the straw from the fibre, which is done by bruising it between rollers and then suspending it through an opening in the top of a machine in which a horizontal shaft with wooden blades revolves at the rate of 250 times a minute. Parted from each other for ever are the fibre, flax, and the straw, now tow.

This is the beginning of our beautiful house-linen. Next comes the spinning it into yarn, done in immense mills, and after that the yarn is woven into the fabric itself. Finally comes the bleaching, when the linen is laid out in whole pieces on the green fields to be whitened by rain and sun and wind. These long strips of snowy whiteness on the green turf surprise the stranger. He thinks it some sort of top-dressing spread upon the land to fertilise it.

Belfast is the centre of the linen trade, and of this trade Messrs. Robinson and Cleaver are the hierarchs. They have made the name of Belfast known all over the world. In far west America, in the great Australian cities, and throughout the civilised parts of Africa, people know Belfast by the telegraphic name of the firm, which is "Linen, Belfast."

They give employment, in addition to their hundreds and hundreds of male employees, to great numbers of women, not only in their factory at Banbridge and their Belfast mills, but in the cottage homes of Ulster as well. The beautiful embroideries on table linen, sheets, pillow-slips, and handkerchiefs (I remember telling you of the exquisite embroideries they executed for the Queen of Spain's trousseau last year) are all done by peasant women, and their earnings make "a power of difference," as they would express it, in the comfort and happiness of their lives; that wonderful and inexpressible difference that exists between want and comfort. Hundreds of women of all ages are employed in working button-holes in shirts, cuffs, and collars, that branch alone costing very large sums to the firm.

In 1887 Robinson and Cleaver presented a Jubilee gift of two dozen d'oyleys to Queen Victoria, woven of the finest yarn ever put into a damask loom, and each bearing a woven representation of their splendid premises in Belfast. These d'oyleys in a fine casket were afterwards taken to Windsor Castle with other Jubilee gifts. I am pleased to say that I possess a facsimile of these unique d'oyleys. It lives in my dear tea-basket, and goes with me on all my travels. I remember spilling some tea on it when passing over the Arlberg in a snow-storm last February, but linen is a kindly stuff, and refuses to retain such simple (though unsightly) stains as these.

I thought of all this when sitting at the counter in the firm's palatial premises in Regent-street. As the sale had begun, the counter was thickly and closely fringed with darkly-garbed shoppers, contrasting with the pure white of the linen and damask on the counter. Such bargains, Amy, dear! I should love to show you my newly acquired store of linen sheets and pillow-slips, tablecloths, teacloths, and embroidered bedspreads. I have quite a greedy feeling of pleasure when I look at them. The only alloy is that they will have to be entrusted to the laundry, and before now I have had returned to me, instead of my beloved linen, discoloured and threadbare sheets that were in strong contrast with those they attempted to replace.

I find it a good plan to keep a copy of Robinson and Cleaver's list of necessary household linens pasted up on the inside of the linen-press door, and to keep the supply up to it by replacing at once all that is worn or lost in the wash. The cheap sales afford a good opportunity for doing this.

You will be glad to hear that Herbert sends a very encouraging account of the improvement in his wife's health since they have been at Wiesbaden. He thinks that she has benefited from the change of society and surroundings as much as from the baths. When they wrote to book rooms at the Nassau Hotel they feared that the place would be dull and deserted at this time of year, so that it was quite an agreeable surprise to find there a goodly number of visitors and no lack of amusements. Of course, the season at Wiesbaden really goes on all the year round.

Snapshotters should be a little merciful in choosing their moment, and editors ought to use some discrimination in publishing the result of their efforts. I have seen some cruel libels perpetrated in this way. A week or two since in one of our illustrated papers appeared a snapshot of one of our Royal princesses which, to say the least, it was most uncourtierlike to publish. It amounted, indeed, to a grave discourtesy. The Royal lady's handsome face could in no way be recognised in this picture. Instead of its clear outlines there was a kind of pale Christmas pudding represented. The figure in the picture was that of a dwarf, and one foot, put forward in the act of walking, was twice as large as the original, which is small and neat. Photographs play these tricks sometimes, especially when the person photographed is moving. But where is the editorial eye? Or if it happen to be all it ought to be, where is the editorial acumen? The readers of the paper, seeing such an atrocity as this, would immediately suspect the whole of the rest of the contents of a similar divergence from accuracy. There ought to be a Defence Association against the snapshotter. Nothing is sacred to him, not even the poor mourners at a funeral. The creature is there with his camera or kodak, and never dreams (or does he ever?) of sparing the victims at such a moment.

A clergyman sitting in the stalls of the St. James's Theatre the other evening cried "Hear! hear!" when Hilary Filmer cries, hotly indignant, speaking of the Ridgeley family: "Because they hug themselves with a belief in their own righteousness they are the more pernicious. The class to which these Ridgeleys belong brings everything that's good in the world—virtue, and charity, and religion—into odium and contempt. Its members, individually and collectively, are the pests of humanity." The "Hear! hear!" started by the clergyman went round the stalls, and I almost fear that I joined in. The very sight of such persons as the Ridgeleys, and the world is far too full of them, makes one wish to run to the other extreme and be as unconventional as they are precise and proper. This family, so cleverly sketched by Pinero, and depicted so perfectly on the boards of the St. James's, are the same class that figure in that splendid satire an the medium class in Galsworthy's "A Man of Property," a book that I am reading for the second time though it only came out last spring, I believe.

It was not the first time we had seen the play "His House in Order," and whenever we see it we long for a library like Filmer's. Such a glorious room for such a fearful prig of a man to have, while nice people like us have to be without anything of the kind. What an unjust world, Amy, dear! The lovely subdued glow of red in that room is one of the cleverest things I have seen in decoration. Do you not love colour when it is true and sweet? Minna says that the British are seldom colourists, and that the few gifts we have in that direction are smothered by a kind of puritanic fear of being sensuous. Minna is having her new house all done from designs of her own. The staircase and hall are beautiful, with a dado of golden tan lincrusta, a putty-coloured paper with a creamy pattern on it, and a frieze of soft turquoise with sulphur and tea roses rioting upon it. The woodwork is all creamy enamel, and the carpets are Indian, with deep cream-coloured ground, green borders, and oak and tan-coloured designs. The green border looks lovely with the pale blue frieze and roses, being just the shade of the young rose foliage. The picture moulding has a tiny rail which makes the roses look as if they were on a high terrace.

The wallpapers and friezes in the other rooms are equally lovely. There never was a time when wall-papers were at once so absolutely hideous and so exquisitely lovely.

I have received the following from Mona:—

MY DEAR MADGE,—"I told you so," may be very feminine, but though the cold snap did not last long, I really cannot help reminding you of my prediction that we should have an early winter. It was based, not, of course, on the abundance of berries—for that is due to the ripening of the wood in the previous year—but on the weather in autumn, heavy and continuous rain then being almost invariably followed by early frost. You seem to think that, because Brada and I have taken up gardening as a business, we must now be having a bad time. Naturally, as we have not much glass, very little money is coming in at present, but we never expected it to do so. Spring and autumn are our busiest seasons for plants, while in summer we sell a good many cut flowers. Winter, however mild the weather may be, is not our harvest, but our time of preparation for it, and though snow may stop outdoor work, it has its compensations. In the first place, as seen here, it is wonderfully beautiful—the purest white in the world—and when it glistens in the sunlight on the black branches and boles of the trees, it turns our little home into a veritable fairyland. Even in the depth of winter I would not live in dirty, slushy London when the country is so exquisitely lovely. But that is not all. As the temperature of snow never falls below the freezing point, a good thick covering of it is the best protection that herbaceous perennials can have. That frost helps the gardener by destroying insects, however, I very much doubt. Those that had not accustomed themselves to our climate would long ago have been swept out of existence. Whether by hiding in crevices or rubbish heaps, or burying in the ground, or laying eggs which do not hatch until spring, they have all devised means by which they can carry their race unharmed through an English winter. Some of them, indeed, seem almost indifferent to temperature. The woolly aphis, for example, one of the worst pests of our orchards, has been observed actively at work while the thermometer registered eight or ten degrees of frost. Winter may reduce their numbers, but it does not help us much. We must help ourselves.

But it is only in the warm greenhouse or conservatory that insects cause any real trouble during the winter. Here everything is in their favour—the comparatively high temperature, the close atmosphere, and, unless the cultivation is perfect, the weak condition of the plants. The commonest of them are aphides, horrid little green things, which seem to do nothing but eat and multiply. It has been estimated that, if no check interfered with the rate of increase, the progeny of one aphis would in a single season outnumber the population of China. Fortunately, there are many checks in the form of bad weather, birds and insects which prey upon these pests, and so forth; but they are inoperative under glass, and unless we took precautions our greenhouses would soon contain nothing worth growing. Aphides have their favourite plants, such as Richardias or arum lilies, and cinerarias; but though it has been stated that they do not spread to others in a mixed collection—that they will even prefer starvation to change of food—that certainly is not my experience. At any rate, the safest plan on the first appearance of a greenfly is to vaporise the whole house. The old method of fumigation with tobacco paper has been almost entirely abandoned. It was nasty and evil-smelling, far more troublesome and less effective than vaporisation. All that is now necessary is to pour some liquid into a dish, light a lamp under it, and then leave the house, taking care that all apertures are closed. The best time to vaporise is a still, damp evening. If there is any wind, a certain amount of fresh air is certain to be forced into the house between the flaps of the glass, and this will in some degree neutralise the effects of the vapour. It is very rarely that even the most delicate foliage is injured, and then only if it has been allowed to get damp. If the work is properly done, not a single greenfly will be found alive in the morning, but it may have to be repeated a few days later.

The insects on your vine belong to a different class. They are a species of scale, and the difficulty of getting rid of them is increased by the fact that you have a large number of flowering plants in the same house. First of all, the vines should be pruned. All the side shoots or laterals should be cut back to a single bud, and if the rods have extended as far as space will allow, the leaders should be treated in the same way. If there is more room for their development they may be left rather longer, the number of buds depending on circumstances. Then each rod in turn should be unslung from the wires, and, by rubbing with the hands, all the loose bark should be removed. That done, it should be painted with a strong solution of soft soap in which a little black tobacco has been steeped, a soft brush being used for the purpose, so as not to damage the buds, for it is among the depressions in the spurs that the insects are likely to be found in the greatest numbers. It may also be necessary to paint the wires and the woodwork with the same solution. This will depend upon whether the attack is slight and recent, or whether it is really bad and of long duration. It is safer to do so. Finally, all the loose barks and prunings should be carefully swept up and burnt. If you have any hard-wooded plants, such as camellias and azaleas, in the house, they should be critically examined. If, as it is most likely, scale is also found on them, they should be painted in the same way as the vines, but in their case the solution should be washed off with clean water on the following day.

This is a bad winter for plants in unheated houses. If any of your Richardias should be slightly frozen, hang them upside down so as to keep the leaf stalks quite straight. The mischief is done when the thawing stalk, unable to support the leaf, gets a sharp bend or kink. This is prevented by hanging the plant upside down until it has recovered.—Your affectionate cousin,

MONA.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—The next Bill to deal with the better government of Ireland may leave sentiment out of the question, for we are fast ceasing to be a sentimental people, and coming well into line with the most up-to-date and commercial of nations. Can any one doubt the fact when they learn of the important motor show which was held in Dublin last week, in the buildings and grounds of the Royal Dublin Society at Ball's Bridge? In the very stronghold of the horse, on the spot sacred to that highest of all horse festivals in Ireland—the world-renowned Horse Show! Only think of the want of delicacy of feeling in exhibiting, advertising, and, generally speaking, glorifying this great mechanical rival, on the horse's own ground—his very own for so many triumphant years. Does not the success of the exhibition, too, prove the want of sentimentality, or sensibility, all round? The horse enthusiasts had, however, the great consolation left to them that the motor cannot jump, as yet, nor can it legitimately, or legally, help man in the "killing" amusements so dear to him. Still one wonders what the future will bring; it brings so much and so quickly in these days. How will the horse and the motor hit it off together as time goes on? The motor has a whole world of development before it, and what more can the horse do than he has done and been doing for centuries? When he can develop no further and his usefulness declines will he hark back, as the neglected flowers do, to the original strain? Will he acquire stripes again, and go back into being as a zebra? The world will then, no doubt, be occupied with so many new things that it will not care. Aerial and underground and sea sports, and all sorts of unimagined or unimaginable amusements will have made mere earth pastimes seem uneventful and dull.

The motor exhibition was specially interesting to the ordinary individual, because it encouraged hopes that the motor may soon develop from its exclusiveness and come within reach of moderate incomes. Some day every one will have a motor, as everyone can have—only they do not care for it now—a bicycle. "Where shall we be then?" may well be said, when everyone can go everywhere, and no one need be where they are.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen's visit to Rome was of much interest over here, and showed the wideness of Lady Aberdeen's interests in all things, especially relating to the welfare of our sex. In her own way, she can only be compared for strenuousness with the strenuous President of America. Imagine being a leading member of a World's Federation of Women. Does it not sound immense! What prodigious possibilities such a federation suggests, supposing we were all to take a "long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether." The business of the "season" will soon engage Viceregal attention, and absorb it, too, very completely, for there is to be a great deal of business at Dublin Castle. Society is looking forward to many entertainments, some which are to have the added charm of novelty. The want of variety in amusements is a curious feature in the world that amuses itself; and, more curious still, the want of desire for it, as a rule. Our fickle nature makes us incline more to change over here, though many of us may have the more general taste for treating our amusements as hobbies and riding them with unflagging perseverance year after year.

Mr. and Mrs. Bryce took their departure from the Chief Secretary's Lodge quietly and without any public farewells, but leaving behind them many friends amongst the limited number of those whose acquaintance they had had time to make. Dublin is filling fast; the "Courts" to be held on the last days of the month are expected to be very well attended. Motors bring the capital within easy reach of the neighbouring counties, especially for the enterprising, who, even in this heart of the winter, are courageous enough to do ball-going by motor. Lord and Lady Grenfell with their family have taken up their residence at the Royal Hospital, where they will give many dinners, as well as the big ball at the end of the month. The Lord Chancellor and Lady Walker are established at Pembroke House, near Merrion Square, and will entertain as usual during the season, Lady Walker being a hospitable and charming hostess. Lord and Lady O'Brien have returned from England to their residence, Airfield, at Donnybrook, a few miles distant from Dublin. Some miles further out on the same road is Mount Merrion, where Lord and Lady Pembroke are expected to reside for a little time this year. The house is unimportant, but there is a park with fine views over the Bay of Dublin and the capital itself. Lord Pembroke's property in Dublin and its neighbourhood is very valuable, but the Pembroke family are strangers in the country which gives them such a large income. Does not that sound as if it ought not to be? However, we can all know what other people should, or should not, do, so much better than we know what we ought to do ourselves. Would the world be more perfect, one wonders, supposing everyone was to manage everyone else's affairs?—Yours truly, CLARE.

I have just one nice recipe for you; try this ragout of pheasant à la Française:

Cut a picked and cleansed pheasant into neat joints, sautez the pieces in a stewpan with salad oil, chopped shallot, chopped mushrooms, and a tiny bouquet of herbs; when they have taken a golden colour, dust them with salt, pepper, flour, and pour in a glass of white wine, and sufficient good stock to cover it. When it boils add a blanched veal sweetbread, cut in dice, and the blanched, chopped liver of the bird; cover it closely and let it simmer for two hours. Then remove the grease, dress the pieces of bird on a fried croûte, and pour the sauce over it.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

SUCCESS OF DR. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

The great success of Dr. Alabone's treatment during the last thirty years gives encouragement to the hope that the medical profession may see the folly of continuing the unsatisfactory Sanatoria, and other disastrous experiments, and join heartily in extending Dr. Alabone's treatment, which has been the means of restoring thousands of persons to healthy and useful lives.

Having regard to the voluminous evidence advanced from all quarters in favour of this method of cure, it is not surprising to learn that there are already a large number of medical men who have adopted the treatment in their own practices. This is very gratifying and welcome news.

The following letter is only one of hundreds which afford distinct evidence of the value of this treatment :—

DEAR SIR,—It affords me sincere pleasure to testify to the very marked success of Dr. Alabone's treatment in some undoubted cases of tubercular disease of both lungs.

One lady in particular, whom I sent to London some five years ago to undergo Dr. Alabone's method of cure, is now in perfect health, and is loud in his praise. Before she went under his care she had been pronounced "an utterly hopeless case" by two highly qualified medical men, both possessing an excellent reputation for accurate diagnosis. Personally, I am so impressed with the value of his treatment that if I were pronounced phthisical to-morrow I would at once adopt it, and with full faith as to the result.—Faithfully yours,

F. C. ——, L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S.I.

We would recommend those of our readers who may unfortunately be suffering in Consumption to write to Dr. Alabone for particulars of his treatment, which he has kindly consented to send on application.

Onlooker.—"The kind of work which can make a man smile be he ever so busy, and the novel 'get-up' with mauve pages is as enticing as the advice—N.B.—Buy the book."

Liverpool Courier.—"'Foolish Etiquette' is a characteristically Transatlantic book of characteristically Transatlantic humour. It is described as 'a mirror wherein any fool may find clear, concise, and conclusive reflections on behaviour under all possible and impossible circumstances'—especially impossible. It is, in fact, an extravaganza of polite and sometimes very impolite advice. There is a laugh—often half a dozen—in every page. The humour is whimsical and fresh. The book is got up in a most quaint and attractive way, with a deep heliotrope border, and amusing decorations. Mr. Wallace Goldsmith's humorous artistry is ingenious and successful."

INVESTED FUNDS - - £63,000,000.

THE

Randfontein Estates Gold Mining Co. Witwatersrand, Ltd.

JOHANNESBURG, November 26, 1906.

NOTICE is hereby given that at the forthcoming Annual General Meeting of this Company, to be held at Johannesburg, the Directors will recommend the distribution to Shareholders, in such manner and form as may be determined at the said meeting, of a portion of its capital assets, consisting of certain three hundred thousand (300,000) Shares of the nominal value of £1 sterling each, being a portion of this Company's share holdings in its subsidiaries, on the basis of one Share for every ten (10) Shares of this Company, fractional parts of the distributed Shares being allowed for in cash at par.

It will be further recommended that the distribution be made amongst Shareholders of this Company registered December 31, 1906, and holders of shares not registered in their names are, therefore, invited to lodge same for registration on or before that date, in order to entitle them to participate in the proposed distribution in respect of such shares.

Holders of share warrants to bearer are also notified that they should lodge their warrants:

1. With Messrs. Carrington & Hutton, 30 & 31, St. Swithin's Lane, London, E.C.;

2. With their Paris correspondents, Messrs. Clark & Hattensaur, 46, Rue de Provence, Paris; or

3. At the Head Transfer Office, Robinson Buildings, Johannesburg: from the 2nd to the 15th January, 1907, both days inclusive, for the purpose of having their shares included in the Distribution Lists.

Forms of Lodgment may be had on application at the above offices.

The Lists of Registered Shareholders, and of holders of Share Warrants to Bearer, will in due course be forwarded to the Head Office at Johannesburg, where the distribution will be made if the above proposal is confirmed, and in such case the Certificates for the distributed shares, and cheques for fractions of shares, will be sent out from there.

The date at which the distribution will be made will be subsequently announced by advertisement.

The Transfer Registers will be closed from the 1st to the 7th January, 1907, both days inclusive.

By order,
JAMES H. CROSBY,
Secretary.

MODERN LIFE AND NERVE STRAIN.

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., NAMES A REMEDY FOR THE EVIL.

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., writes:

"It has been said that 'we take our pleasures sadly.' Be that as it may, a large number of people take their pleasures at a rate which is positively alarming. They make a toil of life—dinners, routs, balls follow in quick succession, and the society lady of to-day and the man of the 'smart set' work very hard indeed in the pursuit of pleasure. Narcotics are taken to induce sleep after a round of gaieties, and this practice in itself entails a grave danger, that of taking increasing doses of, say, chloral or other soporific, a habit which can only result in ultimate physical breakdown. How much wiser would be the course of living at a less rapid rate, or at least fortifying the bodily powers day by day by the use of an effective and pleasant restorative! Sanatogen represents such an agent. Its use will tone the body, produce sleep in a natural manner, and render the individual better fitted to sustain fatigue. No lady should be without Sanatogen—a dose taken after dinner and again after the morning meal; or it may be added to tea or cocoa, and thus convert these beverages into veritable tonics. Sanatogen combines two distinct elements, one tonic, and the other nutritive. The tonic element is represented by a compound of phosphorus. It is the glycero-phosphate of sodium, and it represents the substance which actually forms a very important, if not the most important, constituent of our brain and nervous system.

"But Sanatogen also contains a food (casein) derived from fresh cow's milk, which performs the duty of building up the body and of giving to the muscles and other organs their needed nutriment. It is this combination of tonic and restoring properties which places Sanatogen in a unique position among modern preparations for the prevention and cure of disease. Its great merit is that it can be taken under all ordinary circumstances of life. It does not upset the system. Its action is of a thoroughly natural kind. It is easily assimilated.

"We live in an age in which the vital wear and tear are exercised to an intense degree. Competition in all grades of existence grows more severe year by year. We have much more nervous waste than was represented in our forefathers' case, and the strain on the nervous system increases daily. Now it is of no service to prescribe medicine by way of arming ourselves against weakness. Medicine is given to cure disease; it cannot build up the body, or impart strength and vigour. Suppose a preparation is found which—taken whenever the vital powers begin to flag—will restore them in as natural a fashion as if by taking food and drink, such an agent deserves to be welcomed by everybody. Now Sanatogen is truly to be regarded as a preparation of this kind. Let the overworked man give it a fair trial. It will restore his vigour, and, by strengthening him, give him literally a new lease of life.

"A modern danger threatening every class of society is that represented by the tendency to fly to alcoholic stimulants by way of counteracting the weakness and weariness incidental to overwork and fatigue. There can be no greater mistake. The overworked man who takes alcohol is simply spurring and whipping an overtired horse. I strongly advocate the use of Sanatogen as a substitute for alcohol. It will tone up the system in a natural fashion without danger of subsequent depression. A trial of Sanatogen under conditions in which alcohol is ordinarily taken will convince anyone of this fact."

Dr. Andrew Wilson finds many other virtues in this preparation, Sanatogen, and a fuller statement of his views is to be found in his interesting little book, entitled The Art of Living. Every person interested in knowing more about Sanatogen, and its remarkable influence on the health of those who use it, can obtain a copy of the book, free of charge, on writing to the Publishers, F. Williams & Co., 83, Upper Thames-street, London, E.C., and asking for a copy of Dr. Wilson's book mentioned in TRUTH. Sanatogen is sold in packets at 1s. 9d., 2s. 9d., 5s., and 9s. 6d., and can be obtained from any chemist.

OUR PUZZLES.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Building, Carteret street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new Competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,452.

ORIGINAL "LEARICS" ON THE WAR BETWEEN THE "TIMES" AND THE PUBLISHERS.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this Competition is awarded to Leaf Rule, whose "Learic," published in TRUTH of December 12, I print again herewith:

The spirit of Mr. Delane,
On visiting London again,
Would express his disgust
At the Library Trust,
And would think Mr. Hooper insane.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,453.

FIVE INSTANCES FROM ENGLISH HISTORY BETWEEN A.D. 1660 AND THE PRESENT DAY IN WHICH DISTINGUISHED PEERS HAVE TRANSMITTED THEIR ABILITIES TO THEIR ELDEST SONS; ALSO FIVE INSTANCES IN WHICH SUCH ABILITIES HAVE BEEN TRANSMITTED BY DISTINGUISHED PEERS TO THEIR YOUNGER SONS.

Competitors in the above (for which, it will be remembered, a special Prize of Four Guineas was offered) are to be congratulated on the diligence of their research into the pages of English History.

I have had the greatest difficulty in adjudicating upon the lists sent in; but, on the whole, I have decided that those of KODON and OX SHORT are the best. The special Prize of Four Guineas will, therefore, be divided equally between those two Competitors.

KODON'S and OX SHORT'S lists were printed in TRUTH of December 19 last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,454.

COUPLETS IN RHYMED VERSE, SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS CARDS TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, THE KAISER, AND THE SULTAN OF TURKEY.

The four best sets of couplets sent in for this Competition are, in my opinion, so equal in merit that I cannot distinguish between them. I refer to those of JEAN QUI RIT, EBORACUM, TONY and THERSITES.

The Prize of Two Guineas is, therefore, divided equally between these four Competitors, whose verses were printed in TRUTH of December 26 last.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,460.

I remember seeing in some paper, now a good many years ago, an amusing farcical poem illustrative of the strange irregularities observable in the formation of the past tenses of English verbs. I don't remember the whole poem, and it would be too long to quote, in extenso, if I did. The following verse, however, will sufficiently indicate its general character:

The kiss he was dying to steal then he stole,
At the feet he was dying to kneel then he knole
And he said I feel better than ever I fole.

Now it strikes me that an interesting Puzzle may be got out of this idea by inviting Competitors to write short poems, of a farcical character, on similar lines; and therefore, this week, I am offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas for:

THE BEST SET OF NOT MORE THAN TWELVE RHYMED LINES, IN WHICH THE VAGARIES OF ENGLISH VERBS SHALL BE DEALT WITH ACCORDING TO THE EXAMPLE QUOTED ABOVE.

The lines may be in any recognised metre, subject to the condition that every line must rhyme with at least one other line in the poem.

It is not essential that they should be topical. But, if they can be made so, why all the better.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor should send in more than one set of twelve, or less, lines.

(ii) All sets of lines must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, January 28, 1907, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BRADLEY.—Your letter was duly received, and your name and address—as you will, doubtless, have seen—were published in last week's TRUTH. The Prize cheques are sent out periodically, and yours will reach you in due course.

BLOOMFIELD.—See reply to Bradley above.

ZUMERZET.—The misprint in your parody—for which many apologies—did not escape the editorial eye, and will be duly allowed for in the adjudication.

FOG.—Many thanks for your kindness in asking me to credit the Toy Fund with your share of Prize No. 1,442 (4s.), on behalf of yourself and your wife. I much appreciate your complimentary remarks.

TREBOR NITRAM.—I congratulate you on your excellent rebus. Unfortunately, however, it does not constitute a postal address, as required.

DANDY LION.—Your nom-de-plume duly noted.

COLLEGE ROAD.—I have complied with your request.

ASTER AND ACONITE.—Many thanks for your good wishes and kind remarks.

NEMO.—I think your obliging suggestion may be worth considering.

BELINSKA, ETWALL, DULLARD, EBORACUM, BEGINNER, THE PREBEND, DICK MAISCH, KODON, DAVY.—I regret to find that the rebuses sent in by these Competitors for Puzzle No. 1,457 cannot be set without special type, as they all contain letters inside other letters. I fear, therefore, that they must be disqualified by the conditions of the Competition.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen left Sandringham for the season on Monday, and they are now staying for a week or ten days at Windsor Castle, after which the Court will not be again in residence at Windsor until Ascot race week. On leaving Windsor the King is coming up to Buckingham Palace, and he will stay in town until his departure for Biarritz early in March. His Majesty is not expected to return to Sandringham until late in the autumn, but the Queen is going back next week, and it is rumoured that her Majesty will be accompanied by the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife and their daughters. The Queen will come to town on Monday, February 11, for the meeting of Parliament, the two Courts, and other public engagements.

Their Majesties drove from Sandringham on Thursday afternoon to Holkham, the seat of Lord Leicester, where they stayed for over an hour. Holkham is a stately and well-arranged Palladian house, with a Corinthian portico, which was built from designs by Kent towards the close of the reign of George II. The principal rooms are very handsome, and the house contains a splendid gallery of pictures (including some of the best Claudes in existence), besides choice collections of ancient marbles and old drawings, and one of the finest libraries in England, which is rich in rare books, missals, and illuminated MSS. The park at Holkham, which is perfectly flat, comprises 3,200 acres, of which 1,000 acres are old woods. The lake is a mile long. The gardens and grounds are well laid out. Holkham, which is quite near the sea, is one of the best sporting estates in Great Britain, the pheasant, partridge, and wild-fowl shooting all being quite first rate.

The last circle of their Majesties' guests at Sandringham for the present winter consisted of Princess Louise and the Duke of Argyll, Lord Stanley and Lady Alice Stanley, Prince Arthur of Connaught, Lord and Lady Savile, Sir Charles Hardinge, Sir Allen Young, Bishop Taylor Smith (the Chaplain-General), Sir George Higginson, Sir Thomas Lipton, and Mr. Montagu Guest. There was pheasant shooting on two days last week, and partridge driving on one day, when, however, the King was out only in the morning. The Prince of Wales now has quite a large shoot of his own, apart from the King's estates, as H.R.H. has rented the extensive Hillington preserves, between Sandringham and Lynn, from Sir William Ffolkes.

Last year the ceremonial at the opening of Parliament was considerably curtailed in consequence of the Court mourning; the Queen was absent in Denmark, while the Prince and Princess of Wales were away in India. On February 12 there will be a full State ceremonial throughout, with an elaborate procession from Buckingham Palace to Westminster and back. The Queen is to accompany the King in the State coach, and the Prince and Princess of Wales and all the other members of the Royal family who are in England will be present in the House of Lords to meet their Majesties.

Full-dress Parliamentary dinners will be given on Monday, February 11, by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Lord Ripon, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Londonderry, and Mr. Balfour. Lady Lansdowne will probably have a reception on that night at Lansdowne House.

The King and Queen will receive the Corps Diplomatique at the Court which is to be held at Buckingham Palace on Friday, February 22, so all the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission will attend, accompanied by their wives, secretaries, and Attachés. It is expected that there will be a large number of presentations from the Diplomatic Circle at the first Court.

The King was to have paid a visit during the winter to Lord and Lady Lansdowne at Bowood Park, Wiltshire. I understand that this visit has been postponed until next summer, when it will probably be a "week-end" affair, and his Majesty will be accompanied to Bowood by the Queen.

It has been settled that the Prince and Princess of Wales are to be the guests of Sir Lewis and Lady Beaumont at the Admiralty House, Mount Wise, when they visit Devonport next month to open the Keyham Extension Works. It was understood that the Prince and Princess would stay at Mount Edgcumbe, but it is probable that Lord and Lady Mount Edgcumbe will be in the South of Europe when the ceremony takes place on Thursday, February 21.

On that day, the Prince and Princess are to drive from the Admiralty House to the Royal William Victualling Yard, where they embark on board the Admiralty yacht Vivid, on which a hurricane deck is now being constructed for the occasion. The Vivid will steam up the Hamoaze and enter the tidal basin, whence she will pass through the lock entrance into the closed basin. The Prince of Wales is to lay a memorial stone, after which he will declare the works to be open. The order of the ceremonial will not be finally settled until after the return of Lord Tweedmouth from the Mediterranean.

It is probable that the coffin of King George of Hanover, which was deposited in the Royal vault at Windsor in June, 1878, will be removed shortly to Gmunden, in order that it may be placed next to that of Queen Marie in the new Guelph mausoleum in the Duke of Cumberland's park. If a reconciliation takes place between the Court of Berlin and the Duke of Cumberland it is quite likely that the coffins of King George and Queen Marie may ultimately be transferred to the old burial-place of the Royal family of Hanover at Herrenhausen.

Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein returned last week to Berlin after a three weeks' visit to Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge. Prince Albert is the ultimate heir to the titles and estates of his cousin, the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein-Augustenburg, brother of the German Empress. The Duke, who is married to the only daughter of Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (grand-daughter of the King of the Belgians), has no children. This dukedom is endowed with a perpetual pension of about 300,000 marks a year, payable by the Prussian Government.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen return this week to Ireland and take up their residence at Dublin Castle for the "season," which begins next week. In consequence of the alterations in the Viceregal Court ceremonials, many changes have been necessary at the Castle in the State apartments. The household officials have also been kept very busy with the new arrangements consequent on the changed ceremonials. This late departure at Dublin Castle, where tradition was so long held unchangeable as the law of the Medes and Persians, has caused quite a flutter in Irish society. Dublin Castle turned progressive may well invite the alarmist exclamation of the ascendency party, "What next!"

The Chief Secretary's (Mr. Bryce) return to Ireland was unexpected. Were he to attend the Viceregal ceremonials next week the duty would devolve on him of bearing aloft the sword of state in the Viceregal processions. This pantomimic-looking weapon in its dressy scabbard is as heavy in hand and difficult to manage as the Government of which it is the symbol. When the Chief Secretary is not present on State occasions the sword of state is carried by the Under-Secretary. Sir Antony MacDonnell is an adept in wielding this formidable weapon, because of late years the Chief Secretaries have rarely been in Ireland during the Castle "seasons," and maybe for other reasons as well.

A great deal of vapourish nonsense has appeared in the papers about the appointment of Lord Breadalbane "to the important office of Keeper of the Privy Seal of Scotland," in the place of the late Lord Leven and Melville. As a matter of fact, this post is purely honorary, there being neither duties nor emoluments.

A paragraph is going round the papers which states that when the Duchess of Buccleuch resigns the office of Mistress of the Robes "a post of considerable importance will be placed in the gift of the Prime Minister." As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister has nothing whatever to do with the appointment to this post, as the places in the Household of a Queen Consort are not political, and are therefore in her Majesty's own personal gift. Lord Howe, who is Chamberlain to the Queen, is a Tory, and, by a curious coincidence, his grandfather held the same office in the Household of Queen Adelaide for several years.

The Queen has lost one of her oldest English friends by the death of the Dowager Lady Morton, who was a Lady of the Bedchamber to her Majesty (when Princess of Wales) for thirty-eight years—from her marriage in March, 1863, until a few weeks after the death of Queen Victoria in 1901. Lady Morton, who was a daughter of the first Earl of Durham, and a granddaughter (through her mother) of Earl Grey, the Minister, was married in 1853 to the twentieth Earl of Morton, whose first wife had been a daughter of Mr. Watson, of Saughton. Lord Morton died in 1884, and his widow had since lived principally at Dalmahoy, the family place near Edinburgh.

Sir James Fergusson was the head of an ancient and honoured Ayrshire family, and he owned an estate of over 20,000 acres in that county, Kilkerran Castle, his place near Maybole, being a large and handsome old house, beautifully situated on the banks of the Girvan. Sir James was the eldest son of the fifth Baronet, and his mother was a daughter of the celebrated David Boyle, a highly distinguished Scotch lawyer, who sat in the Court of Session for over forty years, during eleven of which he was Lord President and Lord Justice General. Boyle retired in 1852, full of indignation against the Tory leaders, as Lord Derby had refused him a peerage. He was offered a baronetcy, which he rejected with contempt.

Sir James, who was educated at Rugby under Tait, entered the Grenadier Guards on leaving Oxford, and he served throughout the Crimean War, and conspicuously distinguished himself on several occasions. During the war he was elected M.P. for Ayrshire, in the place of Colonel Blair, who was mortally wounded at Inkerman. Sir James lost his seat at the General Election of 1857, when the Palmerstonian Whigs carried all before them, but he regained it in 1859, and remained in Parliament until 1868, when he was appointed Governor of South Australia. Sir James was successively Under-Secretary for India and for the Home Department between 1866 and 1868, under Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli. He was transferred in 1873 to New Zealand, but resigned in 1875, and returned home, as he wanted to resume an active political career. Two attempts that he made to return to the House of Commons were, however, unsuccessful, and early in 1880 he was appointed Governor of Bombay, where he remained for four years. On returning to England, he was elected in November, 1885, for one of the divisions of Manchester, and he held his seat until the last General Election.

He was Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office from 1886 until 1891, when he became Postmaster-General, and his official career terminated with the fall of Lord Salisbury's second Administration in August, 1892. He was not included in the Government of 1895. Sir James was a man of strong common sense, with a remarkably sound judgment and a considerable capacity for practical business, but he was no orator, nor did he ever discover any special gifts as an administrator. He was eminently cautious, and the Walpolean maxim, quieta non movere, appeared to be for ever in his mind. Sir James was concerned closely with many important commercial undertakings. He was a keen sportsman of the old school, and very hospitable. Between 1856 and 1868 Sir James mixed a great deal in literary and artistic society, and in those days he was a constant habitué of the Garrick Club. His first wife was the younger daughter and co-heir of the celebrated Marquis of Dalhousie, one of the greatest of the Governors-General of India.

Sir James Fergusson was the elder brother of Sir Charles Dalrymple, who changed his name when a boy on succeeding to the large Hailes estates in the Lothians, which came to him from his great-grandfather, Sir David Dalrymple (Lord Hailes). Sir Charles sat in the House of Commons from 1868 until the last election, when he lost his seat for Ipswich.

The late Miss Agnes Clerke was one of the greatest of the select band of women astronomers. Her books on astronomy and her articles in scientific journals were recognised as of great value. The difficult questions arising out of spectroscopic observations of the stars had no keener student, and at meetings of the Royal Astronomical Society she was frequently to be seen surrounded by leading astronomers, genuinely keen to hear her opinion on some knotty point. Some years ago an attempt was made to admit ladies as Fellows of the Astronomical Society. When this failed, the Council adopted the plan of inviting certain ladies to attend the meetings, and of these Miss Clerke was the most prominent.

In noticing the death of Colonel Wenman Coke, last week, I omitted any reference to the fact that he was for many years a keen follower of hounds, and a prominent member of the Meynell Hunt. He was a fine rider. Colonel Coke inherited his hunting tastes from his father, the first Earl of Leicester ("Coke of Norfolk"), who was Master of the still flourishing West Norfolk country from 1772 until 1810.

The death of Lady Vyvyan is deeply and widely regretted in Cornwall. She was very kind and charitable, and was as generous to Nonconformists as to Church people. Lady Vyvyan, who was a daughter of Mr. Richard Bourchier, of Brook Lodge, Dorsetshire, was married in 1857 to the Rev. Sir Vyell Vyvyan, who succeeded to the ancient baronetcy and to the large family estates in 1879 on the death of his uncle, Sir Robert Vyvyan. The latter was for many years a very influential member of the House of Commons, and a leader of the High Tories. He bitterly opposed the Catholic Emancipation policy of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel in 1829, and contributed largely to the fall of the Duke's Government in November, 1830.

Colonel Henry Donald Browne, who died the other day at Winchester, served for many years in the Rifle Brigade, and he distinguished himself in the Boer War of 1881. He was a very able man, and an immense favourite both in Service circles and in general society. His personality was remarkably attractive. He would have achieved one of the highest positions in the Army but for his poor health, which practically blighted his military career. He was a Groom-in-Waiting to Queen Victoria during the last six years of her late Majesty's reign, and was a persona grata at Court. He will be long remembered and regretted by a host of friends.

Mrs. Lyttelton, who died at Perrystone Court, Herefordshire, last week, after a very short illness, was the second daughter of the late Mr. George Clive, M.P. for Hereford, who was for many years Permanent Under-Secretary at the Home Office. She was the widow of Dr. Arthur Temple Lyttelton, a younger brother of Lord Cobham, who was the first Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, and afterwards Suffragan Bishop of Southampton. His early death is still much lamented in the Diocese of Winchester, where he was universally beloved and esteemed. Mrs. Lyttelton rendered most valuable assistance to her husband both at Cambridge and in Hampshire. She was a clever and highly accomplished woman, and a charming hostess. Her pleasant hospitalities at Selwyn Lodge are still remembered at Cambridge. Mrs. Lyttelton was an able and diligent critic, and she contributed largely to the Guardian for many years.

I suppose the idea of the French Government—and of its subjects—is that every French citizen should be décoré with some Order or other, which is really a very much more sensible way of meeting the needs of human nature than the American plan of merely envying the possessors of titles and buying them for your daughters when means permit. But certainly some of the steps taken by the French towards this worthy end are a little complicated. Take a shorthand-writer, for instance. We all know that he is a very deserving person indeed, though it might not occur to most of us to bestow upon him as the reward for his labours the Chevalier's cross of an Order of Chivalry. They do things differently in France, and accordingly six of the most prominent members of the French Institute of Stenography have just been so honoured. But it is in the choice of the Order that the Government has displayed to perfection the delicate tact for which our neighbours are famous. One of the lucky stenographists has become Commander, the other five Chevaliers of the Order of Agricultural Merit! Could there be a more charming way of acknowledging how largely the stenographer assists in cultivating the flowers of fancy and of rhetoric?

CHAPERONS HALF PRICE!

A Maiden's Remonstrance.

A club's been lately formed, I see,
  A dual-sex affair,
That youths to marriage drawn may be
  By meeting maidens there.

The "sub." a modest guinea is;
  So any girls who get
An eligible spouse for this
  Will have no cause to fret.

But what with wonder strikes me dumb
  Is why on earth they fix
The chaperons' sub. at half that sum—
  A paltry ten-and-six.

I know if I went there to meet
  A handsome, nice young man,
I'd vote duennas all to treat
  On quite another plan.

Yea, far from letting in thus cheap,
  I'd put, beyond a doubt,
A thumping tariff on, to keep
  These lynx-eyed dragons out.

I hope that I am not too late to offer the Tribune my humble congratulations on its first birthday. As the celebration occurred last week on the day when I was going to press, I was not aware of it in time to pay my respects earlier. When the Tribune first started I felt a doubt whether there was room for another penny paper on party lines; but the Tribune has, so far, proved that I was wrong, and I hope it may long live to do so. It certainly deserves success, for it has been most ably conducted, and neither money nor labour has been spared to put it at the top of its class of journals. I particularly admire it for the stand that it has made against objectionable advertisements of every class. A new journal cannot always afford to be particular about the advertisements it will accept; but the Tribune has set an example in this respect which some of its oldest contemporaries might imitate with advantage—except, of course, to their own pockets.

The annual report of Edinburgh University was issued last week, and it appears that during 1906 there were 3,199 students, including 463 women. Fifteen hundred were enrolled in the Faculty of Medicine, 1,012 in the Faculty of Arts, 311 in the Faculty of Law, 292 in the Faculty of Science, and twenty-eight in the Faculty of Music. During the year there were 6,389 additions to the University library.

Principal Story had a wide reputation as a preacher, and he was certainly one of the ablest debaters in the General Assembly. It was often asserted that he would have achieved a great position if he had entered upon a political career. He had filled a large place in Scottish public life for quite forty years. He was always on the side of tolerance and liberal thought, and warmly supported the "innovations" of Principal Tulloch, Dr.

Norman Macleod, Dr. Robert Lee, and "A. K. H. B.," which were detestable in the eyes of old-fashioned Presbyterians. He was admired and beloved by all who knew him. Principal Story was minister of Rosneath for twenty-six years, during which period he was thrown much into the society of the late Duke of Argyll. He was appointed to the Chair of Church History in Glasgow University in 1886, and proved himself to be an admirable lecturer. In 1898 he succeeded Dr. Caird as Principal. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1894. He carried out important reforms in the University of Glasgow, which has made immense progress under his wise and enterprising guidance. He took a most active part in the affairs of the Church of Scotland, and exercised immense influence on its general management. The range of his intellectual interests was very wide, and at times he overflowed with wit and humour. He hated every kind of cant and humbug.

It is expected that a layman will be appointed Principal of Glasgow University, and at Edinburgh the names of Professor Jones, of Glasgow, and of Professor Lodge, of Edinburgh, are generally mentioned in connection with the vacancy. The office is worth £1,100 a year, with residence. The appointment of a clergyman would be disappointing and displeasing to Scotch Liberals.

I see that the Rev. J. Rogers, who has so often come under notice in these columns, particularly in the character of a clerical coach, has been advertising again recently. He is still at Cambridge, his latest address being 23, Orchard-street. He distributes a great deal of literature, including testimonials purporting to speak of his success as a coach, but most of it is very old stuff which has frequently been dealt with in these columns, and in view of his record I take the liberty of doubting Mr. Rogers's educational abilities not less than his qualifications to train desirable candidates for Holy Orders.

Another old acquaintance who has been recalled to my memory by a newspaper advertisement is Mr. E. Broughton-Rouse. He also is at Cambridge, and the other day he had a lucrative advowson for disposal, with a fine rectory and church and "no poverty." I suppose that "no poverty" applies to the parishioners, not the incumbent, and the way it is thrown in by the agent among the attractions of the property is decidedly instructive. I take it to mean no hard work, plenty of invitations to dinner, and little difficulty about raising money for "Church" purposes. One sees again how admirably our system of ecclesiastical patronage harmonises with the highest ideals of the priestly office. By the way, I am rather interested to see that Mr. Broughton-Rouse, whom I first knew as "the doyen of ecclesiastical agents," has gone back to that line of business. Has he relinquished the direction of the County Court department of Graves, of Sheffield, or does he combine the two, and sell advowsons on the credit system?

The rectory of Tiverton, which has become vacant by the death of Prebendary Scott, has been declined by Prebendary Burroughs, vicar of Plymouth, to whom it was offered by Lord Harrowby and the other trustees, who are the patrons. The living has now been offered to the Rev. W. H. Stone, vicar of St. Mary's, Kilburn. The net value of the rectory of Tiverton is about £800 a year, with residence.

The Primate has collated the Rev. H. Bickersteth Ottley, vicar of St. Mark's, South Norwood, and formerly vicar of Eastbourne, to an unendowed prebendal stall in Canterbury Cathedral. Mr. Ottley, who belongs to a well-known clerical family, has a great reputation as an organiser, administrator, and preacher, and he is supposed to be well in the running for a bishopric.

In the eye of the law the parish churchyard is the parson's freehold, and in past years I have dealt with not a few remarkable scandals arising from that fact. But until I read a statement just issued by the Rector and churchwardens of Cossington, Somerset, I had never heard of a case in which God's acre was practically regarded as the private property of the squire, a mere appurtenance of the manor-house. Judging from the statement in question this is the position of affairs which has long existed in Cossington. Mr. Broderip, the principal landowner in the parish, is the patron of the living and—following the practice of his predecessors—when he presented the living he obtained from the Rector a lease purporting to give him full authority and control over the churchyard. There seems to be little doubt that such a lease is bad in law. In Cossington, however, down to a recent date, nobody has ever ventured to dispute the legality of this singular arrangement, or to deny the squire's supposed right to do as he pleases with the parish churchyard.

It appears that the church and churchyard at Cossington form a kind of island (approached only by a narrow footpath) in the grounds of the Manor House, Mr. Broderip's residence, the churchyard being, in fact, surrounded on three sides by the garden and on the fourth by the wall of the kitchen garden and the house. The churchyard is unfenced, and, except in one spot where a single strand of wire has been placed, there is nothing whatever to mark the boundaries of the consecrated ground. That part which adjoins the house is, indeed, laid out as though it belonged to the garden in which it seems to be merged. At one point a bow window has been added to the house, which, it is alleged, is an encroachment on the consecrated ground. In another place a flight of steps constitutes an encroachment, and "recently a portion of the churchyard was taken into the carriage drive of the Manor House, but this has lately been restored." Mr. Broderip's assumed authority over the churchyard has furthermore been displayed by his prohibition of burials on the north side, which is the nearest to his house. There is considerable vacant ground on that side, whereas the south side is already so crowded that nearly every fresh burial involves the disturbance of old graves.

This extraordinary state of things was at last brought to the knowledge of the Bishop of the diocese, and eventually the Rector and the churchwardens were directed to erect a fence round the churchyard and to see that proper use was made of the burial accommodation. On the strength of the above-mentioned lease, however, Mr. Broderip threatened them with an action for trespass and damages if any fence were set up. Various attempts to come to some friendly arrangement were unsuccessful, and, acting under the advice of the diocesan authorities, the Rector and churchwardens have now resolved to proceed with the erection of the fence, for which purpose, owing to the hostility of the squire, they have been obliged to appeal for subscriptions outside the parish. Cossington is evidently one of those villages in which the squire is all-powerful. Still, it is astonishing to learn in these days of a local magnate being permitted to become the lessee of the parish churchyard, and to treat the consecrated ground as though it constituted a part of his private demesne; and it is to be hoped that the action now being taken by the Rector and churchwardens will at last put an end to the scandal.

A burial scandal of a somewhat unusual kind is reported in the Western Mail. It occurred in connection with the funeral of a resident of Swansea, who had desired that his remains should be interred in a grave adjoining his wife's. This was arranged, but when the funeral party entered the graveyard an objection was raised to the use of the burial service of the church to which the deceased man belonged. The officiating cleric was informed that there would be no objection to the singing of a hymn or to a prayer, but that any reading from a book, unless it was a passage of scripture, would not be permitted. In these circumstances, the corpse was taken back to the roadway outside the burying ground, where the service was conducted.

Told in this way, it seems a fairly familiar story. In past years I have indeed commented upon scores of similar exhibitions of religious uncharitableness on the part of clergy of the Church of England. This particular incident is, however, rendered remarkable by the facts that the graveyard in question is attached to a Baptist chapel at Swansea, and that it was the minister of this chapel—the Rev. Mr. Harris—who forbade the reading of the burial service—that of the Roman Catholic Church. If an Anglican or Roman Catholic cleric had done anything of the kind I should have condemned his bigotry, and, to my mind, such bigotry is not less, but rather more, discreditable in a Baptist minister.

During the discussion of the Catholic trusts question it was suggested by one of my correspondents that much benefit might accrue to the Roman Catholic Church in England if it were to borrow from its Anglican neighbour the institution of churchwardens. I am interested to see that the same suggestion is now under discussion in the Catholic Times, and in Saturday's issue a writer stated that on the Continent lay churchwardens are to be found everywhere, and that it is the custom for them to have a quarterly conference with the priest on questions relating to the income and expenditure of the parish church, and for all their decisions to be read out to the congregation. After all that has come to light in the last twelve months one cannot help thinking that there is a useful opening for the extension of the Continental system to England.

By the way, in the same column of the Catholic Times there is a somewhat interesting passage at arms between two correspondents on the subject of episcopal interference with mission endowments. One of them had written some precious nonsense in defence of the diversion of such endowments from their founders' purposes, winding up with the amazing observation that in a missionary country like this the needs of the Church are frequently such that the Bishop "has practically no option but to divert most such endowments to the furtherance of higher and wider aims that he feels sure must commend themselves to the enlightened mind of the testator—in the light of glory." The author of this inspired utterance is smitten hip and thigh by another correspondent, armed with a quotation from the Second Provincial Council of Westminster. I wonder whether any bishop who has used mission endowments "as a financial basis" for wholesale gambling in speculative stocks seriously persuaded himself that his operations must "commend themselves to the enlightened mind of the testator—in the light of glory!"

In an advertisement in the Catholic Press, the Rev. Edward St. John asks for support for the Southwark Catholic Rescue Society, on the ground that it provides youthful offenders "with clothes, food, and a start in a country where there is no Free Trade." Presumably his Reverence is a Tariff Reformer. But does the society which he represents desire to depend upon the charity of Tariff Reformers only? If not, this silly and unnecessary allusion to the fiscal question would be better omitted from the appeal.

By an oversight, which I much regret, the name of Mrs. E. C. Combe, of Donaghcloney House, Donaghcloney, County Down, was omitted from the list of prize winners in connection with the TRUTH Doll Show which I published last week. This lady kindly dressed 200 small dolls which occupied a prominent position at the Show at the Albert Hall, and it was fully intended that she should receive a prize. Mrs. Combe's position in the list would have been sixth, and I have therefore decided to award her an extra prize.

I have to acknowledge the following contributions towards the Toy Fund:—Tangku, 1s.; Sponge, 1s.; A Well Wisher, India, 10s.; Col. W. F. Perry, 12s.; The Eastern Telegraph Mess, Suez, £1; A. C. E., £2 16s.

Some ludicrous nonsense was talked in the papers, even in papers which ought to know better, when it was announced that the Secretary of State for War had given formal notice of objection to the Channel Tunnel Bill. Even a leader-writer on a daily paper might be expected to know that such a notice is the only way of obtaining a locus standi to be heard on a private Bill, and no one in his senses would suppose that this particular Bill will be passed without the War Office having any say upon it. Very possibly the War Office evidence will be against the Bill, but at present the case cannot well have been prepared; and to infer that the official notice of the Secretary of State implies that the Government, or even Mr. Haldane personally, have already decided to oppose the Bill is childish. The wish was evidently father to the thought.

Of course, the Government, if it considers that there is any doubt about military danger from the construction of a tunnel, must decide on the side of safety. In any case, it is the duty of the Government to see that all possible precautions necessary to eliminate such danger are taken, both in the design of the work, and in its subsequent control and management. There are two conditions which I would certainly insist upon: (1) The Company constructing the tunnel should be required to pay for all works of defence in connection with it, and all arrangements for rendering it impassable for hostile purposes. (2) The military authorities should be the sole judges under what circumstances it should be rendered impassable, and if it were so rendered the Company should have no right to indemnity if it were demolished or damaged for military reasons. These conditions would only be reasonable. Within a certain radius of a fortress in France (and probably the same rule exists in other countries) people are allowed to build houses, but if the fortress is likely to be attacked, such houses may be levelled to the ground without any compensation being granted to the owners. Under this law, a vast number of houses were destroyed round Paris so soon as the possibility of a siege became apparent.

We are often told that we must be supreme on the high seas in order to save us from being starved into surrender in time of war. I have never thought that the danger is a real one, unless we were not only vanquished at sea, but at war with all the Great Powers. We and other nations have subscribed to the doctrine of free ships, free goods. A neutral ship, therefore, may enter our ports in time of war without risk of capture, unless the other belligerent had blockaded all our ports and the vessel attempted to run the blockade. For an enemy to attempt to starve us out by seizing on the high seas neutral vessels containing provisions bound for our ports would, therefore, be resented by neutrals, and might convert one or more of them into our allies. Assuming, however, that this danger, of which so much is heard, is really worth consideration, then obviously a tunnel or tunnels would be of the greatest advantage to us, provided that we were at war with any Power other than France. No other enemy could "starve us out" while the tunnel existed, except by invading Kent and holding the railway, or by going to war with France and occupying the French end of the tunnel.

GENERAL SIR FATHEAD FRIGHTEM ON THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

I met Sir Fathead at the club;
We talked about the Channel Tunnel,
Which he, in lurid phrase, did dub
The devil's something, something funnel.

"Now, tell, Sir Fathead, pray," said I,
"What ails you at this Channel Tunnel,
That the poor thing you thus decry,
As Satan's something something funnel?"

He smiled, superior, in his scorn,
As though he deemed my question foolish—
A smile I've often noticed worn
By those who hold opinions mulish—

Then said: "Gad, sir, you're very green!
Why, can't you see it spells perdition,
Thus to destroy what's always been
Our safeguard—insular position?

"Suppose the French to raid our land
Should wish (a likely case I'm puttin'),
There's your d—d tunnel right at hand
To help them get, and keep, their foot in.

"What easier than for them to send,
Say, fifty thousand tunics blue, sir,
By train, to seize and hold our end,
While all their army's getting through, sir?"

"'Easy?'" I cried, "Sir Fathead?—No!
For, sure, the trainload first of blue men
Would give away the blessed show,
And we should promptly squelch those few men."

Lofty contempt his face expressed;
"They wouldn't came as troops—those trickers;
As onion-sellers they'd be dressed,
Or else, perhaps, as strawberry-pickers."

"But, sir," said I, "if that be true—
Excuse my mentioning these trifles—
What harm could those poor beggars do
Without their bayonets or their rifles?

"And anyhow, the mines, the fort,
Arranged our exit for defending,
Would cut such raiders precious short,
And bring them to a sudden ending."

Sir Fathead at my words grew red,
Till blazed his face one deep vermilion.
"Pooh! You can't gauge these things," he said,
"You're nothing but a damned civilian."

It would save me a vast amount of trouble, and, I think, remove one of the greatest objections to service in the regular army if the War Office would lay down some definite and immutable rules as to the term of foreign service which every soldier should be called upon to perform. There is no matter which creates more dissatisfaction, and the worst of it is that it is felt most by men who have served for long periods, and who are on the eve of quitting the Service. I have before me particulars of the service of ten men of 66 Company, R.G.A., who have just been ordered to proceed to Bermuda from Jamaica. The senior of them went abroad in 1895, two others in 1897, and the remainder in 1898. They are all, therefore, doing from their ninth to their twelfth year of continuous foreign service. They have all been to Bermuda before, having served two and a half years there on returning from South Africa, and it is easy to understand the sensations with which they learn that after a long spell in the West Indies they are to be sent back to Bermuda again.

Our regular army is essentially a foreign service army; everybody must recognise that. But at least half of it is always stationed in the United Kingdom, and we are to keep here, according to the latest arrangement, an expeditionary force 150,000 strong, ready to go anywhere and do anything at a moment's notice. That being so, I cannot understand what necessity there is for keeping men continually abroad for more than seven years; on the contrary, if men extend their service with the colours, I should have thought that there is a double reason for allowing them to come home—first, that this arrangement will induce them to extend their service, and, secondly, that seasoned and well-trained soldiers are a desirable ingredient of the aforesaid "expeditionary force." There are a certain number of men who like foreign service, but they are a small minority, and the foreign service which they like is chiefly that in India. I do not suppose the man has ever been found who liked service in Bermuda, and when he has already done two and a half years there it is not clear on what principle he should be sent back a second time in preference to somebody else who has not had that pleasing and valuable experience. It will take a great deal to convince me that it is impossible to arrange that every man shall have a right to come home after seven years abroad, and to carry out the arrangement without any additional cost to the country.

A curious arrangement on the part of the War Office was disclosed in a case at Wiltshire Assizes last week, when three men were prosecuted for stealing a large quantity of brass and copper belonging to Mr. W. T. Whitmarsh, of Netheravon. It seems that for a payment of £20 a year the War Office leases to Mr. Whitmarsh the exclusive privilege of collecting spent shells on Salisbury Plain, while he also gets a reward for the discovery of any live shells. Besides the iron case, each shell has a brass or aluminium top and a copper band, and this metal, which in the case of all the spent shells becomes the property of Mr. Whitmarsh, is, of course, of considerable value. What quantity of metal is thus obtained in the course of a year was not mentioned at the trial, but seeing that from 10,000 to 15,000 shells are fired during the artillery practices, and that about half of them are recovered by Mr. Whitmarsh (the other half are buried, and he is prohibited from digging for them), it may reasonably be concluded that he makes a good thing out of this concession. Nobody can blame him for doing so. But why in the name of the taxpayers should such a lease be granted? The War Office might surely undertake the collection of the shells itself.

One day last month a sergeant and a bombardier of the R.G.A. went, in the middle of the day, to a restaurant at Rangoon kept by one Chiesa—it seems that even in Burma the Briton enjoys the advantage of being catered for by Italian restaurateurs. The two soldiers ordered their meal and proceeded upstairs, where there were about a dozen tables, only one of which was occupied. When they had taken their seats a waiter told them that they must go downstairs to a private room. They asked to see the proprietor, but only got a message from him that if they did not like it they could go. They naturally went. These incidents are not only regrettable from the point of view of the men concerned, but from that of the Army, and the public. My view is that licensed victuallers should be precluded by their licences from treating soldiers in this way; and in Indian or colonial garrison towns, where the military element is much more powerful than it is at home, I cannot understand why this is not done.

The naval gunnery results for 1906, which have just been officially issued, are highly creditable to the Service, and very comforting to us gentlemen of England who sit at home at ease. They show what great things may be done by keenness coupled with a little extra attention to business. The previous year produced "record" figures in all directions, but 1906 throws them into the shade individually and collectively. The highest average for any squadron in 1905 was 157. This time only four squadrons come out below that figure, while four are actually above 200. And when one sees that the average of the Second Cruiser Squadron, which comes out at the top of the list, has been lifted in one year from 54 to 264, it seems reasonable to expect further improvement in future—not perhaps at the top of the scale, but certainly lower down.

After the naval events which ended in the battle of Tsushima, it was borne in upon a good many people, whose intellects only work when set in motion by object lessons, that the human element in naval warfare still counts, as it always has done since history was written, for a good deal more than the numbers and size of ships and weapons. Unless our intellects have by this time ceased once more to work, we shall be deeply impressed by these gunnery figures. The plain truth is that they represent an enormous increase in the fighting strength of the Navy—far more than could have been added to it by two or three years' shipbuilding, and the expenditure of several millions under that head. When the shooting of one squadron has been improved to the extent of the difference between the figures 54 and 264, it may be safely said that its efficiency in action has been more than doubled. For firing at any long range the result is the same as if the squadron carried five guns where it previously carried one—with the additional advantage that the expenditure of ammunition remains no higher than before. And if we look back two years, we find that something like this result has been accomplished throughout the whole of our fleet in European waters. I recommend nervous people to bear this in mind when they read in the Standard, or wherever it may be, of the awful havoc which the present Board of Admiralty is working, and the disastrous results with which we are threatened by attempts to run the Navy "on the cheap."

Of all the humbugs that we are cursed with I take the professional naval alarmist to be the most pestilent. Smuggled away in a corner of one of the Jingo newspapers the other day, I came across an illuminating paragraph describing the "paralysis" which has fallen on all the foreign ship-building yards owing to the launch of the Dreadnought. The substance of it was that the foreign yards have never been so inactive as they are at the present moment, the laying down of new battleships having been practically suspended until adequate information about the Dreadnought and her trials is available, and until foreign designers have been able to make up their minds what they will do in the same direction.

These statements applied specially to Germany. Yet a few months previously we were told with equal confidence that the Germans were starting on a fleet of Dreadnoughts by comparison with which our prize ship would be an impotent anachronism; and when the number of new Dreadnoughts that we had in contemplation was cut down, there was a howl of indignation from certain quarters, and the precise date at which Germany would have five of these terrible monsters to our three was confidently announced. After these bogeys have walked abroad for a few months and scared all the old women among us out of their wits, the discovery is made that not even the design of a German Dreadnought has yet been settled! So I suppose for the present if we want to enjoy a good creepy sensation we must fall back upon some of the familiar tables which show what a formidable fleet the Germans will have in 1917, or 1957, or whatever the date may be.

Heaven forbid that I should believe, or induce any one else to believe, that the Admiralty is above criticism or never makes mistakes. But let us have criticism founded on knowledge, common sense, and an intelligent perception of the possibilities of the future, no crazy prophecies begotten of stupidity and ignorance—which is a fair description of the writings of most of the leading amateur experts in this line of journalism. Their only effect is to confuse the civilian mind and create an irrational sense of insecurity, which is the chief predisposing cause of the equally irrational expenditure of money.

The last TRUTH article on the canteen question in the Navy has brought me a long letter from the other side of the world, the writer being an officer who has evidently given much thought to the subject. The substance of his argument is that no system of Government victualling in the place of the canteen will ever satisfy the men, partly because they have a fancy for a variety of provisions, particularly of the "canned" description, which the Government will hardly be able to gratify completely, partly because the canteen supplies a great many articles besides provisions, serving practically as a general shop. It is also suggested that the more the business is placed in Government hands, the more certain the men are to grumble, owing to their inherent suspicion that those in authority over them are always endeavouring to swindle them in one way or another—a suspicion by no means confined to bluejackets. As between the ship's canteen and the tenant canteen, my correspondent thinks that there is not much to choose in point of results, each having its advantages and disadvantages; but he objects to the idea of a tenant system regulated by a Government control over all contracts, on the ground that this will involve a heavy expenditure on an office and staff. I really cannot see why it should.

The following remarks are, I think, worth quoting:—

> The point to which most attention should be directed is the question of cooks and cooking. Better trained cooks, and larger galleys must be provided. If this were done a great deal of the present trouble in regard to victualling would vanish. The galley space is at present so limited that dinners to be eaten at 12 have to be cooked at 9.30 in many ships, and kept warm in the interval. No wonder that the food is not always palatable. Next, something answering to the pantry on shore is urgently needed, where food can be stored from one meal to another. At present there is no such place, and, for want of it, food has to be thrown overboard.
> Apparently the great obstacle in the way of these improvements is the construction department. They reply to all demands that there is no room available, and when naval men offer to show them where room can be found, they are informed that this is not their business, they have only to live in the ships when built, and, if convenient, they must put up with them. It is to be hoped that the Committee now at work will find out some way, not of putting an end to grumbling, for that is impossible, but of leaving no reasonable cause for it; but so long as they do not devise some better system of cooking and serving meals, their labours are not likely to lead to any very satisfactory result.

These last points have frequently been dealt with in TRUTH, and many of my readers will remember the astonishing facts that have been given from time to time with regard to the amount of food that is wasted simply because there is no place on board where it can be stored between meals. Unless things have been radically changed in this respect during the last year or two, which, judging from the above letter, does not seem to be the case, it is quite certain that better arrangements in this direction would work a most useful change in the feeding of the Navy, and greatly reduce the amount which the men have to spend on food out of their own pockets.

The argument that space cannot be found for storing food between meals seems to me nonsense. We all know that space must be economised on board ship, but to contend that space is saved by a system which involves the waste of provisions by the ton in the course of a cruise of a few weeks is obviously absurd, for waste necessarily implies that the quantity stored in the first instance must be increased in proportion. It is equally absurd to suggest that on a warship of anything from 10,000 to 20,000 tons space cannot be provided for kitchens and pantries in the same proportion as on a passenger ship of the same size carrying far more people, and catering for them in a vastly more luxurious style; and every advance made in the size of battleships and cruisers increases this absurdity.

An experienced traveller wrote to me the other day on the frequency of robberies of passengers on board ships when on the eve of sailing, mentioning at the same time many of the tricks by which they are effected. Those who have travelled much by ocean-going steamers are pretty well aware of these tricks, but to the majority of mankind an ocean voyage is a very rare experience, and it is on this fact that swindlers trade. At some ports the shipping companies, recognising this state of things, take adequate precautions for the policing of their ships in port, but certainly not in all. Among other experiences, my correspondent relates that the other day a plausible stranger appeared in the smoking-room of a P. and O. steamer at Marseilles, and endeavoured to obtain change for a £10 note, in order to pay charges on his baggage. Failing in this, he obtained a loan of £3 10s. from another passenger in the smoking-room, and, of course, was no more seen. I hope no reader of Truth will ever advance £3 10s. to a plausible stranger, either on board ship or elsewhere, but the perpetration of these swindles ought to be more difficult than it is.

The Calcutta municipality is being severely criticised for permitting the existence on the Maidan and elsewhere of a large number of death-traps in the shape of open tanks or cesspools, ten or a dozen feet deep in liquid filth. The tanks are not fenced or lighted, and in the darkness they are a constant danger to pedestrians, especially new comers unacquainted with the city's possession of these peculiar amenities. Recently a gentleman freshly arrived from England had a narrow escape from drowning through walking into one of the tanks when taking a short cut across the Maidan to the Cathedral. Many persons have had similar involuntary immersions, and some have actually been drowned. Perhaps it might wake up the municipal authorities to a sense of their responsibilities in the matter if some victim sued them for damages or some victim's relatives prosecuted them for manslaughter.

Last October I commented upon the fact that the State Council of Selangor, one of the Federated Malay States, were induced by the British Resident to vote 7,500 dollars towards the endowment of an Anglican Bishopric in the neighbouring British colony of Singapore. Selangor is a Mohammedan State, and since this grant to the Bishopric fund was made, the question of the erection of a new mosque in Kuala Lumpur has come before the Council. The Resident, whose word is law with the Council, impressed upon the Malay members the desirability of erecting an edifice which in magnitude and importance would be worthy of the proposed site in the Federal capital. Towards the expenditure which this would involve he proposed that —provided his plans were adopted—the Government should contribute "dollar for dollar of the amount raised by subscription" up to an aggregate of 30,000 dollars. Seeing that the donation to the Singapore Bishopric scheme, which had no claim whatever upon the Selangor Government, was made quite unconditionally, it is not surprising to learn that this restriction upon the grant to the native community for their own religious purposes is looked upon as exceedingly mean. The majority of the Britishers in the State, official as well as non-official, hold that view even more strongly than the Mohammedans themselves.

One of the Dutch newspapers has reprinted my recent paragraph regarding the racing and football lotteries or "competitions" (mostly swindles) which are carried on among the British public by parties operating from offices in Middelburg and other towns in Holland. I pointed out that these rogues now make an ungrateful return for the hospitality they enjoy in that country by getting their circulars posted in England, thereby depriving the Dutch Post Office of a considerable revenue. Commenting on this, a Dutch correspondent says that he does not see how the authorities over there can interfere with the posting of the circulars here. Of course, I did not suppose that they could do so. But, failing any other method of dealing with them, the Dutch Government could easily squabash these harpies by stopping the delivery of the letters containing remittances in stamps and postal orders which, in response to the circulars, are directed to them in Holland. Perhaps my correspondent will bring this remedy to the notice of the powers that be at The Hague.

Mr. Joseph Waller, of 89, Aldersgate-street, relates an experience in connection with the National Telephone Company's charges which corresponds exactly to some of the cases against the Post Office described in Truth two or three months back. After finding repeated cause to question the accuracy of the company's accounts for calls, he established an elaborate system of checking the use made of his telephone. The instrument is placed in a locked room, and when it is used two persons are required to attend it. The duty of one of these is to enter, in duplicate, in a book the number called, and give a counterfoil with the number on it to the caller; so that there should be a double record of every call.

At the end of the first quarter after this system was put in force the company rendered an account showing 125 calls more than the subscriber's account, the difference in cash being 9s. 5d. Remembering that in three months there are only seventy-eight working days, of which thirteen are Saturdays, it is incredible that, even if the subscriber's system was occasionally evaded, this could have occurred to the extent of 125 times in one quarter. When this matter was last under discussion in TRUTH several correspondents urged the formation of a telephone subscribers' defence association, but no one seems to have been disposed to take the initiative in the matter. Mr. Waller feels so strongly on this question that he is ready to undertake the business and give his services gratuitously. If, then, there is any genuine desire for such an organisation those who feel it would do well to communicate with him at the address given above.

Apropos of the education question, a voluntary school teacher asks me to call attention to the great hardship to which his class of teachers is exposed when their schools are closed by the action of the Board of Education or the local authorities. Where they are young men and women they may be able to get other appointments, but it is otherwise when they are approaching the forties, or getting beyond them. It seems to me that in such cases the education authorities ought to make provision for them elsewhere, provided, of course, that they are efficient. The closing of a public elementary school is not like the closing of a shop. Except in a very few cases it does not mean that less teaching staff is required, for the children have still to be taught somewhere. There ought not, therefore, to be any difficulty in "absorbing" the displaced staff when a school is closed.

A correspondent tells me that in the Brompton-road last week upwards of an hour elapsed before a horse, which had been badly injured by a motor-'bus, was slaughtered. This is an example of a very old scandal of the London streets which ought to have abated long since. I was, indeed, under the impression that arrangements were now in force for the more speedy killing of wounded horses, but apparently this is not the case. A delay of over an hour in putting an animal out of its misery is certainly quite inexcusable.

The Bangor Guardians are coming in for some severe but well-deserved criticism in reference to the workhouse infirmary. So long ago as last July the newly-appointed medical officer presented an exhaustive report on the condition of the infirmary, which had also been condemned by his predecessor and by inspectors of the Local Government Board. Without being made public the report was referred to a committee and nothing more was heard of it till two or three weeks since, when some of the more progressive members of the Board urged that the matter ought not to be allowed to drop. The local papers have now procured and published a copy of the document, which reveals the existence of a state of things absolutely disgraceful to the Bangor Bumbles, whose desire to hush up the scandal can easily be understood, though their failure to take any adequate steps for putting an end to it is quite inexcusable. It is said that some of the evils of administration have been remedied. The doctor showed, however, that the building, quite apart from mismanagement, is badly situated, badly designed, badly built, badly furnished, and altogether unfit for the use to which it is put. The Guardians, who have been considering the matter secretly in committee, will therefore do well to recognise that no more peddling alterations and reforms will meet the case.

What the Bench truly described as a deplorable condition of things was revealed in a case at Crediton last week, when a labourer named Alford and his wife, living at Bow, were charged with neglecting their six children, and Hilda Alford, a daughter of the other defendants, was charged with neglecting her two illegitimate children. It was stated that Alford was now earning 15s. a week, but until quite recently he was only receiving 11s. a week, and on this sum the whole family of eleven had to be maintained. They lived in a small, damp cottage, with one room downstairs (the floor being of pebbles) and two bedrooms. All of them were suffering from a skin disease, which the man attributed to the drinking of dirty water from a well out of which "they often took rats and other things." The children did not appear to have been underfed, but they were verminous, and covered with sores, and the house was filthy.

No doubt these children had been neglected, but it seems to me that the parents were to be pitied almost as much as they were to be blamed, and I am glad to observe that the magistrates were fairly lenient, inflicting penalties of 17s. 11d. each, including costs, and allowing three months for payment. As one of the witnesses said, the children and the house could have been kept cleaner. But when a family of eleven are crowded together in a miserably small, damp, comfortless cottage, and have to subsist on a wage of 11s. a week, it is not altogether surprising that they become slothful and dirty in their habits; nor, when such a state of things exists, is it to be wondered at that the rising generation among the rural population migrate to the towns.

"TRUTH" will be sent weekly to any address in the United Kingdom for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or 28s. for 12 months. The subscription for all countries included in the Postal Union is, 3 months, 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; 12 months, £1 10s. 8d. All subscriptions are payable in advance, and cheques and P.O.O.s should be made payable to the MANAGER, "Truth" Building, Carteret-street, S.W.

In my Legal Pillory this week I record a wife-beating case at Kirkcaldy which affords a peculiarly flagrant illustration of the misguided leniency of the magistracy in dealing with such assaults. The unfortunate woman in this case was not only thrashed by her husband, but knocked down and kicked by another man, a companion of the husband. Bailie Peebles remarked that it was a wonder she was not killed, yet he allowed both these brutes to escape with the payment of paltry fines, instead of awarding them the term of hard labour which they richly deserved. The list below contains further examples of inadequately punished offences of violence and cruelty, while, by way of contrast, I give various specimens of the severity of the Great Unpaid in cases of poaching, petty larceny, and sleeping out:—

Maidenhead Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. E. R. Lovegrove and A. Upson. Harry Turnvey, charged with being drunk whilst in charge of a horse and trap. A constable said that he was driving at a furious pace through the streets. Fined 10s. and costs.

Mansfield Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and Mr. J. E. Alcock. George Holmes, convicted of assaulting William Burkitt. As he was going home complainant was knocked down in the road and kicked on the head, receiving wounds which had to be bandaged. Fined 10s.

St. Rollox Police-court, Glasgow. James M'Grory and John Maguire, charged with assaulting two policemen. The officers were attempting to arrest M'Grory, who butted one of them in the chest and kicked the other. Maguire then joined in the atack on them. M'Grory fined 42s., and Maguire 21s.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Peebles. Alexander Smith and John M'Gonigal, charged with assaulting the wife of the former. After her husband had struck her about the face the other man knocked her down and kicked her so brutally that the Bailie said it was a wonder she was not killed. Smith fined 20s. and M'Gonigal 30s.

Preston Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. A. Clemesha, W. H. Francis, and other magistrates. Joseph Lee Prince, charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal was in very poor condition and exhausted through being overdriven. Defendant thrashed it in a most brutal manner, causing a number of wounds, which bled profusely. Fined 40s.

Caerphilly Police-court. A collier named Hayman, charged with doing grievous bodily harm to a woman with whom he lived. It was stated that he beat her with a poker till she became insensible. The charge was reduced to one of common assault. Fined 20s., including costs.

Maidenhead Borough Police court. Before Messrs. H. J. Mount and E. R. Lovegrove. Mary Smith, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. Twenty-one days.

Mansfield Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. F. Sanders and G. Stevenson. Charles Durose, William Durose, and Samuel Lucas, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Lucas and William Durose fined 21s. each, and the other defendant 30s. or one month.

St. Rollox Police-court, Glasgow. Margaret Dunlop, charged with stealing a pair of boots from a shop. Thirty days.

Warrington Borough Police-court. Annie Mather, charged with stealing a pair of boots from a shop. One month.

East Harling Petty Sessions. Before Sir E. C. Nugent, Major Keppel, and Messrs. A. N. C. Hemsworth and W. H. Salter. John Reeve, charged with trespassing in search of conies. Fined £2 1s., in default twenty-one days.

Barnsley Police-court. Geo. Wm. Fox, charged with stealing two fowls. One month.

Abingdon Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and the Deputy-Mayor. Agnes Cross aged twenty-seven, charged with wandering abroad and having no visible means of subsistence. One month.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. George Ward, charged with stealing a pair of boots. Two months.

Retford County Police-court. Before Messrs. G. E. Vernon-Harcourt and H. Huntsman and General Ruck-Keane. John Batty and Charles Brassington, charged with poaching. Three months each.

Grantham Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. Frederick Johnson, charged with stealing a pair of boots from a shop. Six weeks.

Saltcoats Police-court. Before Provost Donaldson. Donald Sinclair, charged with assaulting his wife. He went home drunk, and because his wife refused to give him some money he thrashed her. Fined 40s.

Brierley Hill Police-court. James Street, charged with assaulting Harry Pearson. Complainant received a wound on the head, which had to be stitched up. Fined £1 1s. 6d.

Saxmundham Police-court. Before Messrs. D. P. Cooke and C. H. Lomax. Wm. Johnson and Frederick Smith, charged with stealing two pairs of boots from outside a shop. Three weeks each.

Dunfermline Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Shennan. Charles Combe, Andrew Hynd, and James Macdonald, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined £2 each and costs.

Wakefield West Riding Police-court. Samuel Hepworth charged with assaulting a constable. On being remonstrated with for his drunken and disorderly conduct defendant struck the officer a violent blow on the side of the head, and then took a running kick at him. His lamp saved the officer from a serious injury. The solicitor for the police authorities called the attention of the magistrates to the frequency of such assaults on constables in the district. Fined 29s., including costs, for the assault, and a further 9s. for drunkenness.

A familiar form of trick advertisement is being run by a firm calling themselves Osborn and Dawson, French milliners, 41, King William-street, E.C.—not exactly the neighbourhood to which one would naturally go in search of French millinery. The advertisement announces that a smart French sailor hat (picture appended) will be given away, provided you send postal order for 1s. 9d. for a pair of Osborn and Dawson's "latest Paris fashionable side combs, with a Pompadour to match." I do not know what a "Pompadour" may be, but perhaps it is something that is put on with the comb. On payment of 1s. 9d., the terms on which the smart French sailor hat is "given away" are revealed, namely, that you collect six other orders for combs and Pompadours and remit the cash, together with 6d. for carriage. In other words, the hat is "given away" when Osborn and Dawson have received 12s. 9d. for their combs. This is such a stale trick that it could only be practised on ignorant or inexperienced girls; and as anybody who knows anything of the advertising business can see the nature of the trick at a glance, it seems to me that the publisher of the advertisement is a degree more to blame than the advertiser.

The latest evidence of the ubiquity of the free portrait swindle comes from British North Borneo, where the irrepressible Tanquerey has been distributing his circulars. Not the least remarkable fact about this business is the industry which must be exercised in collecting the names and addresses of likely victims in these out-of-the-way parts of the world. I suppose the explanation is to be found in the trade which is done in the names and addresses of people who are addicted to answering newspaper advertisements. I am glad to know, at any rate, that with all his industry Tanquerey cannot find any region so benighted that TRUTH has not got there too.

As evidence of the unabated activity of the Spanish Prisoner, a solicitor sends me a batch of letters and documents with which a client of his was fooled, though not actually swindled. The client was a simple-minded man. Swallowing unsuspectingly the usual cock-and-bull story, he expressed his deep sympathy with his unknown relative by marriage, Antonio Garcia, in the sad situation in which he found himself—a dying prisoner in the castle fort of Barcelona. He readily agreed to become the protector of Antonio's darling young daughter, Amelia, and to take charge of the little fortune of £37,000, deposited in a bank in London, of which he (the protector) was to have one-fourth. Of course Antonio died immediately, his last moments comforted by this news, and equally, of course, the intended victim was requested to remit £73 to Barcelona to secure the release of the deceased's effects (seized by the authorities for the costs of his trial), and thereby obtain possession of the portmanteau in which he had concealed the receipt for the £37,000.

The supposed chaplain's letters, and the various fabricated official-looking certificates and other papers that he forwarded were accepted as perfectly genuine, and the dupe fully intended to remit the £73. Fortunately for himself, however, he found it necessary to consult a solicitor as to the raising of this sum, and so at the last moment his eyes were opened to the fraud that was being practised upon him. Unfortunately for them, a good many similarly credulous persons are able to dispatch the money without seeking anybody's advice or assistance, and consequently this venerable version of the confidence trick continues to flourish.

An inquiry has reached me respecting two money-lenders' advertisements which figure at the top of a long list of these traps for the unwary in the Daily Telegraph. The first is an advertisement of Howard and Cope, Limited, 3, Holles-street, W., "manager, Mr. C. P. Smith, Law Final, May, 1893." They offer advances on expectations under wills, reversions, settlements, etc., and they state that they "make a speciality of arranging loans for widows, even though restrained from borrowing, or if income ceases on re-marriage." All except a few odd shares in Howard and Cope, Limited, are held by "Frances Cope, sometimes known as Frances Smith," and to all intents and purposes C. P. Smith is not merely the manager but the company. His full name is Casson Perrott Smith. He first came under my observation some years ago, when as a solicitor he was doing the dirty legal work of various notorious usurers. For this his certificate as a solicitor was suspended for two years, and I shall be very much surprised if it has ever been renewed. Smith about the same period became a bankrupt, and for the gross misconduct which the investigation of his affairs revealed, his discharge was suspended for no less than ten years. The fact that that term will not expire till February 6, 1913, explains why he is nominally only the manager of this bloodsucking establishment at 3, Holles-street. One of the money-lending transactions dealt with in TRUTH, in which Smith played a part, was a monstrous and cruel fraud upon a widow, and widows in particular should therefore beware of him.

The other advertiser, Arthur Peel, 41, New Oxford-street, W.C., also offers advances to heirs under wills etc. This individual, who also has offices at 85, Lord-street, Liverpool, and 37, North Castle-street, Edinburgh, is practically a tout for a concern called the English and General Reversionary Company. The largest shareholder in this company is a Mrs. Elizabeth Douglas Norman, and Mr. Frederick Douglas Norman, carrying on business as Douglas Norman and Co., acts as solicitor for the company. In various cases of which I have received particulars from time to time persons entitled to reversions who applied to Peel for a loan have been fleeced in the most unprincipled manner; and I strongly advise heirs and other would-be borrowers to give both this harpy and the English and General Reversionary Company a wide berth.

The following advertisement has been appearing in the West of England:—

COPYING and WRITING.—Remunerative Home Work; no canvassing or outdoor work attached.—Stamped envelope to Godfrey, 54, Somerset Street, Cathay, Bristol.

Here is another proof of what I have said a hundred times—that no newspaper is justified in publishing any advertisement of home work without first obtaining satisfactory proof of its genuineness. Godfrey, otherwise "E. Godfrey and Co.," is engaged in one of the most ancient swindles practised through this form of advertisement. He has no work to offer at all. By suggesting that he has he obtains a payment of 1s. from his deluded victim, under the familiar pretext: "As we receive applications from many who apply out of mere curiosity, we are compelled to make a charge of 1s., the value of the necessary papers and particulars." Having got the money, he sends two fly-blown domestic recipes, and instructs the dupe how to dupe others in his turn by advertising these things and retailing them at 1s. each. In what I take to be the original form of this swindle the operator advertised the secret of earning £500 a year in your spare time, and having obtained half-a-crown, gave his dupe the pithy instruction, "Do as I do." The improvements introduced into the trick by later practitioners are probably designed to lay the ground for a defence in the event of prosecution; but I think the Bristol police might give Godfrey an opportunity of demonstrating how much the defence is worth before an intelligent magistrate.

"B. L. Challoner," a touting usurer, of Queen's Chambers, 7, Market-street, Manchester, seems to have awakened to the fact that many people resent the implication that they require a loan. "This circular letter," he writes, in the latest edition of that effusion, "is not to be taken as an insinuation that the recipient is in need of cash assistance; it is purely a business announcement, and should be treated as such." "B. L. Challoner" is indeed a very smooth-spoken shark. It is in consequence of "the difficulty experienced by gentlemen in obtaining financial assistance having frequently come under his notice," that he has been filled with a desire to let it be known that he makes advances from £10 to £5,000, and that, in order to do away with the necessity for visits and personal interviews, he is prepared to transact business by correspondence only. The impecunious would-be borrower who imagines from this that there will be no inquiries as to his resources and position underrates the astuteness of "B. L. Challoner." That individual, whose real name is Bernard Kletz, is a long way from being such a philanthropist as his circular suggests, and, in common with the rest of the tribe to which he belongs, he should be given a wide berth.

When speaking last week of the possibility of extending banking hours, I was careful to say that I was reluctant to make such a suggestion knowing the extent to which bank clerks are sweated and over-worked already, but this has not prevented my receiving a letter from an ex-bank official, who tells me that if I had ever spent a week behind a bank counter I should never have published the paragraph at all. I do not know about that. It has been said in Truth again and again, and was repeated last week, that there is no reason, banking profits being what they are, why the staffs should be over-worked or under-paid, nor would there be if the working day were extended by another hour or two. The correspondent just mentioned states that he had to retire because at the end of fourteen years' service in one of the large joint-stock banks he had to work constantly from 8.30 a.m. to 8 or 9 p.m. for inadequate pay; and that in a country branch with which he is now familiar the ledger-keepers had been regularly working from November to the end of the year up to 10 p.m. There can be no question that bank clerks as a class have more serious grievances than any other kind of employees. I say "as a class," because I believe that in some of the private banks which still survive the case is different. But really the remedy lies in the hands of the aggrieved. Labour is the master in these days whenever it chooses to use its power.

I do not imagine that there is much danger that the "charity habit" will ever become so dangerous as, say, the "drink habit," but really if new inventions in the direction of making the art of giving easier for us continue to increase, quite a lot of us will become charitable without knowing it. The Dutch Government have just initiated a pleasantly ingenious scheme for helping the work of fighting tuberculosis, by issuing a series of stamps towards that end. They are of double the ordinary values—that is to say, that where you would employ a penny stamp in the ordinary course you must use a twopenny one—but half of the receipts from this issue are to be devoted to the various institutions which are combating tuberculosis. Who could resist this most innocuous form of indirect charitable taxation, and for such a purpose?

IN MEMORIAM:

Alfred Shaw. Died January 16, 1907.

He's left us, Alfred Shaw the Great,
So long a King of Cricket,
Whose life was, like his bowling, straight
And always on the wicket.

Aye! never careless, loose, nor slack,
For hard work always ready,
Through many a match, in days far back,
He bowled unchanged and steady.

But now, his Captain, knowing best—
The World's all-wise Controller—
Has taken off, for well-earned rest,
This staunch old veteran bowler.

The West Indies are truly the most unlucky of our dependencies. In any place and at any time, the earthquake that has destroyed Kingston would have excited universal horror and sympathy. Coming as it does when Jamaica showed signs of recovering at last from the economic depression that has so long weighed upon the West Indian islands, it is doubly deplorable. Such a case makes an exceptionally strong appeal to British generosity, not at home only, but throughout the Empire, and it is to be hoped that the result will be seen in the Relief Fund. It is an occasion when we may all show ourselves Imperialists with a good conscience, and do something to strengthen ties with and between the Colonies which are worth strengthening.

As if the earthquake were not a sufficient calamity in itself, it has been exaggerated by being made the occasion for a British Colonial Governor to administer a most churlish snub to the representatives of the United States. Presumably what is at the root of this "regrettable incident" is the jealousy of American encroachment which is so strong among the Jingo element of the West Indies. The American Admiral possibly provoked this sentiment by the national method of going to work by a straight cut when he sees that work had to be done, and not troubling much about forms and ceremonies. But in such circumstances it is the British habit as much as the American not to stand upon ceremony, and only a cantankerous churl would raise questions of etiquette where the intention of an act is noble and sensible, still less amuse himself with sneers and sarcasms. Apparently Sir Alexander Swettenham is the sort of a man who, if his house were on fire and a passing stranger broke open the door and pulled him out of bed, would ask him what the devil he meant by such officious impertinence. There are such people in all countries and in most walks of life, but they ought not to be Colonial Governors.

Although no experts seem to believe in Mr. Hugh Clements' theory of weather variations and earthquakes, I cannot help thinking, in my ignorance, that astronomical causes must be closely mixed up with all these phenomena. We live, as I understand it, on a hollow globular contrivance, with a very thin crust, spinning through space by the force of its original impulse, like a football when it is kicked off. It is held in a definite course by the attraction of the sun, which is continually pulling at it. It holds in the same way a subsidiary globe, which is also continually pulling at it, and with no small force, as we see when the tides of the ocean swing backwards and forwards under the pull. There are, I suppose, minor pulls from other neighbouring planets, varying in intensity from time to time. The shell of the earth varying in composition, and also possibly in thickness, what more natural than that it should occasionally "give" a trifle under these varying pulls and strains, especially when two, or more, of them happen to be exerted on the same spot at the same moment? So far from its being at all wonderful that the crust of the earth should occasionally "shiver" at weak spots under the outside forces bearing upon it, the only wonder to my mind is that it does not do so more often.

When it is said that the shivering is due to volcanic explosions in the interior of the earth, I cannot see that this helps us very much. The tremors generally occur most violently in certain well-defined regions, and are very often accompanied by volcanic eruptions in the neighbourhood. But if such phenomena are entirely local in origin, the question still remains, What causes them? Why should subterraneous fire break out suddenly at one place, die down (perhaps for ten, twenty, or a hundred years), and then as suddenly blaze up again? True, a fire may occasionally be seen to behave somewhat in this way above ground, but only when fresh combustible material is supplied. Does any one suppose that a local fire is perennially smouldering, let us say, under Mount Vesuvius, and that every few years fresh fuel is somehow shot into it, causing it to flare up, explode, and shake the whole neighbourhood?

There may be astronomical causes for volcanic disturbances, too. I am not concerned to propound any theory on the subject, being merely a man in the street humbly trying to understand why things are as they are. When one who has patiently studied the subject asserts that lengthy observations reveal a correspondence between certain celestial and terrestrial incidents, and when he even goes the length of predicting such terrestrial incidents with some approach to accuracy on the strength of similar correspondence on previous occasions, all I say is that, whether he be right or wrong, what he says is just what I should expect from the nature of the case. His theory, therefore, is entitled to serious consideration, and it can only be effectually disposed of by showing that the alleged correspondence between the two sets of phenomena does not really exist. If this can be done, it can be done very easily.

It is by no means easy to arrive at a sound conclusion as to what is really going on in Russia, or what will be the outcome. All the conditions are so different from those of any other country that we cannot estimate the present or the future by assuming them to be the same. During the reign of Alexander II., the peasants regarded the Czar as their protector against their landlords, and it must be remembered that in European Russia the peasants constitute nearly ninety per cent. of the population. Alexander II. had to wage war against the Nihilists. Their idea was that the conditions of existence, not only in Russia but everywhere else, were so bad, that everything should be destroyed as a preliminary to building up something else. As a logical result of this view, they burnt and murdered.

It was under these circumstances that Alexander III. came to the throne. He was a man of nerve and determination, and, in the main, the country sided with him against the Nihilists. Under the present Czar, who is a man of very different mould, the struggle became one not only with the Nihilists, but with all those who wished for a reasonable constitutional régime, and it is clear that this desire became almost universal after the disastrous war with Japan. Then came concessions on the part of the Czar. A Constitution was granted and the Duma met. It effected little and was dissolved and another Duma has been summoned. In the meantime, law and order have more or less disappeared. Not only are officials murdered every day, but bombs are recklessly thrown into crowds, shops are pillaged, houses are set on fire, and all this is met by savage repression. A large section of the nation simply looks on whilst the struggle between autocracy and constitutional liberty is carried on in this fashion.

All our journalistic quidnuncs appear to be on the side of the anarchists. They justify all that they do, and denounce all that is done by the Government. In a country such as Russia I do not believe that a constitutional rule such as ours can be brought at once into existence. I am for liberty, but also for law and order. It seems to me that the future of Russia depends, not only upon the future action of the Czar, but also on the future action of the constitutionalists. If the latter hold aloof, or if they make common cause with the anarchists, the end will be a return to autocracy, and hating the latter, I really should—were I a Russian—prefer this to the rule of the other extremists. I am no believer in the creed of assassination. I have not the slightest sympathy with those who are executed for practising it. When Alexander II. was assassinated, he was about to publish a Constitution. His son did not publish it, and this was the natural result of the assassination. It looks as though the Army in the main will stand by the Czar. He seems desirous to establish some sort of representative Assembly. Were I a Russian I should accept for the nonce such an Assembly, although I might desire that its powers were greater. I should endeavour to accustom the country to look to this Assembly as the exponent of the national will. If this were once done, the power of the assembly would develop year by year. But it needs time for both the Czar and the country to realise what self-government really is.

THE CUSTOMER AND HIS FREE LUNCH.

A certain Shop, well known to Fame—
I need not here disclose its Name—
The Public to attract and please,
Offered free Luncheons and free Teas
To any Persons whosoe'er
Might come to do their Shopping there.
  At first, it proved a mighty Draw,
And Throngs the Salon daily saw;
But soon Complaints about the Food
Were heard, and that with Reason good;
For, keen Expenses down to keep,
The Caterer ran it on the Cheap,
Bought only most inferior Stuff,
Mutton and Beef, coarse, stringy, tough
(And e'en of that there's not enough);
Gave aged Hen and called it Chicken,
Although your Fork you scarce could stick in;
For Butter served up Margarine,
And Rolls that younger Days had seen;
In Brief, the Grub, from first to last, I
May just sum up as cheap and nasty.
  One Day—when it was extra vile,
And served in worse than usual Style—
A Man, disgusted with his Fare,
Sent, angry, for the Manager:
  "D'ye call this Beef—this Leather coarse?
'Fore Gad, but I dare swear it's Horse.
And those, Potatoes? Dash my Bones!
They more resemble Cobble-stones.
I wonder how such Stuff you can Set down before a Christian Man!"
  The Manager, with haughty Stare,
And coolly independent Air,
"Pray, Sir, remember," made Retort,
"That you your Luncheon get for Nought;
And rank bad Taste it seems to me,
To growl at what's provided free."
  "Ha!" cried the other, "That's your Line?
The Argument's all very fine;
But where's the Kindness, pray, in treating
A Chap to what he can't be eating?
I'd much prefer—whate'er the Price—
TO PAY, and have my Luncheon nice!"

SCRUTATOR.

HOW THE TIMES GETS BOOKS.

SOME three months have now elapsed since the majority of the London publishers ceased to supply books to the Times Book Club in consequence of the refusal of the Times to accept the trade terms in regard to the sale of books at a discount. When that event occurred, Mr. Moberly Bell announced confidently that the Times would be able to obtain and supply its customers with books in spite of all that the publishers could do. This boast has not been fulfilled to the letter. The Times has made no secret of the fact, because it has publicly appealed to its subscribers to refrain from asking for certain new books. It is doing so up to the present moment, as may be seen by reference to its literary supplement of Friday last, where in three instances a review of a book is accompanied by a request that subscribers will "co-operate with the Times to defeat the Publishers' Trust" by abstaining from ordering this book as far as possible. But nevertheless, during these three months the Book Club has been able to place on its list, and to offer for sale in its windows, a considerable number of new books, and to that extent Mr. Moberly Bell is justified in saying that his boast has been fulfilled.

Those who interest themselves in the dispute between the Times and the publishers must have wondered how this has been done. In some cases, of course, the Times has been reduced to buying books in the retail market like any other member of the public; and when subscribers to the Book Club have asked for particular books, notwithstanding the appeals to them to co-operate with the Times in the trade dispute, they have been requested to order the book themselves from their booksellers and send the bill to the Book Club. But it is evident that the business of the Book Club cannot be profitably conducted in this way. A lending library and bookseller's shop, if it is to compete with others in the same line of business, must obtain the bulk of its books on the same terms as its competitors. It stands to reason, therefore, that when the Times is able to offer either in its circulating library or for sale large quantities of books published since the dispute occurred, these books must have been obtained surreptitiously. The Times was fighting not only the publishers, but the bookselling trade—in fact, the publishers had no motive for quarrelling with the Book Club except to defend the retail bookseller, whose business the Times was cutting into. In order, therefore, to place orders for books on any considerable scale on trade terms, it was necessary for the Times to procure the co-operation of booksellers who would "black-leg" against their own trade organisation, and conceal from the publishers the fact that they were supplying the Book Club. "Black-legs" being mostly very small men, and the publishers being well on their guard, it was not easy to obtain very considerable supplies through this channel. But there was another more easy of access and more difficult for the publishers to watch effectually—namely, the export trade. When books are ordered for export to foreign countries or the colonies, a publisher may not suspect at first sight that their real destination is 376, Oxford-street, W., and even if he has his suspicions, it is very difficult for him to verify them. There is every reason to suppose that this has been the channel through which the Times has chiefly been supplied with books during the past three months. Necessarily the working of the business on these lines has involved the use of misrepresentation and deception. Necessarily the Times, as the instigator and chief beneficiary in the business, is responsible for these practices. To what depths it has been dragged in carrying on these operations will be seen from a few facts which I will now give in detail.

In the last week in November a Mr. Lee, holding a responsible position in the service of Messrs. Richardson and Co., Export Booksellers, of 25, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, happened to meet in private life a gentleman named Heath, who was known to him as a sub-manager of the Times Book Club. The two got into conversation about the affairs of the Book Club, and in the course of it Mr. Heath suggested to Mr. Lee that Messrs. Richardson and Co. might be of use to the Book Club in procuring books which the publishers refused to supply to the Book Club direct. Mr. Lee was much interested in this proposition, and desiring to learn more of what was going on, arranged that he would call at the Times Book Club and have a little conversation with the manager. Mr. Heath gave him his card, on which he is described as of the Times, and on November 27 Mr. Lee called at the Book Club, saw Mr. Heath, and was introduced by him to Mr. Carr, the Manager. Mr. Lee explained that he had been given to understand that the Book Club would be disposed to employ Messrs. Richardson and Co. as agents for the purchase of books for export, and Mr. Carr assented, asking him to state his terms. Mr. Lee made a proposal, and eventually Mr. Carr gave him the following letter:—

The Times Book Club,
376 to 384, Oxford Street,
London, W.
November 27, 1906.

Dear Sir,—In consideration of your supplying the books as ordered by us for export at ordinary export terms, you to deliver to the export packers as instructed by us, we are prepared to pay you cash on delivery plus 5 per cent. commission. It is also understood that we will give you orders from time to time upon which the total commission shall be not less than £50 (fifty pounds). Commission to be paid weekly. Yours faithfully,
G. H. Carr, Manager.

Mr. Lee,
c/o Messrs. Richardson and Co.,
25, Suffolk Street,
Pall Mall East, S.W.

This document having been handed to Mr. Lee, Mr. Carr called up one of his staff, asked him what books were required, and then proceeded to dictate to a typist a list of books. For this purpose he took from his desk a blank order form with the printed heading of a Mr. C. W. Twelves, of Antwerp. Below I give the document as completed. It is dated November 26, as is also the one which follows it, but Mr. Lee is clear that all these three documents were handed to him at the interview, and that the interview took place on November 27. The object of putting the date November 26 upon the two documents which purport to have come from Antwerp is obvious. The note "Deliver to Messrs. Harrington and Co.," etc., was added by Mr. Carr in ink later in the interview. The words "Please supply for export" are printed in red ink; the list of books is type-written:—

On this document being handed to him, Mr. Lee pointed out that he could not consider it as an order, and at his request Mr. Carr dictated, signed, and handed to him the following letter:—

C. W. Twelves
Import and Export

19, Kipdorp,
Antwerp, November 26, 1906.

Dear Sirs,—We enclose herewith list of books, which please supply for export, delivering same to our order to:—

Claridge's Hotel, Brook-street, Grosvenor-square.—Over 300 rooms; nearly 100 bathrooms. Royal suite, private entrance. Situation ensures perfect quiet.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Carr keeps in stock at 376, Oxford-street, the printed order forms of Mr. Twelves, of Antwerp; and further, that his relations with Mr. Twelves are such that he draws up a letter on Mr. Twelves' paper at 376, Oxford-street, and signs it with Mr. Twelves' name. Mr. Lee states that he went the length of asking whether there was such a person as Mr. Twelves in existence—a question which seems justifiable under the circumstances. Mr. Carr replied that Mr. Twelves not only existed, but was a personal friend of his, and was in a big way of business. Mr. Lee next discussed the question of invoices, and Mr. Carr instructed him that the invoices were to be sent to the Times Book Club, and that Messrs. Richardson and Co. would be paid upon them in cash. He was also furnished with a printed envelope addressed to Mr. G. H. Carr at the Times Book Club, and marked "Private," Mr. Carr explaining that this was to be used in case Mr. Lee had occasion to communicate with him on business, and with a packet of labels printed with the address of Messrs. Harrington and Co., to whom the books were to be delivered. He states that he saw upon the table numbers of similar printed labels addressed to other firms, including Messrs. Driffell Poulter and Co., 12, Redcross-street, E.C.; Messrs. E. Isaac and Co., 16A, Bevis Marks, St. Mary Axe, E.C.; and Messrs. Nye, Craig, and Co., 60, Cheapside, E.C.

Mr. Lee adds that in the course of conversation he asked Mr. Carr how he was getting his books, and Mr. Carr told him that the Book Club had some fifty agents, but none of them were in as good a position as Messrs. Richardson and Co. That was their chief difficulty, the agents being such small people that the Book Club could only place very small orders with each, and for this reason it was important to them that they should have a firm in Messrs. Richardson and Co.'s position. He explained that the agents mostly kept quite small shops, and were to be found "here, there, and everywhere." He would not mention any names, but he incidentally let out that he had an agent or agents in Lincoln. He said that if necessary the Book Club would have 5,000 such agents, and little men were pleased to do the work, and he congratulated himself on the inability of the publishers to interfere with the trade of the Book Club in this direction. This was the substance of the interview.

Needless to say, Messrs. Richardson and Co. had no intention of joining the Times Book Club in a scheme to obtain books from the publishers on the false pretence that they were intended for export. Mr. Carr speedily discovered this by telephonic communication, whereupon he wrote Mr. Lee as follows:—

The Times Book Club,
376 to 384, Oxford-street, London, W.
November 29, 1906.

Private.

Dear Sir,—I shall be glad if you will kindly see that the export order handed to you the other day is duly returned to me, as you are of course aware that the transaction we had in view was strictly confidential, and, as a matter of fact, from what you said I inferred that you were making the arrangement with the sanction of your principals. However, I am sorry we are unable to do any business, at the same time shall be glad if you will please return to me the order in question.—Yours faithfully,

For The Times Book Club,
G. H. Carr.

Mr. Carr subsequently wrote to Messrs. Richardson, giving his own version of what had passed, and again requesting the return of the "export order." Messrs. Richardson, who had at once communicated the facts to the Booksellers' Association, declined to give up the order, and on Mr. Carr writing again with a request for an interview, they replied that the documents spoke for themselves, and that they did not intend to discuss the matter further with him.

It will be noted that among the firms whose names appeared on the labels which Mr. Lee saw on Mr. Carr's table is that of Messrs. Driffell Poulter and Co. of 12, Redcross-street, E.C. This circumstance throws an interesting light on another correspondence which I have before me. On November 13 last Messrs. Poulter and Co. wrote to Messrs. Macmillan, inquiring their "best shipping terms for prompt cash," which were duly furnished, and on November 20 Messrs. Poulter sent an order for certain books to be delivered upon such terms. This led to the following correspondence:—

Nov. 21.—Macmillan and Co. to Poulter and Co.

Dear Sirs,—We assume that the goods ordered by you on the 20th inst. are required, as stated in your letter of Nov. 13, for "export," and have made out the estimate (enclosed) upon that assumption.

Your name, however, being unknown to us, before supplying the books on "export" terms, we must ask that you definitely state for what part of the world they are required.—We are, etc.,

Nov. 23.—Poulter and Co. to Macmillan and Co.

Gentlemen,—In reply to yours of the 21st we do not understand your reasons for making the inquiry, but our client is a South African merchant, and our instructions are for Natal. How they will be distributed we have no knowledge.—We are, etc.,

Nov. 24.—Macmillan and Co. to Poulter and Co.

Dear Sirs,—We are in receipt of your favour of the 23rd inst., and note that the goods ordered in yours of the 20th inst. are required for export to Durban. The reason for our inquiry was that we know a London house, to which we have refused to supply our publications, is attempting to obtain them on export terms through indirect channels, and, as we wish to avoid if possible having to take action against any firm or firms for obtaining or attempting to obtain goods under false pretences, we have adopted the plan of giving warning to any new customer who approaches us with a view to purchasing for export. As the goods are required for South Africa, if, when you are sending cheque, you will kindly forward the full address of your customer, we will deal with the shipping of them.—We are, etc.,

Messrs. Poulter did not answer this last letter, and it looks as if the allusion to attempting to obtain goods under false pretences somewhat disconcerted them. After waiting till November 29, Messrs. Macmillan wrote that they were anxious to get the South African order out of the way, and would be glad to have the remittance and particulars asked for in their letter of the 24th. Still Messrs. Poulter remained silent. On December 7, Messrs. Macmillan wrote in considerably stronger terms, expressing astonishment, and saying that the matter looked to them like an attempt to obtain goods for export under false pretences, and they proposed to deal with it on that footing. This brought at once the following reply, dated December 8:—

Gentlemen,—In reply to your favour of the 7th inst., we regret your memo. of the date referred to could not be promptly answered, and assure you of our bona-fides in this matter of export commission. An explanation is, however, due to you, which we hope to make and convey to you at an early date, and possibly on Monday next.—I am, yours very truly, etc.,

Driffell Poulter.

"Monday next" came, but did not bring the explanation thus acknowledged to be due to Messrs. Macmillan, nor has that firm heard anything more from Messrs. Poulter since the letter of December 8. Messrs. Macmillan's suspicion that the transaction looked like an attempt to obtain their goods on export terms by false pretences is certainly not negatived when labels addressed to Messrs. Driffell Poulter and Co. are found lying on the table of the Manager of the Times Book Club. In view of this fact, and of the failure of Messrs. Poulter and Co. to furnish Messrs. Macmillan with the promised explanation, the reader will have no difficulty in placing his own construction upon the correspondence above referred to.

Free From Farrow's Bank.—"Farrow's Bank: Its History Objects, and Work."—Chairman, Thomas Farrow, Author of "The Moneylender Unmasked," &c.—Write or call, 29, New Bridge-st., Ludgate-circus, E.C., and Brighton, Norwich, and Croydon.

Another London publisher, Mr. William Heinemann, furnishes evidence showing still more forcibly the devious paths by which books reach the Book Club, and the elaborate artifices employed to impose upon the London publishers. About the middle of October, shortly after the declaration of war, Mr. Heinemann received an inquiry as to the price of Mr. Bram Stoker's "Life of Sir Henry Irving" from the Anglo-Deutsches Annoncen- und Reclame-Bureau, of Ferdinand-strasse, Hamburg, of which a Herr Friedrich Lehfeldt appears to be the principal. The inquiry was for "250 copies, free Hamburg," and, it was added, "we might do with 500." Mr. Heinemann gave his price, which was accepted, and 100 copies were dispatched. There followed an order for fifty copies of the "Hohenlohe Memoirs." These large orders for English books naturally excited suspicion under existing circumstances. Accordingly, before the first order was executed Mr. Heinemann telegraphed to his Hamburg customer, requesting him to promise that the "Irving" was not for sale in Great Britain. Herr Lehfeldt wired back "Books for Germany," and followed the reply with a letter displaying complete innocence of collusion with anybody in England. He wrote:—

> Your wire is somewhat of a riddle to us. We are not buying books for England, but for Germany and export. How could we in Hamburg buy books from England for England; what would be the utility or object, and why should you raise the question? We trust there has been no delay in the despatch of the books, otherwise we must ask you at your expense to send them by the quickest route possible, if not already despatched, to Harwich. . . . . .

> We are advertising in this country, and making a speciality of supplying English books at the original published price, and delay in despatching would be very serious to us.

Notwithstanding this display of innocence Mr. Heinemann had instructed his forwarding agents to detain the books pending instructions, and this led to a further protest from Herr Lehfeldt against this "extraordinary proceeding." "We have advertised," he wrote, "in the Berlin, Frankfurt, Leipsig, Stuttgart, and Hamburg papers, etc. We have actually got money from customers in our hands, and now we cannot supply," and so on. In a subsequent letter, having been informed of the stoppage of the consignment, he warned Mr. Heinemann that a writ would be issued. In yet another letter, having heard in the meantime from communications between his own and the English shipping agents that Mr. Heinemann "believed the goods were for a Mr. Hooper," he repudiated Mr. Hooper, and intimated that he should claim £45 damages and costs if the books were not delivered by a specified date. The communications between the two firms were complicated by a misunderstanding on a matter of price, but as that has nothing to do with the matter in hand there is no occasion to go into it. It is sufficient to say that to the last Herr Lehfeldt remained firm in his repudiation of all knowledge of the Times Book Club. He ultimately became very angry, not to say abusive, and in his last letter, dated December 1, he asks to be excused for saying that Mr. Heinemann's previous communication "is contemptible beyond degree," and that "his assumption that we sold any books to the Times Book Club is a piece of gratuitous impertinence." In the meantime, Mr. Heinemann had allowed the books to be delivered. But he had first taken the precaution of getting them back and stamping them with a private mark, which enabled him to identify them beyond question, and after they had been delivered he watched for their reappearance in London. He had not long to wait. Within a fortnight of Mr. Lehfeldt's last letter, Mr. Heinemann obtained from the Times Book Club one of the very copies of the "Life of Irving" which he had supplied to the Anglo-Deutsches Annoncen- und Reclame-Bureau.

Herr Lehfeldt's strange innocence of the Times Book Club, and his impatience with the suspicious attitude of the London publishers, are further revealed in a letter written a week or two later to another London firm. This letter is dated on December 12 from Frankfurt a/M., whither the Anglo-Deutsches Annoncen- und Reclame-Bureau had removed from Hamburg during the negotiations with Mr. Heinemann. It has reference to the English edition of the Hohenlohe Memoirs, for which there seems to have been at this period an insatiable craving in Germany, and after inquiring the price of the book, Mr. Lehfeldt proceeds:—

> We may tell you quite frankly we are experiencing great difficulty in getting books we want, because every publisher seems to think there can be only one outlet at the present time, and that is the Times Book Club.
> That common sense does not tell them to send such a work from London to Frankfurt and from Frankfurt to London would make that book cost the full published price, and hence can be bought as cheaply at any bookseller's shop in London, does not say much for the intelligence of these worthy gentlemen, but it is quite certain "Convince a London publisher against his will, and he remains an unbeliever still," and we cannot move them.
> If now you can help us we shall be glad to have price. No indirect statement that you can procure books will assist us at all. If you can write and say how many copies you can procure for us we will arrange to pay you c.o.d. in London through our forwarding carriers.

There is no hint here, it will be seen, of any limit to the number required. Apparently Herr Lehfeldt is ready to take all the Hohenlohe Memoirs he can get. What a trade he must be doing in English books over in Germany! I am not asserting that he was himself buying books for the Times. It is quite consistent with his letters that some other agent of the Times in Germany was buying of him, and that his protestations of innocence were genuine. But if he was innocent, he will recognise now that his ridicule of the absurd suspicions of the London publishers was singularly unfortunate, seeing that he himself was at that very moment being used as a channel of supply for the Book Club.

I might add that from another letter received by Mr. Heinemann in December it is pretty clear that a second Hamburg firm were being approached at this period on behalf of the Times, but, unlike Mr. Lehfeldt, on learning more of the trade situation in London, they at once withdrew from the negotiation. This firm state that they had been commissioned by another German firm, whose name they were not then at liberty to disclose, to order books from eight different London publishers, and the scale of the orders may be judged from the fact that they included 364 copies of "Sir Nigel" and 364 of "The Far Horizon." The latter book, it will be noted, is another one which the Book Club wanted badly at this time. On November 27 Mr. Carr had ordered, through Messrs. Richardson, 208 copies of it on behalf of Twelves, of Antwerp.

What is to be thought of practices such as are revealed in the negotiation with Messrs. Richardson and Co., described above, not to mention any of the other incidents? Judged by any generally acceptable standard of commercial honour, they can only be described as disreputable. As the practices, the habitual practices, of the authorised agents of a journal long pre-eminent by its high standards of conduct, and still aspiring to a leading position in English journalism, they must fill every right-minded observer with dismay and disgust. A puzzle-headed champion of the Times may possibly say that the Book Club has been exposed to an unfair trade boycott which justifies the use of even these weapons in self-defence. But this is nonsense. The Book Club is exposed to no boycott. It can obtain its books to-morrow, if it chooses, on the same terms as every other bookseller and every other circulating library. By its own choice it refuses to do so. If it were true that in this choice it is actuated by a disinterested public spirit, and not by the necessities of its own self-created situation, the fact would still remain that the quarrel with the publishers is of its own seeking. For the employment in such a quarrel of such weapons as organised misrepresentation and deception there can be no excuse. Neither can it be said that for the resort to such practices the Times itself is not responsible. At the outset of the "book war" is was announced officially and ostentatiously that the Book Club was originated and conducted by the Times, and that no individual or firm but the Times is responsible for its existence and management. Moreover, Mr. Moberly Bell has told us that the Times meant to get all the books it wanted, and that the publishers could not stop it from doing so. He presumably knew how the thing could be done. And Mr. Moberly Bell is the manager, not of the Times Book Club, but of the Times newspaper. It follows that for whatever there is discreditable in the proceedings described above the Times is responsible. I say this in no spirit of animosity to the Times or its proprietors. I am sorry to have to say it. But it cannot be concealed, for it is this that converts a squalid exhibition of sharp practice in a trade dispute into a scandal deserving public reprobation.

THE INDIAN FAMILY PENSION SCHEME.

Since I wrote upon this subject last November, I have received a number of letters and a good deal of information which leads me to form an even more unfavourable opinion of this scheme than I formerly expressed. My previous indictment was largely based upon the fact that in the five years 1893 to 1898 the interest amounted to £179,111, the total subscriptions to £314,597, making total receipts of £493,708. The pensions and management expenses during the same period amounted to only £126,018, or about one-fourth of the receipts from interest and subscriptions. It has been pointed out to me that this is not necessarily a proof that the subscriptions are too much or the pensions too little, but in view of the fact that in 1898 the scheme had been in existence for twenty-five years the correspondent who took some exception to my remarks is now disposed to think that the truth lies somewhere between his original opinion and the opinion which I expressed. The accumulation of funds to provide for future liabilities is a necessity of sound finance, and the figures, coupled with the age of the scheme, suggest that such provision for the future is being carried to extremes. Unfortunately, this is a matter which neither my correspondent nor I are in a position to settle, for the simple but very serious reason that the necessary data are not available, owing to the hole-and-corner fashion in which this thing is managed, or mismanaged, in some Government office, without any adequate information being supplied to the subscribers or given in any publication. This absence of publicity is one of the many objections to the scheme. I have received the regulations in regard to it, published in Calcutta in 1904, and sundry extracts from the Gazette of India. I am not without means of obtaining information upon most subjects, but I am free to confess that there are a great many things about this scheme which I should like to know and which I have not been able to find out. I should be grateful to any one who will send me further information.

I called my former article the "Indian Family Pension Fund"; this was a misnomer; it is not a Fund. The regulations say, "No insurance fund is established by these regulations. The contributions will be credited and the pensions charged directly to the Indian revenues as military receipts and charges. . . . The Government of India does not intend by these regulations to sanction any further expenditure for this object. . . . and does not intend that the pensions provided shall be any charge to the Indian Revenue." It is, however, stated that pro formâ accounts will be kept for the purpose of ascertaining whether payments and benefits are duly proportioned. "The Secretary of State for India in Council has reserved to himself the absolute right to regulate from time to time the contributions to be required. . . . and to make any alterations in the regulations themselves. . . . provided always that the scale of pensions shall not be reduced in the case of actual incumbents. . . . But if it should appear that the contributions have been fixed too low the Government will not require any supplementary retrospective payments; and if they are found to have been fixed too high no claim to refund will be admitted." I understand that about 1899, after the valuation up to the end of 1898, the subscriptions were increased and the pensions left unaltered. From all this it would appear that nothing is guaranteed to anybody; that if the subscriptions paid since 1873 were at too low a rate the deficit is to be made good by subsequent contributions; the Peters of the future are to be robbed for the purpose of paying the Pauls of the past; while if the Pauls of the past have paid too much the benefit is to go to the Peters of the future. Had the scheme been worked by a life assurance company instead of by a Government department, care would have been taken to see that the rates of contribution were adequate, that the benefits were absolutely guaranteed not to be less than a specified minimum, and that if experience showed the existence of a surplus the members who contributed to the surplus, or their beneficiaries, would have received by way of bonus a fair share of the excess amounts that had been paid. As it is, this pension scheme is a mere haphazard arrangement, with nothing guaranteed by or to anybody, chargeable to no definite fund, with nothing but pro forma accounts, and an entire absence of adequate information about it.

Another point to which, as I think quite rightly, many of my correspondents take exception is that subscriptions are compulsory. The regulations say "every officer who enters the service on and after January 1, 1873, must, as a condition of his appointment, provide pensions for his family under these regulations." The contributions are stopped from officers' pay, and the whole tenor of the regulations, as well as the remarks of my correspondents, go to show that subscription to the scheme is compulsory upon unmarried officers and childless widowers. I do not see how a man is to provide for his family when he has not got a family, so that I am not entirely certain that the regulation quoted above makes contributions by unmarried officers necessary, though this is evidently the practice. I will return to the question of unmarried men presently, but before leaving the question of compulsion it is appropriate to remark that much more satisfactory terms and conditions than those given under this scheme could be obtained from first-class insurance companies, and that even if it is considered appropriate to compel officers to make provision for their widows and children, they should at least have the option of doing so by methods which they consider greatly superior to those of this scheme.

One enormous difficulty in the way of obtaining freedom from this irksome burden is that no subscriber can take any active steps in opposition to it. One lady writes to me: "I have heard officers complain bitterly about the Fund, but they are so placed that they cannot agitate like any other body of men about their grievances as it may tell against them professionally." The Bombay Military Fund goes so far as to "exclude subscribers from all the benefits derivable from the Fund . . . . on the bringing under litigation any decision which has been passed in conformity to these regulations." A man may not even seek justice in the Law Courts.

There are sundry regulations which are palpably unfair. It is provided that the pension shall be withheld "if any pensioner is found to be leading an immoral life, or on proof of any gross misconduct." The benefits talked about include pensions to daughters up to the time of their marriage, and if a daughter happens to go wrong, perhaps through no fault of her own, the pension, bought by payments extending over many years made by her father, is entirely lost in circumstances which, in her father's view, would probably make the pension more necessary than ever. Again, "an officer who is dismissed the service will cease, ipso facto, to be a contributor and will have no claim to any refund. His family will not be entitled to any pensions." Just when the pensions which have been paid for are most needed they are withheld. Yet again it appears that "when a wife obtains a divorce from her husband the subscription of the latter will be reduced to the unmarried rate"; and when the wife is the guilty party the subscription is also reduced to the unmarried rate. I can only imagine that this means that the innocent wife of a guilty husband is thereby debarred from any possibility of receiving a pension. Yet another unfair regulation provides that a widow's pension ceases on her re-marriage, but can be resumed on the death of her second husband. If, however, the second husband was a contributor to the Fund, she cannot receive the benefits paid for by both her husbands, but can only draw the pension paid for by one of them. All these conditions are absolutely preposterous in a financial contract. The benefits have been paid for and ought not to be withheld on such grounds as these.

I suppose I shall be told that it is quite wrong to regard this scheme as implying any financial contract. As a matter of fact I do not regard it so. I quite see that individual officers are compelled to pay, but there is nothing anywhere implying an adequate guarantee that their dependants are certain to receive anything. Moreover, it is apparently a kind of compulsory charity. The only benefits that are even supposed to be provided are certain annuities for wives and children, and unmarried officers and widowers without children are practically compelled to subscribe amounts varying from about £30 a year downwards. Several of my correspondents put it to me very emphatically that a married officer does not expect or wish his bachelor brother officers to subscribe to a pension for his widow, for this is what it amounts to. I entirely agree that this is a most objectionable feature, not merely for the unmarried men, but for the married officers and their widows as well. Moreover, there are certain features in which the unmarried officers seem to be treated even worse than the married ones. Regulation 26 says, "Officers who may be transferred from the Indian Army . . . and officers who resign the service will be entitled to receive back such portion of their contributions as may be in excess of the risk borne during their membership, but they cannot continue subscribers. . . . No refund will be made in respect of unmarried subscriptions or for risks that have terminated by death or otherwise." Of course, no risk has been borne in the case of unmarried members, and, if they resign, everything they have paid is lost, while the married officers, to whom the scheme might be of some service, are refunded part of what they have paid.

There are a great many other things that I should like to say—and that I intend to say on some future occasion—about this unfair and ill-devised scheme. In addition to very material alterations in most of the conditions, it is of the utmost importance that every effort should be directed to the creation of a separate fund, to the publication of the accounts in channels readily accessible to all subscribers, to the appointment of a committee of managers elected by those who contribute, and to the abolition of the compulsion which at present exists.

This is by no means the only Government pension fund which is unsatisfactory in its conditions and unfair in its working, nor are the pension funds of railways and other big corporations by any means free from somewhat serious objections of a similar kind. One especially objectionable feature of many of these is that the benefits are determined either by rank or by salary received, and that a direct consequence of this pernicious principle is to favour the well-to-do at the expense of those who are badly off, and to depart altogether from the sound system of maintaining a due proportion between payments made and benefits received.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN GRETNA GREEN.

Several incidents that have furnished copy to the daily papers during the last six months have pointed to the fact—for it is a fact—that London has become a haven of bliss for runaway couples from Germany. Except that it is a little more difficult or expensive to reach, the British capital occupies to-day precisely the same position in relation to the Fatherland as did Gretna Green to the regions this side of the Tweed in the days of our great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers. The cases that have got into the newspapers are only stray examples of a practice which is going on regularly, and they have only got there by accident, because the brides or bridegrooms happen to be distinguished personages, or because other circumstances connected with their marriages have attracted public attention either in Germany or in England. There are in London a number of enterprising individuals of German nationality or birth whose principal, if not their only, business is to entice Teutonic youths and maidens to this country and marry them off in accordance with English law whenever "just cause or impediment" makes it difficult for them to get joined together in holy matrimony in their own country. These agents advertise regularly in the German newspapers, calling the attention of the amorous Teuton to the facilities which exist in England for tying connubial knots expeditiously and on reasonable terms. Some of them have their agents in Germany to push the business and catch customers on commission, much like the parties who "touted for licences" at the entrance to Doctors' Commons in the days when Mr. Weller, Senior, was captured for the second time. They issue books, pamphlets, and leaflets describing, more or less accurately, the English law, and explaining fully all the formalities in connection with an English marriage. To show how carefully every detail is thought out, there is among the stock-in-trade of one of the most active of these firms a leaflet giving in English and German the fateful questions which the Book of Common Prayer requires the priest to put to the parties before joining their hands irrevocably, together with the proper responses. Useful instruction is also given in the correct English pronunciation of such phrases as the law puts into the mouths of the "Braut" and "Bräutigam." Thus the astonished Registrar—naturally a Registrar generally plays the part of blacksmith in the Anglo-German Gretna Green—will hear the interesting lovers from Germany delivering themselves as follows:—

> Ai du solem'li diklae'r dhaet ai no not of aeni laoful impaediment wai ai —— me not bi dschoind in maetrimoni tu ——
> Ai kaol oepon dhis Poer'sens hier pres'ent tu widnes dhaet ai —— du tohk dhi —— tu bi mai laoful wedded [waif or hosboend].

In view of the large Teutonic element in the United States, Mr. Roosevelt might find one or two useful hints here when he is next tackling the reform of English spelling on phonetic principles. At any rate, it will be seen that the enterprise of their fellow countrymen has equipped Hans and Gretchen with everything that they need to know before they start on their trip to London.

The reason of all this is easy to understand. The tying of the matrimonial knot in Germany is a much more lengthy and troublesome business than in England, and to do it surreptitiously is very much more difficult. I am told that from the first official notification to the completion of the ceremony the usual time consumed in going through the necessary legal formalities is about six weeks, and may be anything from that to twelve. The mere statements of the parties are not sufficient, but have to be supported by identification papers and other documents, which are carefully looked into. The only formality that presents any difficulty at all to a foreign bride and bridegroom coming to England to be married is a fifteen days' residence in the district prior to the ceremony, but it is not much of a difficulty in reality, there being little risk in making a false statement on the point, while it can always be got over by a special licence when the parties are anxious that everything shall be done regularly and do not grudge the necessary expenditure. I am told that it is becoming a common occurrence for a pair of German lovers to disappear for a week and return to their delighted friends at the end of that time with the announcement that they have been married in London, and no one who sees the frequency of the agents' advertisements in the German papers will hesitate to believe it. I am also told that the status of such couples is regarded with considerable suspicion by their neighbours and acquaintance, and this is equally credible. In fact, a marriage "made in England" is becoming a stock jest among evil-disposed persons in Germany and Switzerland, and to some extent, I believe, in France also.

There is no reason, so far as I know, to doubt that the couples who flock to our shores under these romantic circumstances are, in a general way, duly married in accordance with the easy requirements of English law. It is so simple a matter that if they are not the fault probably lies with themselves. But the "honest brokers" who arrange the business must make a pretty big profit out of it, and they seem to be a queer crew. One of the most active of them is a Mr. T. Funk, of 50, St. George's-road, S.W., where he keeps a boarding-house, used no doubt by German couples desirous of qualifying for marriage by residence in England. He also carries on business at 58, Gloucester-street, Pimlico, as E. Theobald, Ltd., in which name he advertises in Germany an institute for teaching English by correspondence. The Deutsche Reichsanzeiger, and many other German papers have warned their readers against his agency on the ground that Funk is identical with a man named Schellenberger, who seems to have an unfavourable record in his own country. Funk, however, whom I have had interviewed, entirely denies this, asserting that he merely took over the St. George's-road establishment from Schellenberger, who afterwards went to America. I therefore express no opinion of my own on this point. But the Deutsche Reichsanzeiger also alleges that as a matrimonial agent Funk exacts fees out of all proportion to the services rendered; and warns German youths and maidens that a marriage thus effected, though regular under English law, may not be held valid in Germany. Of the first point there can be no question; it is established clearly both by Funk's scale of charges, which runs from M. 100 to M. 900, and by those of the other parties in the same line of business in London. The danger of the marriage proving invalid in Germany may also be real where the agents are not unduly scrupulous. For example, a case was reported in the Daily Mail a few months ago in which, the bride being under age, a supposititious father was put up to give his consent to the marriage at the Registrar's office. The fraud was revealed by the arrival of the real father in London a few hours later, when the agent assured him that the bogus parent had been introduced to him by the bride as her father. It is only fair to say that the agent concerned was not Mr. Funk, but one of his trade competitors; but the case shows the danger that may easily arise when a business of this kind is in the hands of agents whose only object is to get a form of marriage gone through and pocket their fees, for I take it that the validity of the marriage in the above case might easily be disputed before a German court.

Among others engaged in the Anglo-German matrimonial trade is a Herr Kirstein, who advertises in the name of "Brock and Co.," of 90 and 91, Queen-street, E.C. Kirstein's specialty is a work on the marriage ceremony in England as it affects German, Austrian, and Swiss subjects, published at M. 1.50 and purporting to be written by "E. Krafft," which is probably only another name of the publisher. Kirstein also seems to be known and unfavourably regarded in his own country, and a few months ago the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung published a warning against his work. He was the agent concerned in the case above-mentioned, where, according to him, the bride produced and introduced to him a bogus father to impose upon the Registrar. I believe that he is related to a tailor at Hamburg named Losch, who does a little business in the same line. I have a copy before me of Losch's advertisement in the Hamburger Fremdenblatt, under the title "Eheschliessungen in England." Another London agent whose advertisements are to be seen in the German press is Herr Eugster, of 8, South-Street, Finsbury, E.C. I suppose that he, too, has sub-agents working for him in Germany, as I have before me a letter written by him some time ago to a German firm, with whom he proposed to enter into a working agreement. The letter gives some interesting information about the business. After explaining that he has just married off a German gentleman in London, he says:—

> I have been here for 25 years, and have interested myself for some years past in these marriages at registrars' offices, which I can put through in three days. If you will work in conjunction with me, I will take over the entire expenses at the Registrar's, licence, witnesses, fee to German Consul to visé the marriage certificate, etc., for M. 210. My clients have always been very satisfied. Of course, you will induce your clients to pay in advance before sending them to me. . . . .

Ten guineas represents a very comfortable little profit upon the actual disbursements on a marriage before the registrar, even when all the incidentals are thrown in. The great game, however, in the general course of things evidently is to get the anxious pair to go in for a speedy marriage by one of the shorter forms available, which cost anything up to £50; and probably in many cases the ignorant victims are made to pay the higher fees without getting in the least what they are supposed to be paying for. I have particulars of one such case, and where the trick is so easy it is not likely that the opportunity is often missed.

In these days of decaying British trade on the one hand, and ruinous German dumping on the other, it is something to have a humble home industry bringing a steady flow of German gold into the country, even though the largest profit is taken by aliens. But it is not altogether a creditable industry, and we should probably be the first to say so, if the case were reversed, and a German Gretna Green at Hamburg or Heligoland were tempting British lads and lasses in all directions to run over and get married quietly at a few hours' notice, when their own laws and unsympathetic parents and guardians made it impossible for them to effect their purpose at home. We cannot, of course, alter our marriage laws to oblige foreign papas and mammas. But we might at least take care that our laws are properly observed, and that the laxity of our practice does not afford shady brokers an opportunity of establishing a traffic which is mischievous to our neighbours. A good deal of the business above described might be stopped if in the case of foreign marriages official interpreters were provided, through whom the registrar or the officiating minister might question the parties with regard to their own declarations, instead of the agent acting as interpreter, as he does now when any awkward questions are asked. It would have a still better effect if birth certificates and other papers establishing identity and verifying the statements of the parties were required; and I am not at all clear that this sort of precaution might not be taken in the case of natives with as much advantage as in the case of foreigners. It is really an empty farce for the Church or the registrar to inquire whether there is any just cause or impediment why two persons should not be joined together in matrimony, and to rest satisfied with the answer of the two persons themselves. If it is worth while to ask the question at all—and it will hardly be contended that it is not—the answer should be supported by some independent evidence.

THE GREATEST ENGLISHMAN.

We have been told that the happiest marriages are those of which the parties are the most dissimilar in temperament. That being so, our present entente cordiale with France ought to be one of the most permanent and harmonious alliances on record, for certainly there could be no two nations more widely differing in mental outlook. In proof of which—if proof be needed—I may quote the result of the plebiscite recently organised by the Petit Parisien, among its readers, to discover whom they consider to have been the greatest Frenchman of the last century. Some millions of votes were recorded, with the result that Pasteur was placed at the head of the poll, with Victor Hugo, Gambetta, and Napoleon following him in the order named. Could anything be more unexpected, from the Englishman's point of view? Is it possible to imagine that the readers of a London ha'penny paper, voting in a similar competition, would select Lord Lister, say, as the greatest Englishman, followed by, for instance, Swinburne, Gladstone, and Wellington? I, for one, cannot imagine any such result, or can imagine it only as unimaginable. Let us suppose that the enterprising proprietor of the Daily Mail were to originate such a plebiscite among his readers. Who would receive the greatest number of votes? A good deal, of course, depends upon the season of the year in which the voting took place. I imagine that it would be in the "silly season," so I take it that cricketers would have the advantage of footballers. But I am not one of those scoffers who pretend to hold that the readers of the Daily Mail would unanimously vote for either cricketer or footballer. They are a serious-minded set of folk who might be counted upon to take themselves and their responsibilities with due solemnity—to place intellect above mere muscle. Also, it must be remembered that the majority of voters would be women—if only for the fact that they are in a numerical majority in the population—and that women are not vitally interested in either cricket or football, while they are notoriously devoted to the masterpieces of fiction. Therefore, I have little doubt that the greatest number of votes would be recorded to Mr. Hall Caine. This not only because he is perhaps the most prominent of our living novelists, but also because he has only recently been writing a good deal in the Daily Mail about the Times Book Club and Mr. Hall Caine, and other things. For second place I should certainly back the late Mr. Dan Leno. It is true that he is dead, and that the public memory (especially that of the Daily Mail public) is short, but he has left no successor who has touched the public imagination to anything like the same extent. He ministered to the pleasure of unnumbered thousands, and he was quite as great in his way as Mr. Hall Caine in his, though, as it was perhaps less intellectual, I do not think the readers of the Daily Mail would be inclined to place him quite so high. On the other hand, if less respectfully admired, he was, I think, even more intimately beloved, and his features were, in his time, quite as well known.

Though I have found it comparatively easy to place the first two in the race for fame, I must confess to some feeling of doubt as to the probable third. As I have said, so much depends upon the time of year. Taking it, however, for granted that the voting occurs in August, I am confident that the cricketers would beat the footballers. There are, however, other great names in other walks of active life which must not be overlooked. Thus, a month or two ago, a young gentleman (his name, I think, is Bruce), who married Miss Camille Clifford, the "Gibson" girl, would have stood a good chance. But by August next he will in all probability be less in the public mind, and cannot hope to compare with either Mr. Hayward (or Mr. Hirst), Dr. Clifford, Mr. Chamberlain, or the first Duke of Wellington. As we are not likely to have a General Election by August next, considering, further that tariff reform is dead—and damned—and that we are all a little tired of the education question, I am reluctantly compelled to relegate Dr. Clifford and Mr. Chamberlain to inferior positions on the list. I am not sure that Dr. W. G. Grace might not, even a year or two since, have stood a chance of rivalling Messrs. Hayward and Hirst, while there are also Prince Ranjitsinhji and Mr. C. B. Fry. But if the Daily Mail is constant to its opinions of last year—which is quite possible in matters of cricket—I believe that Mr. Hayward may safely count upon taking the third place among the greatest Englishmen whose names adorn the British Temple of Fame. Next to him I should not be surprised to find a soldier, either Roberts, Kitchener, or Wellington. I believe it would be Wellington, if only from association of ideas. As thus: the proprietor of the Daily Mail has frequently been termed the Napoleon of the press (though I am not sure that Mr. Hooper, of the Times Book Club, would agree), and the minds of his admirers must accordingly hold that the general who could beat the Harmsworth of history must have been far and away the greatest soldier who ever lived.

For the fifth place on the list there would, I imagine, be a certain amount of uncertainty. Many readers having, as it were, paid their meed of admiration to the greatest names of the century, might now feel inclined to vote for the candidates who most pleased their individual fancy. Thus it might be suggested that Mr. Fred Horner, ex-M.P., was in many ways one of the most remarkable legislators that England has yet produced, and therefore worthy of a high place among great Englishmen. Others, again, might hold that his greatness arose in some degree only from his position, and that either Mr. Jabez Spencer Balfour or Mr. Whittaker Wright were really in advance of him along his chosen path of fame. Other enthusiasts might point out that Dr. Williams (of Pink Pill fame) or Mr. Beecham—as either can show by innumerable testimonials—are among the greatest benefactors of the race, besides having their names almost as frequently recurrent in the daily press as that of Mr. Hall Caine himself. Again, Daily Mail readers who happen to possess memories would certainly consider the claims of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, the immortal author of "The Absent-Minded Beggar." And there is Mr. Bernard Shaw, who, as he has frequently told us himself—and who better qualified to judge?—is a very great Englishman indeed, so far as he is not an Irishman.

Whichever of these great men might be elected to the fifth place on the list, I have a strong feeling that the sixth should and would be given to H.I.M. Wilhelm II. He is certainly an Englishman on his mother's side; he is quite the most talked about person in Europe, and has been for years past. And he, his advisers, and his deep machinations for the conquest of his maternal country, have for long exercised a weird and quite unaccountable fascination over the minds of readers of the Daily Mail. I think it the more likely that he would occupy this honourable place on the list, in view of the fact that we are certain to hear a good deal about him and his subjects in the near future; and it is even by no means impossible, should the present elections go against his Imperial wishes, and should he thereupon feel called upon to exercise his Imperial power in a way unpleasing to the bulk of his subjects, that we may have him as a welcome guest among us by the time that the next "silly season" arrives, in which case he will certainly add a new lustre to the name of Englishman, and may very likely be of considerable service to his adopted country as a reorganiser of the War Office. And certainly, along with Mr. Hall Caine, the late Mr. Leno, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and possibly Mr. William Shakespeare, supposing that that gentleman ever existed, he will go to make up a bevy of distinguished Englishmen, in comparison with which the greatest names of any other nation—past, present, and to come—must hide their ineffectual fires. With which reflection I am pleased to leave any further consideration of the subject to the readers of the Daily Mail.

THE EDALJI AGITATION.

Sir Conan Doyle has gained one point on which I congratulate him. He has persuaded the Home Secretary to give him a personal interview on the case of Mr. Edalji. From my own personal experience in this case, I gather that this is a proceeding of a quite revolutionary character, at variance with all the most cherished traditions of the Home Office. As mentioned last week, after the Edalji case had been threshed out in TRUTH in 1905, I approached the then Home Secretary, submitting copies of all the articles that had appeared, and requesting that he would favour me with a personal interview in reference to the case. I received only a formal acknowledgment of the request, and the real answer was conveyed personally by Mr. Akers Douglas to Mr. Labouchere behind the scenes in the House of Commons, the effect of it being that the rules of official procedure prevented the Home Secretary discussing the case of a prisoner with a mere editor, but that any statement which Mr. Labouchere desired to submit to him in the character of an M.P. would be duly considered. A statement was submitted accordingly, with the result that Mr. Akers Douglas decided to release the prisoner at the end of three years, but nothing more. I, therefore, waited until the change of Government, and tried again. On March 15 last an article was published in TRUTH reviewing the main features of the case, avowedly for the personal information of Mr. Gladstone, dwelling specially upon the part played by the Home Office subsequently to the conviction, and emphasising the necessity for an independent public inquiry into the whole case from beginning to end. This article, as well as all that had preceded it, I forwarded to Mr. Gladstone, with a letter inviting his personal attention to them, at the same time informing him that I had been authorised by the father and mother of the prisoner, and also indirectly by the prisoner himself, to represent them in the matter, and requesting that he would grant me an interview and an opportunity of inspecting the documents in the possession of the Home Office. The answer to this application, published in TRUTH of March 28, was that after careful consideration the Home Secretary did not see his way to grant me an interview or allow me to inspect the documents.

I repeat this story because when read with the announcement in the press that the Home Secretary gave Sir Conan Doyle a lengthy interview a few days ago, it shows that we are getting on, and should so far serve as an encouragement to Mr. Edalji and his friends. Clearly, Sir Conan Doyle has no claim to an official interview to-day which the Editor of TRUTH had not equally in April, 1905, and March, 1906. No new facts or arguments are forthcoming now in connection with the case which were not set forth in the TRUTH articles submitted to the Home Office on those dates. I confess I am tempted to wonder what has brought about such a change in the official attitude towards outside interference The natural inference seems to be that the further ventilation of the case in the London and provincial press which has naturally followed on Mr. Edalji's release, and the rising public agitation on his behalf, have warned the Home Office that there is serious trouble brewing over the case. It would not surprise me to learn that in consequence of this the Home Secretary and his staff have now, for the first time, looked seriously into the arguments on Mr. Edalji's behalf and discovered at last something of the strength of his case. Anyhow, I congratulate Sir Conan Doyle on having captured the outer works of the enemy's position, and I certainly do not grudge him that he has succeeded where I was unsuccessful. On the contrary, I hope that he will be stimulated thereby to renewed efforts and speedily plant his flag on the citadel.

The correspondence that has been appearing on this subject in the Daily Telegraph during the past week is chiefly useful in showing the public interest and feeling that have been aroused on Mr. Edalji's behalf. The arguments and opinions of the individual contributors, as usual on these occasions, deal only with detached fragments of the case, and, whether on Mr. Edalji's side or against him, prove the personal sentiments or prejudices that actuate the writers, and not much more. I should be sorry to attempt to review them, but there are points here and there which have struck me—one particularly in the letter of Mr. Churton Collins, which appeared in the Telegraph of Friday. Mr. Collins relates that in 1905 he was moved to look into the case, but that in pushing his inquiries he was met everywhere with suggestions that there was behind the case some black and horrible mystery affecting Mr. Edalji and his family. He refers to "one of the kindest-hearted men that ever breathed, with as chivalrous a sense of right and justice as any man could have," but who strongly warned him to have nothing to do with the case as it was "embedded in filth and horror." Others, he says, expressed similar opinions, including a detective who had no connection with the case, and no conceivable motive for injuring Mr. Edalji. These calumnies, says Mr. Collins, estranged many who would otherwise have sympathised with the unfortunate prisoner. I can fully corroborate Mr. Collins in this. When I myself first took up this case, I found evidence on all sides of the shocking allegations that were current. The worst of them all was related to me by a friend at the Bar, who gave it as having originated in the Circuit on which the trial took place. On another occasion when I suggested to a friend on the press that his paper should assist the cause of justice by ventilating the case, he flatly declined, telling me that he had heard things in the neighbourhood of Birmingham (not in any way related to the charge or the trial) which prevented him having anything to do with Mr. Edalji. Not a particle of evidence in support of any of these suggestions have I ever obtained; they were mere intangible rumours passed from mouth to mouth, and I have no more doubt than Mr. Churton Collins that not a shadow of evidence for them exists anywhere. But somebody must have set these stories afloat in the first instance, and in view of several other features of the case, it is not incredible that they were deliberately promulgated for a definite purpose. Undoubtedly they have had a most injurious effect on the efforts to obtain justice for Mr. Edalji, whether that effect was designed or not; and if ever a proper public inquiry is made into the history of the case, this is a point in it which should not be overlooked. Should the occasion arise I will explain what I mean more definitely.

It may be that the wide publicity which is now being given to the case in the Daily Telegraph and other papers will bring to light evidence that will help to dispel the mystery surrounding the cattle-maiming outrages at Great Wyrley and the anonymous letter writing which was the real cause of Mr. Edalji's conviction; and that his innocence will thus be demonstrated in a more convincing way than is possible by mere argument on a set of complicated and somewhat puzzling facts. It may be that Mr. Gladstone, in view of the strong public feeling now aroused, will imitate the example of his predecessor in the Beck case, and appoint some independent tribunal to make an exhaustive inquiry into the conviction of Mr. Edalji and all material circumstances preceding and following it. But failing either of these solutions, the end which must now be worked for is the raising of the question in the House of Commons, and no step should be omitted which will ensure its being raised in such a way as will enable every Member to appreciate the gravity of the points at issue. As I have said over and over again, this is not merely a question affecting the guilt or innocence of one man. The case presents a series of questions relating to the attitude of the police towards suspected persons, the methods by which they get up and present evidence, the trial of serious crimes at Quarter Sessions, and last, but certainly not least, the practice of the Home Office on appeals against conviction—questions which directly affect every innocent man among us. It is the duty of the House of Commons—and a duty to the police, the Law Courts, and the Home Office, no less than to Mr. Edalji or the rest of the public—to see that all these questions, raised in the form which they now take, shall be threshed out to a conclusion which will satisfy everybody.

THE THEATRES.

There are none. This statement may sound a little surprising, as regards the metropolis, which teems with theatres of every kind, but my readers are, of course, aware that I refer to novelties.

The most interesting event of the week was the announcement that Mr. Tree would act in Berlin next April. Mr. J. T. Grein seems to have been the ambassador plenipotentiary upon this occasion, and I trust that the performance of "Antony and Cleopatra" may have, as he suggests, the desired effect of mediating between Germany and ourselves. The Germans have always been great Shakespearean students, and the Meiningen troupe, to mention but the best known, has rendered Shakespeare splendidly in the Fatherland for many years. I hope there may not prove to be in Berlin many purists in the matter of production of Shakespeare. The Emperor himself, I should imagine, would like what one may call the Wagnerian production, associated with the names of Irving and of Mr. Tree: I mean a production in which music and painting and scenic effect play almost as large a part as the words and the acting.

But imagine how unfortunate would be the position if we were to read in the German papers something like the following: "The never-to-be-forgotten occasion of the performance of Wilhelm Shakespeare's drama, 'Antony and Cleopatra,' translated from the German by Mr. Beerbohm Tree, was the occasion of much uproar in the Opera House. It was finally decided to ask the Emperor kindly to declare war upon Great Britain as soon as could conveniently be done with satisfactory results, the casus belli being the, to us and to all students of the world-poet, most wicked interpretation of 'Antony and Cleopatra' at the Opera House. We understand that a certain Herr Poel and a few others in England also disapprove of this attack upon the world-poet, and when the time comes for the occupation of London these will not be forgotten. Mr. Tree and Mr. Grein will be led in chains through the streets of London by Herr Poel."

But such extreme counsels are little likely to be followed, and I have no doubt that Mr. Tree's visit to Berlin, far from conducing to the gloom, will, on the contrary, contribute to the gaiety of nations.

The wave of excitement and interest caused by the Zancigs extends every week the circumference of its ripples. Now it is the turn of the Oxford, which announces that the Nassaus bid fair to out-rival all competitors. The most novel element in the Nassaus' entertainment appears to be their claim to convey information to the audience about their friends abroad. Credat Judæus.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

MUSIC-HALL PRINCESSES.

A WANDERING Briton writes to me from the other end of Europe to say how depressed he feels in reading in the daily papers that thousands go every evening to listen with transport to the Prince and Princess Robert de Broglie at the London Tivoli. What else could he expect? Britons love lords. They like to take the romantic view of a young runaway couple, and cannot be expected to understand the standpoint of the parents who refuse to give them their blessing. It costs those who applaud nothing beyond the prices of their seats at the music hall to be on the side of an interesting couple against a hard-hearted father and mother. They know nothing of the closeness of family life in France or of the sacrifices parents make to keep their children as high and as well-off as they themselves have been. You have the "eldest son" in the noble English family. Entails have been made for his advantage. In France all the children are, so far as heritable property goes, on the very same footing. No family could hold out against the democratising action of the Code were it not for the parental sacrifices just mentioned. Through them family dignity, fairly based on wealth, is maintained, and many virtues are nurtured.

In France the crowds would not go into idolatrous transports over a prince and a princess not yet legally entitled to stand socially on the same plane as her husband. If they turned out to be true artists their success would grow. If not they would soon disappear from the bill. For instance, Clara, Princesse de Chimay, née Ward, had a very temporary success, though a beautiful person and finely formed as a statue. The Marquise de Morny would now hardly draw to the degree of, I will not say 160 francs a seat, but to that of filling places at ordinary prices. The very authentic Princess Pignatelli drew for a few nights at the Alcazar as a diva. I thought her a very fine woman, and she presented an interest which I prefer not to speak of. But she knew nothing of the scena, sang out of tune, and, despising to court her public, had in a few days to go elsewhere. We are soon to see a "Princesse Romanoff, a genuine cousin of the Czar." The disturbed state of Russia left her hard up, and she has decided to fall back on her talents. Mme. Adamovich-Woelfling, still the wife of the Archduke Ferdinand of Hapsburg-Tuscany, and plaintiff in a cross divorce suit at Geneva, will come among us with the spring flowers as a musical artist. We shall go to hear her as we have done when genuine princes and princesses figured on the bill, or as we might go to see the sheep with five legs.

Le Matin lays itself out to give autobiographies of notorious persons as they arise. It keeps an autobiographical editor to put into smart grammatical French the tales of the illiterate celebrities of the hour. All is fish that comes to his net, but he seems to prefer awful sinners to saints. I hear when the Marie Aude autobiography came out in his paper that he received from it 4,000 frs. and she 2,000 frs. for the information she supplied. A friendly advocate helped her to steer in a non-committal course as she was only out of prison on bail, and had to stand an Assize Court trial. This editor also cooked up taking memoirs of Ramon Daurignac, Mme. Humbert's brother. I think I detect another pen in those fearful confessions of Marie Frémont and the Abbé Delarue. The memoirs of the Marquise de Morny have not yet been added to the collection. As her Moulin Rouge adventure is now ancient history they perhaps never will. The fetching biography of the hour is by Prince Robert de Broglie and deals with his love affairs, which show him to be inflammable, and will give an account of his two marriages, one of which he allowed his parents to set aside. All over France one sees in staring type, at railway stations and other public places, "LE MATIN: AVENTURES D'UN PRINCE." To the millions who voted le bloc into power, and now tell Briand to pull away against the Pope and bishops, the "Prince" may be royal or imperial, or son, grandson, first cousin to king or emperor, or a match for the ex-wife of the King of Saxony, or Duke Philippe of Saxe-Coburg. If he had given his family name with the title there would be no mystery, and the charm would be less great. The millions go too much to the theatres where melodramatic pieces come out not to love what is a bit mysterious.

The Broglies who drop, in signing their names, the De, had Academy prestige in the time of the late Duke Albert and his father, Duke Victor. It was to some extent derived from their relationship to Mme. de Staël, the mother of the Duchesse Victor and the grandmother of Duke Albert, and the Comtesse d'Haussonville, whose husband and son were Academicians. Academy elections were more often decided upon in her salon than anywhere else. She had talent, and her pen warmed the subjects on which she wrote, and especially Ireland and Robert Emmet. The Broglies were brought to France in the time of the Fronde riots. Mazarin wanted some Italian captains whom he could trust to set off against Condé and other frondeurs, and he sought for them in Piedmont. A De Broglio from Carre, near Turin, just suited him, and he gave him a footing at Court and in the army. This foreigner has left his mark on the French tongue in the word "imbroglio." His grandson Frenchified the name as it now stands. He had two sons. One was a diplomat, who became the King's friend and confidant, as against the regular Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and ended by getting himself exiled to the family residence, now Château de Broglie, in the Eure. The other son took part, as Marshal de Broglie, in the Seven Years' War, conjointly with Marshals de Contades and de Soubise, whose army was annihilated, but who invented, in the course of the campaign, the famous onion sauce called after him. The Emperor, husband of Maria Theresa, gave him the title of Prince, and declared him hochgeboren as a reward for his assistance. Louis XV. at the same time made him a French duke. The Holy Roman dignity, according to French usage in regard to such foreign distinctions, was borne in France subject to the rules of the Court which bestowed it. One of these rules was parity of birth in marriage. One cannot doubt that it was overlooked when Mlle. Albertine de Staël became Duchesse Victor de Broglie, and much more flagrantly when Mlle. Marie Say entered the De Broglie family. Her great wealth could not give her the equal-birth status. It would be interesting to hear the opinion of William II. on the subject. He abhors unequal-birth, though with the morganatic arrangement which is such a good thing for the plain daughters of illustrious German houses, in limiting the choice of the Princes. The smallest French noble, according to the unbroken usage of the French Court, is entitled to precedence over a Prince of the Holy Roman Empire in France. Marie Antoinette could not obtain any precedence for her cousins, the Princes de Lambescq, at Versailles. Louis XV. once, and as an act of courtesy towards her and the Empress Queen, her mother, gave them par exception the highest places in a quadrille at a fête in honour of the Dauphin's marriage. It was violently resented and never repeated.

Had not Horace Walpole in one of his letters a laugh at a Lord Cowper for soliciting the honour of being named a Prince of the Holy Roman Empire? Did you ever hear of a Lord Fordyce or an Hon. Mr. Cowper or any Lady née Cowper going about with the title of "Princess"? Yet all the Cowpers were born princes and princesses of the Holy Roman Empire, as are all the De Broglies. There are now thirty princes and princesses in the latter family. The title might be of great value to a dishonest person, inasmuch as it lends itself to an equivocal meaning.

As I end my notes I hear that the Prince and Princess de Broglie have accepted here a music-hall engagement at the rate of 1,500 francs a night. Notoriety is, while it lasts, fortune!

M. Briand contributed regularly to the Lanterne up to the day on which he took office as Minister of Public Instruction and "tombeur du Pape." Were he to return to private life he would furnish, as of old, articles to that journal. He has been accused of too great leniency to the Church because ambitious of sitting among the Forty Immortals. On this account the short paragraph in which La Lanterne disposes of the reception of M. Maurice Barrès has a special interest. "M. Maurice Barrès, elected by the Academy to replace M. José Maria de Hérédia, was received yesterday. He delivered the usual speech to which Vicomte de Vogüé, the Director, replied." This account is adequate to the occasion.

In one of his books Anatole France remarks that foreigners only now believe in the French Academy. He ought to know as he is one of its members. There is a good deal of truth in what he says. Still, there are people in France who believe in it. They are the sort of people who, in the face of the great lessons of the last hundred and fifteen years, still believe in wealth, decorations, and titles. Half an Academician's prestige is due to his right to wear a uniform which costs £25, and to carry a sword at an age when officers leave off wearing theirs. The Academy is in the Republic of Letters very much what the House of Lords is in the body politic, a body existing on false appearances, figments, and fictions. The prestige of both is based on the ignorant snobbishness of the mass—a great power, I admit. The best modern thinkers have not belonged to the Academy. Michelet and Edgar Quinet did not sit there. Daudet remained out in the cold. Gustav Le Bon, Poincaré, Le Dantec do not belong to the Academy and probably never will. Among the Immortals are authors of real merit. They are admitted to shed lustre on the others, amateurs who keep good cooks, cellars, stables, and are, like the Marquis de Vogüé, squirearchs. These also write books, being anxious, like the Kaiser, to claim universality.

The Academy will elect any one who can advertise it if his rejection is not a better advertisement. The dressing-rooms of the Français often decide an election there, and almost always the election of the candidate who is a dramatic author. Sometimes there is a struggle for electoral influence between the dressing-rooms of the Vaudeville and the Français, and we are sure with Antoine's able management to hear of those of the Odéon claiming the right to nominate academical candidates. One can see how the pretty actress is becoming an influence by the growing tendency of the ladies attending Academy receptions to appear there in flaunting finery. The style cocodette is now accepted at the Academy.

Truth has taken from the first a strong stand against usurers. The following will therefore interest you. A Paris judge, M. Lemercier, has passed a sharp sentence on a Montmartre pawnbroker named Devinat, whose chief business was usury. Devinat knew well that he had laid himself open to prosecution, French law on usurious practices being much the same as English. He turned the Code in this way: for a loan of 50 fr. he would get his victims to sign a receipt for 100-fr. worth of jewellery and enter the transaction falsely in his books as a sale. Devinat's customers were mostly clerks and employees in the Paris Gas Company. The judge sentenced him to a fine of 1,500 fr., equivalent to £60, and ordered a copy of the sentence to be placarded in the branch offices of the gas company, and to be inserted in as many Paris papers at the cost of the usurer.

It would be a commonplace to say that we live in a strange time. We now witness a plenary council of Ultramontanist French bishops with a Protestant lady of English birth acting as their hostess—the Countess de Franqueville, née (as they say here) Palmer des Lords Selborne. Comte de Franqueville owes his title to the Pope. This is not first-water nobility, but he is a highly respectable person, a member of the Institute, and the happy owner of the once Royal château de la Muette, so called because the King's Bois de Boulogne packs of stag and wolf hounds were kept there. "Meute" is the French word for a pack of hounds. "Muette" means mute—a name the episcopal council deserves, as the bishops composing it only speak in whispers, and are each in a constant state of fear lest some busybody among them might send an unfriendly report to Rome. Comte de Franqueville came into this Muette château and park, the largest private one by far in Paris, through his marriage with a great-niece of Mme. Erard, widow of Sebastien Erard, the piano manufacturer. The house dates from about 1836, is roomy, and has no pretensions to architectural style, but gives the impression (with the grounds) of great wealth. A single pavilion of the Royal château escaped the fury of the Revolution. Erard pulled it down, but he left the Royal arms in high relief and in carved stone over the imposing entrance to the property from the Ranelagh high street.

Eighty-two bishops, three of whom are cardinals, accepted the hospitality of the Comte and Comtesse. Three of their lordships arranged to stay as permanent guests at La Muette. The others had lunch there only. La Croix tells us that the menus were "convenable"—faint praise that ought to drive the chef wild with indignation. La Muette has utterly thrown into the shade the hospitality which M. Cochin has been extending to the Archbishop of Paris. All the photographers who work for the newspapers have been busy with the former, and have pictorially represented it from all possible standpoints.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

* * * * *

Old England altering into New England is the main feature of the time in this country, and the situation possesses many peculiarities, some of which are irritating to the earnest, others interesting to the serious, and others again entertaining to the indifferent.

A House of Lords, the object of the members of which it is to protect the privileges of a class; a House of Commons, to which it is entrusted to secure the rights of the community; and a middle-class which is hourly increasing in numbers and prosperity, and the individuals of which are generally prepared to support the Party that shall benefit them the most, all claim to be patriots! Meanwhile, though millions are spent here annually—directly and indirectly—in the struggle between the opposing Parties, the English are doing comparatively little towards their own development; they are being revolutionised by the United States, the example of our self-governing colonies, the influence of France, and internal circumstances over which politicians have no control.

Circumstances have no Party. Whether the Tories or the Radicals are in power, the social, scientific, and mechanical developments in the United States, and the mental and moral influences of France, produce alterations and their consequences, which are forming a New England, notwithstanding all the opposition of the Old. Re-establish the conditions and the customs of twenty-five years ago even, and no Englishman or woman of to-day would credit that it is the same country as we live in now!

The development of finance, commerce, and trade has diminished the importance of land, and, consequently, the wealth and influence of those who own it, and they are being steadily forced downwards in social value. The general increase in prosperity is rapidly causing hundreds of thousands to rise, and is establishing them in the places occupied formerly by the members of the privileged class. Combination might, possibly, delay the process for a while, but it cannot cause it to cease.

* * * * *

It is a suspicious circumstance that it is the members of the English upper class themselves that have changed the most during the last quarter of a century, and yet it is they who most deprecate change. "Our portion is the people," said a well-known lady, "it will be a bad day for this country when we are dispossessed of it!" That will remind many of the wig-makers who, when pig-tails were abandoned, petitioned Parliament to render it compulsory to wear them, as otherwise England would sink to a second-rate power.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

A NUMBER of sporting writers appear to have been thrown into howling hysterics by the passing of the Street Betting Act and the prospect of further legislation of the same description. It is simply idiotic and grossly ridiculous to screech and wail over the impending ruin of the Turf because it is desired to squabash street betting and starting-price establishments, and to prohibit the mendacious and mischievous advertisements of tipsters. It is hopeless folly, moreover, to suggest that the Jockey Club should license bookmakers. The members are not such infatuated simpletons as to mix themselves up with the betting question, and if one can for a moment conceive such a hare-brained policy being adopted, the Club would very quickly be smashed up by Parliament. As I have recently remarked, the moon will fall before betting in any shape or form is recognised officially in this country, either directly or indirectly. The members of the Jockey Club take larger and sounder views of affairs than the sporting writers who are now in such a dangerously delirious condition. Many of the tales concerning the contemplated attacks on racing are so stupidly false and so extravagantly absurd as to be altogether beneath any sort of notice. Indignation does not supply syntax, for some of the diatribes I have looked over are marvels of incoherent gibberish, bearing a strong resemblance to that famous saying of a once well-known county member, who described Sir Robert Peel as "not the sort of man that you could put salt upon his tail."

A correspondent at Newmarket informs me that All Black and his stable companion Orwell have made a wonderful improvement during the winter. They appear to be endowed with both speed and stamina, and each has beautiful action. The colt is to undergo a special preparation for the Two Thousand, and he is also engaged in the Derby, being nominated for that race by his breeder, Lord Clonmell. The filly is entered for both the One Thousand and the Oaks, these two races being her only important engagements. Orwell was far and away the best performer among the fillies last season, as she won five races out of six, and her defeat in her first race (the Ashley Plate at the Newmarket Craven Meeting) was an arrant fluke,

The White Knight has come on in a very satisfactory manner during the last two months. This horse is a really good stayer. I hear that he is to undergo a special preparation for Ascot, and if he should be beaten for the Gold Cup he will still have an excellent chance of winning the Alexandra Plate, as he has no penalty for that event. The White Knight is quite likely to repeat his victory in the Gold Vase at Ascot, as he will have no extra weight to carry. His raking stride is admirably adapted for the Ascot course. I fully expect that next summer he will discover himself to be one of the very best four-year-olds in training.

Slieve Gallion has been left in for the Union Jack Stakes of £1,200, which race is run on the first day of the Liverpool Spring Meeting. It is not at all likely that Captain Greer's colt will be seen at Aintree. A horse which is fit for racing on March 21 certainly would not be at its best on June 5, the day on which the Derby will be run. Twenty-six three-year-olds are left in for this race, including Lord Wolverton's Prince of Orange and Larig, Mr. J. Wallace's Gnome, Sir E. Cassel's Freeborn, Mr. Freeman's Hexagon, Lord Derby's Glacis, and Mr. W. Hall Walker's Knight of Tully.

There are eighteen acceptances for the Bickerstaffe Stakes of £700, run on the second day at Liverpool, including Larig and Knight of Tully, and the owner of the latter colt is also represented by Ulpean. His Majesty heads the list with Isograph, colt by Isinglass out of Amphora.

A really miserable entry has been received for the Liverpool Spring Cup of £1,000, only twenty-six horses having been engaged, and to make matters worse, one trainer has three representatives, and four others have two each. This is another handicap which would probably do better if the entries closed several weeks later than at present, say on the first Tuesday in March. Lord Derby, who is often dangerous in this race, is represented by Bridge of Canny and Glasconbury, and other notable names in the list are Velocity and Roseate Dawn.

There are sixty-five entries for the Grand National Steeplechase, as compared with sixty-three last year. All the best cross-country horses in training have been engaged, but there are a considerable number of animals in the list who do not appear to hold the most remote chance of even completing the course. His Majesty has entered Flaxman, and other interesting names are those of Mr. J. Clyde's Cinders, Mr. J. S. Morrison's Drumcree, Prince Hatzfeldt's Ascetic's Silver, Mr. C. Hibbert's Red Lad, Mr. B. W. Parr's Aunt May, Mr. Partridge's Timothy Titus, Mr. G. Faber's Ranunculus, Mr. P. E. Speakman's Buckaway II., Mr. A. Gorham's Wolf's Folly, and Mr. G. H. Browne's John M.P. The names of Leinster and Kirkland are missing, and I suppose both these useful horses have closed their racing career. The weights for this event are to be published on Thursday (to-morrow), and the race will be run at Aintree on Friday, March 22.

One of the papers, referring to the entry of Flaxman for the Grand National, announces that the King is expected to pay another visit to Aintree this year, in order to see his horse run. This is untrue, for the King is to be away at Biarritz when the Grand National is run, so he will certainly not be the guest of Lord Derby at Knowsley Hall during the Liverpool Meeting. I am told that his Majesty is not likely to go racing until the Newmarket Spring Meeting, which begins on April 30.

Hack Watch has broken down, and he was therefore struck out of the Grand National Steeplechase last Thursday. He won seven important races last year, and he was generally regarded as the most brilliant young steeplechaser now in training. Mr. Tunstall Moore's horse appeared to possess an excellent chance of winning the Grand National. Hack Watch is a son of Hackler.

The Chester Vase, a new race for three-year-olds and four-year-olds, value £2,100, has proved a dreadful failure. There were only eight-eight entries when the stakes closed in November, 1904, and now that the final forfeit has been declared there is a miserable acceptance of twenty-four. The best animals in the list are the Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller (which is a very likely winner), Mr. W. Hall Walker's Black Arrow and Knight of Tully, and Mr. Bass's Sancy.

Forty-nine horses have been entered for the Chester Cup, which is a subscription race of £2,550, minor forfeit £5. It is odd to look back and remember that in the forties and fifties there was heavy betting over this handicap even before the entries were made, and when once the acceptances had been declared horses were backed every week for many thousands of pounds. The Chester Cup was then the heaviest betting handicap of the year, but its prestige began rapidly to decline in the late sixties. Virago was quietly backed in November and December, 1853, for the next year's Chester Cup to win something like £100,000, several bets of 5,000 to 75 having been secured when the handicap appeared. Virago was considered by her owner, Mr. Padwick (a wretched judge of racing) to be outrageously overweighted, so he scratched her in a rage. Her subsequent form showed that she would have cantered in for the Chester Cup, and an immense stake would have been won by her party. In 1852 there were forty-three starters for the Chester Cup, and Joe Miller won, with 4 st. 10 lbs. on his back, while next was Stilton (5 st. 8 lbs., including 10 lbs. extra), and third was Poodle (5 st. 3 lbs., including 10 lbs. extra). The placed horses were all three-year-olds. This year there is only one three-year-old in the list—Lord Rosebery's Donna Caterina. The most notable of the older horses are Roseate Dawn, Hammerkop, Spate, Feather Bed, Bridge of Canny, Gourd, Achilles, Kroonstad, Dinneford, Great Scot, and Bibiani. It is not often that one finds French horses entered for the Chester Cup, but M. Caillault has engaged a couple of four-year-olds—Querido and Hautbois. The Duke of Westminster has not entered anything, the reason presumably being that he has nothing in his stud that would be likely to stand any chance of winning this handicap. All things considered, however, it is odd that Troutbeck was not engaged, in order that the Duke might at least be represented in the great race of his home meeting.

Fifty-six horses have been entered for the Lancashire Handicap Steeplechase of £2,000, which is to be run for at Manchester, Easter Monday (April 1), and fifty-nine horses are engaged in the Jubilee Handicap Hurdle Race of £1,000, run at the same meeting on the following day.

Twenty-four horses are left in for the Greenham Stakes of £1,000 to be run at Newbury on Friday, April 12, including Baron de Forest's smart filly Bellatrix, who will no doubt be prepared for this race, as she has no other engagement until the Gratwicke Stakes at Goodwood. It is very unlucky for her present owner that this filly should have been withdrawn from both the Oaks and the North Derby at Newcastle, which were her two best engagements.

Several events at Newmarket which did not fill on the 1st have been re-opened, and will close next Tuesday, notably the March Stakes, the Newmarket Handicap, and the Payne Stakes for 1908.

Fifty two-year-olds have been entered for the Newmarket Plate of £200 at the First Spring Meeting, the entrances amounting to £150. There are fifty-three entries for the May Plate, and by the time that the minor forfeit has been declared the £200 which is nominally given to this race will probably have been recovered. There are sixty-one entries for the Soltykoff Stakes, with £300 added, but this race costs the fund nothing, as the entrances amount to £305. The Criterion Stakes, with £200 added, has obtained forty-two entries, the sum really given being £32.

The entry of three-year-olds and upwards for the Rous Memorial Stakes at Ascot of 1908 is interesting, because some idea may be derived from it as to the animals which are expected to last on the Turf, and to do well in the future. The only now five-year-olds in the list are Mr. Joel's Polymelus and Mr. R. Walker's Dinneford. The best four-year-olds are Lord Derby's Keystone II., and Bridge of Canny, Mr. Dugdale's Picton, Captain Greer's Rocketter, Mr. Joel's Prince William, Mr. J. A. de Rothschild's Beppo, and Mr. Hall Walker's Black Arrow, his entry also including Polar Star. Among the other three-year-olds are his Majesty's dark colt Perambulator, Baron de Forest's Bellatrix, Lord Derby's Olympian and Glacis, Duke of Devonshire's Hillsprite, Mr. Hallick's Fra Diavolo, and Major Loder's Weathercock, Galvani, and Baltinglass. Lord Falmouth has entered Lycœus, three years, by Cyllene out of Cereza; and the Duke of Portland has the three-year-old Apponyi, by St. Simon out of Mneme, a colt hitherto unknown to fame, but he must have been highly thought of as a yearling, as he commenced last season with thirty-three engagements.

The weights for the Spring Handicaps will be published to-morrow, and I most earnestly advise my speculative readers not to pay the slightest attention to the fiddle-faddle betting over the Lincolnshire Handicap which is certain to be recorded daily in the papers, as it is all nonsense and rubbish, representing merely the harum-scarum fancies of the gullish herd of public backers. There will be no genuine betting over this race until a week before it is run, and it is quite certain that no stable commissions will be given out for the next seven weeks at least. Genuine commissions are now always kept back until the very latest possible moment. Last year any amount of money was lost by misguided fatheads over Velocity, who was not half fit at Lincoln. Every spring horses are cleverly rushed in the betting for this particular handicap which are sent to the post in so backward a condition that their chance of winning is practically 000.

A writer in a weekly journal refers to Bellatrix as "the One Thousand mare." Baron de Forest's filly is not engaged in the One Thousand, and her breeder, Mr. Musker, withdrew her from the Oaks ten months ago when the minor forfeit was declared.

No horse in training has been so heavily engaged of late as Roseate Dawn. As was recently mentioned in TRUTH, he is a very fine jumper, and he has been entered for numerous hurdle races. Roseate Dawn has also been engaged in over a dozen handicaps and in several important weight-for-age events.

Lord Falmouth, who is now at his place in Cornwall, will probably start his dark colt St. Martin (own brother to Quintessence) for the Newmarket Biennial, instead of reserving him for the Two Thousand. The Kingsclere stable could also be represented in the Biennial by the Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller, a colt about which I had something to say last week. St. Martin has a second engagement at the first of the Newmarket meetings, in the Craven Stakes, but he certainly will not run for both races.

The Duke of Devonshire has now nineteen horses in training at Beckhampton, in S. Darling's stables, besides those which are in charge of Goodwin at Newmarket. It is probable that Hillsprite, by Cyllene out of Elf, will prove to be the Duke's best three-year-old, but I shall be surprised if he turns out to be anything above the second class. Acclaim, colt by Amphion out of Claque, is also expected to do well next season. The Duke has ten two-year-olds, all bred by himself at his stud farm in Sussex. There is a colt by Orme out of Lady Villikins, and there are fillies by St. Frusquin out of Burgonet, by Diamond Jubilee out of Claque, and by Tarporley out of Lady Sneerwell.

The Duke of Westminster has sold Pipistrello, own brother to Flying Fox, to some French breeder. This horse was bred at Eaton in 1903, and he was a very good-looking yearling, and was highly thought of at Kingsclere during the early part of his two-year-old career. He was much talked about in 1905 before Ascot, but he was beaten in his trial for the New Stakes, and he did not make his début until the Newmarket First October Meeting, when he was unplaced in the race for the Buckenham Post Produce Stakes, Anniversary II. being the favourite, while Adamas was the winner. Pipistrello proved a complete and most ghastly failure on the turf, but he may achieve some fair measure of success at the stud if his mares are judiciously chosen.

Under the Jockey Club Rules there is no race now of less than £100 in value, a regulation which was suggested many years ago in TRUTH, and it has proved a most valuable reform. It would be well if a similar rule was established for National Hunt meetings, as at present one notices nearly every day during the winter a plethora of beggarly steeplechases and hurdle races of the value of £40. The fact is that at many of these miserable meetings the racing is often a melancholy farce, and sometimes disgraceful elements are not wanting. The number of winter fixtures is preposterously out of proportion to the number of horses in training for events of the class to which such meetings are restricted. It has frequently been proposed in TRUTH that a close time should be established for cross-country sport, and that no meeting should be allowed during the months of December and January. If the National Hunt Committee cannot, or will not, carry out this obviously most desirable reform, it may be hoped that a Bill will be introduced in Parliament to deal with the matter.

M. E. Blanc at present has thirty horses in training, of which fifteen are two-year-olds, including Aglia, own brother to Ajax and Adam, and Boufarck, half-brother, by Flying Fox, to Caius. Ouadi Halfa and Myram, (own brother to Jardy) are believed to be very smart colts, and they have done well in every way during the winter. Both these animals are engaged in the Derby, and M. Blanc must now regret the premature withdrawal of Ouadi Halfa from the Eclipse Stakes and the Jockey Club Stakes.

His Eminence has been much talked about as a likely horse to win the Lincolnshire Handicap, and if he is regarded as favourably weighted he is sure to figure prominently in the betting returns. I advise people who fancy him to leave him alone, as it is quite on the cards that Lord Howard de Walden might ultimately decide to keep his horse for the City and Suburban. It seems to me that the Epsom course would be more likely to suit His Eminence than the Lincoln mile. This horse appears to be now considerably overrated by his admirers, for he was certainly one of the disappointments of last season, as great things were expected of him, but his public performances were exceedingly moderate. On more than one occasion he appeared to run like a rogue, for he seemed to "turn it up" when it required only a moderate effort to win the race. I expect it will turn out that the horse is really deficient in stamina, and very likely he would do much better if he were reserved for T.Y.C. races. He won over a mile and a quarter over the easy course at Brighton, and the City and Suburban distance might not be beyond his powers. This horse certainly has fine speed, and I hope that he will be judiciously placed during the coming season. If he "goes for" one of the spring handicaps I should expect him to do better at Epsom than at Lincoln.

It will be remembered that nearly two years ago the Council of the Football Association endeavoured to coerce affiliated associations to admit professional teams. Then came the meeting of the London Football Association, at which Lord Kinnaird presided, and at which he promised a ballot that never took place. The resolution in favour of professionalism was carried, although it is now admitted that some clubs secured two voting papers. The affair did not redound to the credit of the chairman. The formation of the Amateur Defence Association, and its denunciation by the Football Association, followed. The Amateurs replied by asking for a special general meeting of the Football Association. It was evident that a crisis was approaching, and it is to the credit of the Council that a way has been found by which the situation has been materially changed for the better. At a meeting of the Council Mr. Gregson carried a resolution practically rescinding the directions that had been given to affiliated associations to admit professional teams, and at the same time directing that the relations of these bodies should be made the subject of inquiry This has resulted in the amateurs withdrawing their request for a special general meeting. They intimate that further negotiations are pending. I have been receiving letters pointing out how the members of the Council are paid. I consider that they ought to be paid, and these matters are but side issues. I have read with regret the way in which leading men on the Council have denounced amateurs. I hope that this view is now changed. There is ample room for amateurs and professionals. The work must be divided. I am certain that amateur associations are best suited to encourage amateur sport, but I feel that those who are concerned with the professional side could often render valuable help in these matters. It should be arranged that the parent body should render this help. The bogus amateur club requires stamping out. The professional organisations as business corporations should, as far as possible, run themelves. The Football Association must remember that the unpaid player is the democracy of the game.

I really cannot see why there should be such an objection to clubs which get the benefit of playing at home in the Association Cup ties selling their rights to their opponents. It is written about as though it were a fearful evil which the Association should remedy. That organisation has quite enough to do without bothering itself about the purely financial aspect of the game. These professional teams are entered for the Cup ties to make money for their employers. So far as the men are concerned I am quite sure that they are keen enough to win the cup. To their employers the ties mean money. The luck of the draw means the right to play at home, and with this advantage the prospect of winning and making more money by another cup tie. But suppose a club has little chance of winning, or is offered a guarantee which is larger than the home gate would give, I cannot see why it should not be free to sell the right and make money, and perhaps score a win. Once it is recognised that these contests are, so far as the clubs go, purely and simply business engagements, the absurdity of hampering trade is at once obvious. The less the Football Association interferes with business the better.

It is probably no bad thing for Chelsea that the team has been knocked out of the Cup ties. It will have done quite well enough if it can hold its own and get into the First Division of the League. Fog prevented any play with Bradford, and the leaders' most dangerous opponents, West Bromwich, were unable to finish their match with Barnsley for the same reason. The Arsenal got home against Preston North End, and Newcastle United were unable to beat Everton. At the same time, the losers are very likely to head the League. In the Southern Division Portsmouth showed the effects of much Cup play, and were badly beaten by Reading. This put Fulham, who have played two more matches, at the top of the Southern League. Penalties awarded against the Crystal Palace backs gave Fulham a victory.

Further reports of the disaster at Swansea show clearly where England failed. It is pretty evident that the defeat was due to the mistaken tactics of the English captain. Be it said that the English forwards were quite loyal. They played their best, but they had to obey orders, and that was where the mistake was made. The two fastest forwards were ordered to pack at the back of the scrimmage. The consequence was they were first up to the ball in open play, and then had to wait for the rest to come up. All the advantage was lost. It was a wretched mistake persisted in from start to finish. Another captain must be chosen. Then Hopley, who cannot be considered a genius, was given the position of "lock." Each man was given his own place in the scrum, and its pace was the speed of its slowest forward. No skipper has shown a greater capacity for playing into his opponents' hands. No one suggests that Hill is not worth his place in the team. But he is not the man for captain. Blackheath beat Richmond, and he kicked four goals out of five shots, hitting the post the time he failed. The Richmond team went badly to pieces in the second half. The Rosslyn Park team scored a splendid win over the Harlequins. The winners took full advantage of the mistakes their opponents made. Lambert was certainly not playing up to international form. In the County Championship, Cornwall very nearly beat Devonshire, who only won by a goal and a try to two tries. If she had won, Cornwall would have been at the top of the tree in that division, and a change is always a good thing. I suppose that some day the metropolitan counties will play on Saturdays. It is all nonsense to say that club football would be interfered with. The youngsters would have a chance.

Unless one is behind the scenes at billiards it is difficult to realise precisely what animates the leading professional players. One hears that all games are arranged beforehand. But so long as the men are human so long will there be a keen rivalry. The pecuniary advantages of being at the top of the tree are considerable, and the nearer one is there the better one is off. There is not much socialism amongst the players. Of course, they have to consider the public, which is of two classes, those that like an open game and those who desire to see the manœuvring for position. With the increased popularity of the game I am of opinion that the latter class is on the increase. The tacticians are now in the majority. Of the men who are coming to the top are Harverson, and the ex-amateur champion, Lovejoy. Harverson gave him 3,600 in 16,000 and was only beaten by something over 700 points. Both were playing all out to win. Lovejoy is probably the most rapid scorer amongst the professionals, and his all round play has improved. He had a remarkable break last Friday. At his fourth visit he worked the balls into position for close cannon play. He had the object balls at the left top pocket. The red was just against the cushion and there was two inches between them. In less than thirteen minutes he had scored 458, making 215 close cannons. That stopped play for the day. He was nervous on restarting. But he increased his break to 603, his total time being seventeen minutes. He made 284 consecutive cannons, which beats the previous best by Cook (159) made two years ago.

I have read some rubbish in the papers with regard to the fact that Newhall, who rowed for Harvard, is not being tried. The explanation is that he has not gone up this term. He is travelling on the Continent. He had wretched health at Oxford and he would have been quite unfit to row. He may go up for the summer term. At Cambridge the crew is practically made, and the eight should be a good one. The heavy-weight must not become a fetish on the Cam.

The University boatrace has been fixed for March 16, and the sports will take place the week after, on Saturday the 23rd at Queen's Club. This date would not have done for the race, as the start would have had to be at 7.30 a.m. The Oxford crew are being coached by Mr. Harcourt Gold. They should be a very fair, moderate-weight crew.

If the Times is correct in saying that Mr. R. McKenna will succeed Mr. Birrell as the Minister of Education then one Trinity Hall man will have succeeded another. He was a scholar of the Hall and a senior optime in the Mathematical Tripos in 1885. He rowed in the boat that bumped Jesus and went head in 1886. He rowed in the winning crews for the Hall in the Grand in 1886 and 1887, and won the Stewards' as well, besides rowing in the winning University crew that year. It was chiefly owing to his efforts that the Hall won the Grand, Ladies', Thames', Stewards', and Visitors' at Henley in 1887.

After a long illness Alfred Shaw, the Nottingham bowler, has died at the age of sixty-five years. Never was there a better or steadier man in the professional ranks. It may be doubted if there has ever been a keener cricketer. After he retired he took to umpiring rather than lose touch with the game. He played for the Players at Lord's from 1871 to 1881. In 1887 he ceased to play for Notts, and seven years after he came out for Sussex, and at the age of fifty-two he took forty-two wickets for an average of twelve runs. That season, at the Oval, in an innings of 356, he took seven wickets for sixty-nine runs, and nearly half of his forty-four overs were maidens. He was originally a good bat, but he gave up batting for bowling. He had no off-side theory. He bowled at the batsman. He had a great command of pitch; but he varied his length according to the batsman, and he never believed in making the ball do too much. He could also vary his pace without change in action. He loved bowling for its own sake. He was not troubled about the need for a new ball. The M.C.C. has intimated that after 200 runs a new ball may be ordered. I suppose this is for the swerve theory. Shaw did without it.

The ever-growing popularity of golf is attested by the increasing prominence which is accorded to the game in the announcements of railway companies and hotel proprietors wherever links are to be found. Golf figures conspicuously, for instance, in the new edition of the brochure issued by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., in regard to its various hotels. At Turnberry, Ayrshire, where a palatial new hotel was opened last spring, the golfer has a fine eighteen-hole course close to the hotel, situated amid most interesting and picturesque scenery; while if he wishes for a change, half-a-dozen or more well-known links (including Prestwick) are within easy reach by train or motor.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE institution of an additional tourist trophy race for heavy cars has been received with general approval, though there seems no very obvious reason why such a step should have been taken. Certainly more practical benefit would have been derived from a race designed to encourage smaller and lighter cars. Every one knows already that there are dozens of heavy touring cars of 40 h.p. and 50 h.p. of the highest efficiency, to be had by those who can afford to pay for them. In the case of small, light cars, on the other hand, of from, say, 8 h.p. to 10 h.p., the number of such at present on the market is by no means excessive, and a race which turned more attention in that direction would certainly be of benefit. Meanwhile, the struggle of the "heavies" will certainly be followed with interest, and seeing that they will be required to carry weight to the extent of no less than a ton, the test will certainly be a severe one—especially in the matter of tyres. It will be interesting to note, by the way, whether any of the competitors adopt Elastes. Removable rims should also offer advantages in this connection.

Talking of Elastes, glowing accounts of its advantages continue to be published, and though one or two rival substances are being spoken of, it certainly seems to hold the field at present. The company which has the rights of the invention in this country is now hard at work supplying the requirements of customers, and it is not surprising to learn that the number of such on its books is already very large. One thing should, however, be understood. The rather prevalent notion that Elastes-filled tyres need no attention whatever is not quite correct. While punctures and bursts of the ordinary kind are done away with, the covers require watching none the less, if the filling is to last properly. Hence, in the case of a bad cut, which might admit wet or foreign matter, remedial measures must be adopted. Otherwise the Elastes will perish, and the tyre will be done for. If a serious cut is experienced on the road, a gaiter will afford protection till a permanent repair can be effected, but in the ordinary way, of course, a cover should travel many hundreds of miles, not to say thousands, without this occurring. As to the durability of the filling itself, as distinguished from the outer cover, it is stated that the same core may be used again and again for a succession of covers, and this being so, it is obvious that a very considerable saving must be effected in the long run, apart altogether from the enormous advantage of getting rid altogether of the labour, worry, and inconvenience associated with the use of the unreliable pneumatic.

Apropos of the Tourist Trophy Competition, by the way, it will have been noted with interest that the Automobile Club de France has now instituted a similar kind of race on the basis of a limited supply of petrol—viz., of about one gallon to twenty miles, the race to extend over a distance of a little over 300 miles, and to take place the day before the Grand Prix. This is a significant sign of the times, going to show that abroad, as at home, it is at length beginning to be recognised that motor racing of the old unrestricted kind, except on special tracks, has had its day.

Some interesting figures were published in last week's Motor, showing the complete imports and exports relating to the motor industry from January, 1903, to December, 1906. From these it is made plain that under both heads the increase has been steady and continuous. Thus as regards imports the case stands as follows:—1902, £1,057,875; 1903, £1,845,645; 1904, £2,271,922; 1905, £3,103,150; 1906, £4,025,240. In the case of the exports the figures are less imposing, of course, though not by any means wanting in encouragement—viz.:—1902, £172,152; 1903, £343,817; 1904, £360,377; 1905, £544,028; 1906, £871,290. It is pointed out, moreover, that though the totals of the foreign imports have shown hitherto a steady increase, there is reason to believe that so far as ordinary pleasure cars are concerned the highest total has probably been recorded, the increase in the total since 1905 being attributable to the import of motor-omnibus chassis. In regard to our own exports, one interesting circumstance is brought out very clearly by the graphic chart which accompanies the figures, namely, the fact that the highest point of the curve in each year occurs, not as in the case of foreign imports, in the middle of the summer, but in the winter months, coinciding with the cool season in India and the summer in Australia and New Zealand. This means that our factories can be kept busy all the year round attending to the rush of home orders in the spring and summer, and supplying the wants of the Colonies in autumn and winter.

Messrs. Cordingley announce that their annual motor show will be held at the Agricultural Hall in April next as usual. This will be the twelfth exhibition of the series, and a show in every way up to those of former years is promised. Messrs. Cordingley have always devoted special attention to aeronautics, and this year, it is said, the display under this head will be particularly attractive. Many new firms, it is stated, have during the past year been quietly experimenting with cars and airships, and propose to take advantage of the Islington show to submit the results of their labours to the public.

That is a characteristic American proposal, of which particulars have recently been furnished—namely, an invasion of Europe by American motorists on American cars, who will thereby demonstrate by means of a prolonged tour throughout Europe the excellence of the Transatlantic article. Some sixty cars, all of American manufacture, and representing an invested capital of £10,000,000, will, it is said, participate in the trip, which has been instituted in connection with the lately-offered America Gold Cup for a 4,000-miles road race. From particulars published in the Express, it appears that the cars will arrive at Havre and pass through Paris to Brest, thence by way of Nantes, Le Mars, and Tours to Bordeaux, and from there across the Spanish frontier to Barcelona. Then they will skirt the south coast of France, going through Nice and Monte Carlo to Genoa, Florence, Rome, and Naples, after which, turning north again, they will proceed by way of Vienna and Berlin to Brussels, finally crossing the Channel and making their way to Liverpool, where they will take ship for the States again. It is a bold scheme, and should certainly help to advertise the merits of American cars, concerning which, it is to be feared, a good deal of scepticism prevails at present on this side of the Atlantic.

It is not every day in the week that a single firm receives an order for 4,000 motor vehicles, but a contract of this nature has just been entered into by Messrs. Darracq, who have undertaken to supply motor cabs, to the number named, for a new French syndicate, of which M. Charley is the leading spirit. The value of the contract is estimated at £1,000,000. Darracq shareholders should have cause to anticipate, therefore, another good year. The cabs in question are designed, it seems, for use in all the leading European cities, including London, where it is intended to place some 600 on the streets as soon as possible. The new cabs will, it is said, be of the landaulette pattern, with the driver sitting in front, and strenuous efforts are to be made to introduce in connection with them the adoption of the taxameter. At present the condition of affairs in regard to motor cabs is eminently unsatisfactory in London. There are a fair number on the streets, but people are afraid to use them, because of the exorbitant demands made by their drivers, who seem to regard a fare of anything less than 5s. in the light of an insult. The introduction of the taxameter would help to terminate this undesirable state of things.

Colonel A. R. Wyllie, C.B., who prosecuted a van demon at the Westminster Police-court last week for wilfully obstructing the passage of his motor-car, and obtained a conviction with a fine of 20s. and costs or seven days, deserves the thanks of his fellow motorists for his public-spirited action. He would doubtless have saved himself much worry and inconvenience by not following the matter up, but by taking the trouble to do this he administered a lesson in manners to the offender, which, it is safe to say, will not be without its effect upon himself and others similarly disposed in future. A still more serious evil than mere obstruction to which motorists are still liable, and in regard to which stringent measures should also be taken, is that involved in the stone throwing practised by the sportive youths in country districts. Unfortunately, effective action is much more difficult in this case.

It is interesting to note how hotel proprietors in all parts of the country are waking up to the necessity of providing good accommodation, not merely for motorists but also for their cars. A fine new garage which will take a dozen cars has recently been opened in the grounds of the Hotel Burlington, Boscombe, Bournemouth. The exterior of the garage, designed to correspond with the style of architecture of the hotel, is more handsome than is usual in a building devoted to this purpose; and—what is still more important to the motorist—the arrangements inside are thoroughly up-to-date.

MAMMON.

Heavy Liquidation in Americans—The Market Disturbed by the Plethora of New Capital Issues and by the Harriman Investigation — The Outlook — Further Declines, with Frequent Rallies Probable.

THE long delayed but inevitable period of liquidation appears to have commenced in the American Market, and values during the last few days have given way more readily than for months past. We seem, indeed, to be witnessing something like a repetition of the events of a year ago, when it may be recollected that those in control of the market, after maintaining and even raising prices during the money stringency ruling at the end of the previous year, were compelled by the continued lack of public interest and by force of other circumstances to permit a short spell of liquidation, involving, of course, a reduced level of prices. While at the present time the state of trade and of railroad earnings in the United States continues at high water mark, and the reflux of currency from West to East has already entailed a noticeable improvement in the position of the New York Associated Banks, Wall Street is compelled to ignore such factors in face of the disturbance to the market occasioned by the multiplicity of new capital issues announced and waiting to be announced, and by uneasiness arising from the investigation by the Inter-State Commerce Commission into the Harriman group of railroads. So far as the immediate future is concerned, therefore, the argument would appear to lie with the "Bears," though there is no reason to expect anything like a panic or serious trouble to individuals. The forces that have engineered the upward movement with such masterly dexterity are probably quite capable of conducting a downward movement without undue flurry. So far as can be ascertained, the present decline is part of a movement organised by the same group which was responsible for the big rise that took place last August, and if so, the market may be trusted not to get out of hand; the people now working for a fall are the people who will have new stocks as well as old to sell to the public a little later on, and it appears fairly obvious that the last thing they desire is to badly shake the public confidence. Consequently, while a lower price level seems not unlikely—and is certainly to be desired in order to restore more healthy market conditions—the decline will probably be disguised as far as possible by frequent rallies.

Money Less Abundant—Bank Controlling the Situation—Bank Rate Effects Inappreciable.

While an element of doubt existed it was generally expected that the Bank would find it expedient to lower its minimum discount rate in order to get in close touch with the market, and the reduction from 6 per cent. to 5 per cent. did not come as a surprise. Evidently the Directors are less apprehensive of the outlook, more especially as regards the South American drain, the probable "ear-marking" of gold on account of the Indian Currency reserve, and the situation in New York. The improved position indicated by the weekly return justifies their action to a certain extent, the reserve being more than £1,174,000 higher, at a total of over £22,593,000, owing to the heavy returns of cash from circulation, which completely offset the net loss of £1,051,000 of gold abroad during the week. So far as Lombard Street is concerned the event had been generously discounted in advance by the steady decline in bill rates, and the effect was scarcely palpable. That the Bank means to make the lower rate fully effective is clear from its action in borrowing a considerable sum from the market. This has materially curtailed the floating supplies of money, and in view of the fact that bills will be maturing almost daily up to the end of the month it is practically certain that the Bank will retain a firm hold of the market, especially when it is remembered that the revenue collections will also make a marked impression upon supplies. The Bank of France, too, has advanced its rate for loans to 4 per cent., with a view to checking any speculative exuberance on the Paris Bourse, and also, it is believed, to warn the Wall Street gamblers. Everything considered, it is only natural that discount rates should have hardened, and that money should be now more usable. A maintenance of such conditions may be expected for some weeks to come, but, provided the situation in New York should not become threatening, the position of the Bank by that time may justify a further reduction in the rate.

Consols Subdued—Money and Earthquake Effects—Japanese Prominent—Yields on Foreigners—Russians Sensitive

The reduction in the Bank rate has not made any palpable impression upon the market in gilt-edged stocks. As a matter of fact the event had been discounted in advance, while any further demonstration has been effectually checked by hardening up of money rates following the action of the bank in denuding Lombard-street of its surplus supplies, while the Jamaican catastrophe has contributed towards the same end because of the possibility of some liquidation on the part of the insurance companies concerned. Values, however, hold their ground well, and it seems likely that they will continue to do so because, though money may remain by no means cheap during the next few weeks, the reduction in the Bank rate implies that the tension in the situation generally is passing away. It must be confessed that the outlook is not devoid of an element of uncertainty, but taking everything into consideration, gilt-edged stocks at the relatively low level ruling do not seem an unattractive purchase. In the foreign market Japanese bonds continue most prominent as a consequence of the country's satisfactory trade position, the Budget figures, and the probability of a conversion loan being issued soon. The Four per Cent. bonds of 1905 seem to be rather attractive. The following table indicates the approximate yield obtainable upon foreign stocks:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Argentine 4 p.c. Rescission	92½	£4 7 0
Do. 4 p.c. 1900	88¾	4 10 0
Brazilian 4 p.c.	86½	4 12 6
Chinese 5 p.c. Gold	104	4 16 0
Japan 4 p.c. 1905	88½	4 10 0
Do. 4½	94½	4 15 0

As regards Russians there is nothing fresh to chronicle, the bonds wobbling somewhat erratically despite the Budget figures. In view of the unsatisfactory condition of the country generally this is not unnatural, and I may repeat that Russians constitute a very uncertain holding.

HOME RAILS AND PUBLIC APATHY—BUSINESS SLACK BUT PRICES ADVANCING—THE HEAVIES IN DEMAND—GREAT WESTERN POSITION AND PROSPECTS—THE FIRST OF THE DIVIDENDS—TILBURY'S SATISFACTORY ANNOUNCEMENT—METROPOLITAN'S DISASTROUS SHOWING—THE CITY AND SOUTH LONDON RECOVERY.

There is still justification for the grumbling heard in regard to the paucity of business in the Home Railway market. While perhaps things are not quite so bad as one might gather from the facetious comment of a leading dealer that there was now no Home Railway market, but only a place where the jobbers stand, it must be confessed that the public so far has been very slow to awaken to the possibilities involved by low prices, increased earnings, dividends, and cheapening money. In view of this dormant attitude it is, perhaps, the more significant that prices during the last few weeks have shown a distinct tendency to move up, for if the advances (which during the past week alone ranged from 1 to 1½ upon the "Heavy" stocks) can be brought about on such a scanty volume of business it is plain that the market would go ahead pretty rapidly once the public appetite were really aroused. Glancing over recent movements in prices, it is noteworthy to observe that North-Westerns have quite recovered from the temporary fright caused by the news of the White Star's partial removal from Liverpool to Southampton. Brums, indeed, have gone ahead along with the stocks of the other trade lines, the improvement having been fostered by expectations that were duly realised of a reduction in the Bank rate to 5 per cent. Lancashire and Yorkshire, North-Eastern Consolidated, Hull and Barnsley, and Great Northern Deferred, regarding which immediate dividend prospects are specially bright, have been prominent in the recovery. Some months ago, when they were at about 42, I ventured to predict that Hulls would go to 50, and I am glad to see that that price has now been reached. York Deferred, which I thought were bound for a similar goal when they stood below 40, have already climbed to 47, and there is no reason to believe that the upward movement is over yet. So far as North-Westerns and North-Easterns are concerned, the earning prospects were, perhaps, never better, but one could speak more confidently about these stocks if it were not for the heavy capital issues which must be made in the near future, judging by the debit balances shown in the last half-yearly reports. Perhaps the "Heavy" stock that offers as bright possibilities as any to the investor willing to exercise a little patience is Great Western Ordinary. The Great Western has been criticised somewhat severely of late on account of the liberal manner in which it has been spending upon capital account, but there is no doubt that for the most part the Board's disbursements have been the outcome of wise forethought. Slowly but surely the physical condition of the road has been improved, until practically every curve of importance between London and Plymouth has been eliminated. The new Great Central joint line, too, which has given the Company a direct route to Birmingham, should be an important factor upon earnings as time goes on, and the newly completed Honeybourne and Cheltenham Railway is also a valuable potential asset. This line, in conjunction with another short line at present under construction, will give the Great Western a more direct route between Birmingham and Staffordshire and Cheltenham, Gloucester, Newport, and Cardiff. It seems to have been part of a definite policy laid down by the Great Western to construct entirely new railways rather than widen existing tracks, and such policy has undoubtedly much to commend it, for while new railways create new traffic, the land required in connection with their construction can be obtained at a much lower cost than land alongside an existing railway; in other words, a railway Company requiring to widen its track has perforce to pay an increased price on account of the commercial advantages which its own capital and energy have conferred. Another point in favour of the Great Western is its recently installed Irish service, from Fishguard to Rosslare. This should before long become a very valuable adjunct. During the past ten years Great Westerns have fluctuated between 179½ and 122⅜, and the current quotation is only about a dozen points over the low record. In the same period the dividend has fluctuated between 6 per cent. and 3⅝ per cent. On the basis of the last two half-yearly payments, averaging 5⅜ per cent., the yield at current price works out at 4 per cent. In respect of the past half-year the Board could no doubt increase the dividend at the rate of ½ per cent., but it would be advisable not to base estimates upon a higher dividend rate, taking the year through, as the £2,000,000 of new Ordinary stock will rank for dividend as from the beginning of this year. Of the passenger railway dividends announced so far, perhaps the most satisfactory was that of the little Tilbury and Southend Railway, which increased its rate from 7¼ to 7¾ per cent., besides raising the carry-forward. The advance thus counterbalances the reduction made for the June half-year, so that the distribution for the twelve months is 5⅝ per cent., the same as for 1905. The Great Eastern has repeated the dividend of 5 per cent. paid for the second half of 1905, while carrying forward about £4,000 more. This is perhaps as much as could reasonably have been expected, though some people thought the Company might have squeezed another ¼ per cent. out of the half-year's surplus. The Metropolitan dividend, at the paltry rate of ½ per cent., was frankly bad, but under the abnormal circumstances obtaining throughout the past twelve months no better result had been anticipated; indeed, it would not have been surprising had the dividend been passed. For the year, holders of Mets. get only 1 per cent., as against 2⅜ per cent. for 1905. Better things should be in store this year, now that the dual traction has been abolished, but meanwhile it is not surprising that some holders have cleared out in disgust, and that the price has in consequence recorded a sharp fall. The little City and South London—the pioneer Tube—has, it is satisafctory to observe, been able to pay at the rate of 2 per cent., against 1¾ per cent., thus raising the dividend for the half-year to 2⅛ per cent., as against 1⅞ per cent. for 1905. The Company seems to have surmounted its recent troubles arising from tramway competition in the south, and the stock at 44 might now be picked up by the speculative investor.

CANADIAN AND FOREIGN RAILWAYS—"CANADAS" SLUMP—GRAND TRUNKS STEADY—SOME FOREIGN RAILWAY STOCKS.

The week-end saw a sharp slump in Canadian Pacifics, owing to realisations, but the shares are an excellent holding for investment, and may be cordially recommended to those who can afford to put the shares away for a time. Grand Trunk Prior stocks keep strong, and although the Junior issues are irregular, they tend upward. Mexican Railways show no feature of much interest, and Argentines look unpromising for the time being, the only prominent stocks being Rosarios, Preferred and Deferred, especially the first-named. I give Among minor Argentine Rails there has been a continued demand for the stocks of the North-Eastern and East Argentine, in connection with the amalgamation that has just received the sanction of both proprietors. Cordova and North-Western Debentures have also been in quiet request, and the belief is current in the market that this little line, which, by the help of the Argentine Northern (the Government system), places Cordova in touch with a district understood to be very rich in mineral wealth, will before long be absorbed by one of its bigger neighbours and a guarantee given to the Debenture holders. Brazilian Rails have been bought on the excellence of recent traffic returns. In the case of the Leopoldina current traffics look especially handsome, as they run against a period when the line was hampered by heavy floods. Earnings in the case of Cuban Railways, too, have had a beneficial effect upon the market, the demand being most noteworthy for United of the Havana and Cuban Central issues.

Kaffirs Lower—Improving Conditions—Village Deep—More Dividends—De Beers Debenture Rumours—New Vaal Claim Allotments.

At times during the week Kaffirs were brisk, and inclined to go higher, but the slump in Yankees affected this as it did other departments, with the result that the close exhibits a shrinkage in values as compared with the previous Saturday, Rand Mines being 6⅞, East Rands 4⅝, and Modders 6 7-16. Other shares are proportionately lower. The closing quotations were fractionally above the worst, and the feeling is prevalent that a renewal of activity may be looked for at any moment. Never have the conditions of the mining industry been more favourable to an advance in Kaffirs than they are at present, and this must be apparent to all who do not wilfully shut their eyes to the important developments that are taking place on the Rand, and to which I have frequently drawn attention. The improvement in the Village Deep mine continues, the reef assaying 18 dwts. over 50 in., which is exceptionally good, both as regards value and width, and in the Jumpers the new reef is opening up satisfactorily. Dividends of 12½ per cent. and 7½ per cent. have been declared by the Nourse Mines and Glen Deep respectively. On two or three days the feature in the Diamond section was the remarkable strength displayed by De Beers, Paris being a large buyer of the shares. To account for this activity it was rumoured in the market that some option dealers had been caught short; but while there may be some truth in this, the real explanation of the good buying of De Beers is understood to be the intention of the Directors of the Company, owing to its strong financial position, to pay off the balance of its outstanding debentures in the course of the next year or so. At the date of the last report, June 30, 1906, the amounts of the three series of debentures stood at £3,833,445, and as the Company has enormous reserves it is not likely that any difficulty would be experienced in carrying out any scheme of redemption provided the Directors were so minded. At the close on Saturday De Beers had reacted somewhat, being no better than 27¼, but they are a strong tip for a substantial rise. New Vaal Rivers have also been an active market, rising at one time to 9 on the publication of a cablegram to the effect that the allotments of claims and mining leases on the new discoveries at Droogveld were made at Sydney, the Company's township on the Vaal, on the 16th inst., but they subsequently fell off on profit-taking to 7⅞. It appears that the New Vaal River Company received applications for 121,000 claims, out of which 45,000 were granted, exclusive of one square mile leased to the River Diamonds Syndicate, Limited. This Syndicate has already found several diamonds, amongst which was one weighing 34¼ carats, valued at £6 per carat, in the course of stripping some claims in preparation for washing. After another month or two more definite evidence as to the value of the New Vaal River discoveries should be forthcoming, and should the finds come anywhere near the yield of diamonds indicated by the test washings, they will be signalised by further phenomenal dealings in the shares. The Borrell's Kopje Diamond Mine, which adjoins the New Vaal property, is opening up splendidly. In the south shaft at a depth of 100 ft. the blue ground has considerably improved, and a parcel of it which has arrived in this country has been pronounced by experts to be indistinguishable from the ground in De Beers mine at a similar depth. So far as at present defined, the mine contains 840 claims, and Mr. Bawden, the manager, until recently the general manager of the New Vaal River, is confident that the test washings now proceeding will prove it to be a highly payable proposition. The Mount Yagahong Exploration Company holds a half-interest in Borrell's Kopje, which probably explains the steady demand for its shares

Rhodesians Quiet—Satisfactory Output Figures—The Year's Performance—Chartered—Banket Movement Expected.

The sentiment in regard to the immediate future of the Rhodesian market remains quite hopeful, and as the movement in Kaffirs gains momentum it is generally expected that, owing to the natural affinity between the two, Rhodesians will come in for considerably more attention. In this connection one would imagine that the growing importance of the gold production ought to lend some assistance. The output for December is not a record, but the figures leave little to be desired, the total of 48,329 oz. comparing with 48,503 oz. for the preceding month. This brings the aggregate production for the year up to 551,875 oz., which contrasts favourably with the 405,048 oz. of 1905, so much so in fact, that 1906 will likely prove a red-letter year in the history of the country's gold industry. Roughly, the average monthly output works out at practically 46,000 oz., as compared with about 33,900 oz. during 1905, while another point worth noting is that in two years the quantity of gold won has more than doubled, as may be seen from the following table:—

——	1902.	1903.	1904.	1905.	1906.

Total	194,268	231,872	267,715	407,048	551,875

The significance of the production figures is no doubt stimulating the buying of Chartered which originated in the expectations centred about the forthcoming report. The opinion that the document will reveal an improved financial position is becoming more confident, and a further upward movement in the shares is anticipated as the event draws nearer. Of Bankets, too, a hopeful sentiment prevails, and as a gamble pure and simple, I still consider the shares fairly attractive. Intrinsically they may or may not be worth even their present price, but such a consideration would not deter the insiders who are contemplating the movement. Here is my usual table:—

WEST AFRICANS STAGNANT—BROKEN HILLS ACTIVE—PROP DIVIDEND DISAPPOINTMENT—ZINCS—COPPERS—MOUNT LYELLS STRONG—SIBERIANS RECOVER SLIGHTLY.

Rather than passing away, the stagnation which has characterised the Jungle for such a long time past would seem to be becoming more pronounced, and on the whole the market is as uninteresting and featureless as seems well nigh possible. Further comment upon this state of affairs, which, as I have frequently remarked, is not altogether unnatural, is superfluous. The speculative interest in the Broken Hill group continues active, and in regard to Proprietaries the market anticipated an increase in the forthcoming distribution upon the 1s. 6d. dividend and 1s. bonus paid in respect of the previous quarter. It is almost beyond question that the mine is earning considerably more than it has paid out in the shape of dividends, and in view of the satisfactory outlook it was considered that the directors would be less conservative in regard to the distribution. However, no alteration is made, to the disappointment of the market generally. The dividend of the Block 14 of 1s. each on both the Ordinary and Preference shares is as before, but encouraging developments in depth have brought the Ordinary into greater prominence. Supplementary advices indicate that the lode is improving both in value and in width, and altogether the development may be regarded as promising. As regards Zinc Corporations, with the position of which I dealt a week ago, they continue to absorb considerable attention, a result, primarily, of the completion of one of the plants. The other ought to be working by the end of March, and the venture is also acquiring large smelting works in Swansea. By looking on for a while, however, I consider the prospective purchaser would be able to get in cheaper, and in this connection it must be recognised that the existing price is rather high. There is no abatement of the boom in Copper shares despite the further improvement in visible supplies of total stocks denoted by the mid-monthly statistics. Mount Lyells continue the centre of considerable speculative interest as a result of the supplementary cables concerning the developments in depth to which I referred last week. This is calculated to materially enhance the value of the mine, which, with the metal still at a very remunerative level, must be earning substantially greater profits. Rio Tintos continue to beat records in the matter of high price as a result of the manipulation of the clique that has been so long in evidence. While it would be erroneous to say that the sentiment in regard to the genuineness and legality of Siberian mining titles is now quite confident again, the feeling is distinctly more hopeful, and this, together with a little interested support, is reflected in a recovery from the recent slump. Whether this will be retained it is difficult to say with any amount of accuracy, because of the element of uncertainty still attaching to the question of "titles." Appended is my usual table:—

WESTRALIANS QUIETER—OROYAS RECOVER—KALGURLIS—NORTHERN BLOCKS REPORT—"COSMOPS."

There is not much interest being evinced in the Westralian market, either professional or otherwise, for which the greater activity of Kaffirs and miscellaneous mining shares is to a certain extent responsible. In spite of this, however, the tendency of values generally is satisfactory enough, a feature of particular interest at the present moment being the relative firmness of Oroya Brownhills, which have been recently depressed by the greater recognition of the fact that the property is nearing the end of its tether as a high-grade proposition. This change is to be ascribed to more encouraging development rumours. No indication of any such improvement, it may be mentioned, can be adduced from the latest development report, and in any case one thing is certain, that if it is to alter the position to any appreciable extent the rumoured improvement will have to be of a distinctly important character. This is clear, and for my part I am inclined to consider the shares already too high on merits. As regards Kalgurlis, they seem to be losing some of the sustained strength of recent months, and this, together with the deduction of the dividend and bonus, makes them appear rather cheaper. There being nothing more "to go for" at the moment it is quite conceivable that a still lower quotation may be established within the near future, in which case the shares would be all the more attractive as a speculative purchase, especially as the property continues to open up promisingly. The report of the Associated Northern Blocks makes a satisfactory showing and is worthy of brief reference. Although the quantity of ore treated was only slightly larger, there is a material improvement in the net profit earned consequent upon the reduction of 2s. 3d. per ton to 21s. 9d. per ton in the working costs, and the smaller sum written off for development, etc. The ore reserves of 101,769 tons compare with a total of 89,400 tons twelve months ago, but the average value is rather lower, at 19.8 dwts., as against 22 dwts., and the estimated gold contents is only slightly larger. Among the "Little Kangaroos," Cosmopolitans are receiving more attention, in consequence of the report that the Company has leased from the Duchy of Cornwall the Phœnix tin mine, situated near Liskeard. This property is an extensive one, containing, according to report, about 2½ miles of lode averaging 12 feet in width. With tin at its present remunerative price there is the greater inducement to reopen the property. Deep Lead descriptions remain more or less neglected, but a revival of the speculative activity in Loddon Valleys is

INSURANCE NOTES—AMALGAMATIONS—BENEFITS TO PROPRIETORS—INSURANCE MONOPOLY.

There seems to be no doubt that the Union Insurance Company is to be taken over by some other office. In all probability that office will prove to be the Commercial Union. These amalgamations among insurance Companies, or rather the absorption of some offices by others, have been very numerous and on a very large scale in recent times, and there are more or less well-founded rumours of other amalgamations coming in the near future. The subject is one of great importance, and it is seldom, if ever, dealt with in the way which seems to me most appropriate. In the insurance world these amalgamations are generally objected to really, if not avowedly, because they limit the number of chief officers, to some extent limit the number of branches, and thereby tend to block promotion. This is a very natural cause for objection on the part of insurance officials, but does not by itself constitute any argument against amalgamations.

For the shareholders of insurance Companies the sale of one Company to another is usually profitable to both parties to the contract. In order to tempt proprietors to sell, the purchasing office almost invariably offers a price which is greatly in excess of the market value of the shares of the Company being sold. The managers and directors of Companies taken over normally contrive to make very good bargains for themselves. For the most part the purchasing Companies seem able to turn to good account the businesses which they buy, and to derive increased profits which more than compensate for the high price paid for good-will. Thus, considered from the point of view of shareholders, the argument runs distinctly in favour of amalgamations.

The most important class of all, however, is the policy-holders. For them the majority of the absorptions which have taken place have been advantageous, while a few have been the reverse; and each instance has to be considered on its merits. There is a great distinction to be made in this connection between life offices and other insurance Companies. Practically everybody insured against fire fares just as well in one Company as in another, since nearly the whole of the business is controlled by the Tariff Association and people have to pay whatever this Fire Offices Committee determine. The fire insurance Companies which gave the policy-holders participation in profits have almost entirely disappeared at the dictates of the Tariff Association, and though the public have thus been deprived of the opportunity of insuring on such favourable terms as were formerly available, the existing policy-holders were treated quite handsomely. In regard to accident, employers' liability, and other miscellaneous forms of insurance, the differences between the policies of various Companies are not very great, and as long as the office in which they are assured is sound it does not matter vastly much to the policy-holders what Company they go to. For the present, therefore, amalgamations among fire and accident offices are not disadvantageous to the policy-holders, but there may be some danger of the interests of the insured suffering in the future through the business becoming a monopoly in the hands of a few managers who form a Tariff Association and thus acquire absolute control of the whole business. I fully recognise the necessity of some form of co-operation among insurance Companies, partly for the purpose of using the accumulated experience of all for the guidance of each, and partly in order to prevent the cutting of premium rates below a remunerative point which is of no advantage even to policy-holders. Experience of rate-cutting, especially in the United States, shows that it tends to the promotion of wild-cat Companies which, when claims arise, are unable to meet their liabilities. Policy-holders then learn that they would have been wiser to pay fair rates of premium to sound Companies than to select an office which charged the lowest premium, regardless of its inability to pay claims.

At the same time, it cannot be ignored that there is a very real danger that a few huge Companies acting in combination, and consequently having the public at their mercy, may, in the interests of shareholders, sooner or later impose conditions which are unduly onerous. The position of tariff offices, both fire and accident, is immensely strong. The difficulty of starting new Companies to prove anything like formidable competitors increases every year, and if a new office is a success, it usually joins the tariff sooner or later. Policy-holders are, of course, unorganised, and for the most part unable to communicate with one another or to take any concerted action; consequently, if the insurance combine attempted to misuse its powers, the only remedies for the public are the criticisms of the press and legislation. Personally, I think the press is abundantly powerful enough to protect the interests of the public. At the same time, I think it is necessary that the possibility of an oppressive monopoly should be recognised, and that any undue exercise of power should be exposed at once. Let me add that in the course of last year, in spite of the San Francisco losses, the tariff rates for certain kinds of fire insurance were reduced because experience showed them to be too high.

Amalgamations among life offices stand on a very different footing owing to the immense preponderance of the policy-holders' interests and the relative insignificance of the stake which shareholders have in the business. This, however, is too large a subject to be dealt with to-day, and I reserve it for future treatment.

"TRUTH" LETTER BOX.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

G. H. W.—Buy India Threes, Rand Water stock, and South Australians. Consols.—No particular principle is adopted; the rate is ruled mainly by the price of money.

RAILWAYS.

Guernsey.—Take no notice of the adverse criticisms, which are obviously badly inspired. Cappadocian.—Debenture stocks are well secured, but personally I should not buy American Railway Ordinary issues. Pacific.—As you have a good profit on your Canadian Pacifics you had better take it. J. Nib.—The full

ROMANO'S RESTAURANT, STRAND.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's—I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire, and this opinion is evidently shared by many, for the restaurant was packed, as it deserves to be."

dividend on the First Preference is probable. Prospector.—If you think the shares are unduly inflated, why don't you sell out? It seems monstrous to me that you should take advantage of my advice, and then when you have had a good profit abuse me. Bourn.—Canadian Pacifics, Grand Trunk Second Preference, and Brighton Preferred Ordinary. M. P.—1. I suggest that you transfer into Canadian Pacifics or Grand Trunk Second Preference. 2. The shares are worth holding.

MINES.

Shansi.—I should suggest Robinson Central Deeps and Modders, in addition to Arizona Coppers. Coupon.—I am sorry that I cannot advise you. Draught.—The shares are a sheer speculation. Minero.—The shares are good to hold, provided you can afford to wait for a recovery. Mem Sahib.—1. I understand that the concern is reliable. 2. I have no special information, but I know nothing to the concern's disadvantage. 3. The system seems fair. 4. Your selection of mining shares seems a fair one. Carnwath.—1. I think you might hold on to Great Cobar shares. 2. Port Lincolns are a fair speculation. Dart.—I should not be inclined to buy the shares. Copper.—The outlook for the mine is rather uncertain. B. W. L.—Buy some Goldfields Ordinary. Sculler.—The shares are a fair speculation. Hill Church.—I should not recommend you to join the new company. Cuyre, Dublin.—1. Utah Apex shares are a promising lock-up. Naturally, if there were a heavy drop in the price of copper it would be reflected in the price of the shares. 2. The shares are worth holding on to. 3. Worth considering as a speculation. 4. Both ends are good to hold so long as you can take them up and can afford to wait for better conditions in the Kaffir market. W. Sly.—The shares are a fair speculation. T. C. B.—Hold on to No. 2 and sell the others. H. W.—I think you might buy Johnnies for a recovery at an early date. R. L., Tralee.—The mines have a fairly long life, and you might buy the shares, provided you are in a position to take them up for a little time. Douglas,—The shares make a good speculative investment, provided you can afford to take them up. Jenkins.—Victorian Deep Leads are a good healthy gamble. They cannot be regarded in any other light.

MIXED SECURITIES.

J. B. L., Bunbury.—1. I believe the concern is reliable. 2. Mexican Railway Second Preference Stock is a good holding, provided you can afford to stick to it. 3. I look for a higher price for Great Northern Deferred. F. T., Leeds.—1. An option such as you suggest should turn out profitable. 2. The concern is reliable. 3. I should prefer Coronations, Cargo Fleets, and Furness Withys. C. A. B.—You might hold on to Chinese Fives, Monte Videos, Argentine '84s, Peruvian Debentures, Guayaquils, and Portuguese. The others I should leave alone. Mendip.—1. The Great Cobars are worth holding for a higher figure. 2. The prospects of the Dominion Atlantic Company do not seem to be particularly bright. Honesty.—1. The carry-over charge was correct, and was regulated by the condition of the money market. 2-3. Neither of the Indian mining shares is attractive. 4. I do not recommend a purchase. Wall.—1. Hold on to the shares for higher prices. 2. Do not buy any more shares. Lee.—1. The brewery shares are a good investment. 2. I should sell out. 3. Not a desirable holding. Seven.—1. I have no information about the company, but should be inclined to leave it alone. 2. The company is an obscure one, and I cannot furnish you with any information. 3. Try Grand Trunk Ordinary stock. 4. The bonds are not purchasable on the instalment system. 5. I look for a rise in Anacondas. 6. Neither share is promising. 7. The prospect of the shareholders getting more than the present market value of the shares is remote. Benny, Leeds.—1. The company is understood to be doing not very well. 2. Try Lyons' Preference and Slaters' Preference. Stuart.—I suggest that you buy Rand Water Board stock, Grand Trunk First Preference, and Brighton Deferred. Greenhorn.—The concern is reliable. H. H., Reading.—You would probably be safe in buying Nos. 1, 3, 5, and 6. Tickham.—1. Your investments as a group are satisfactory, and are worth holding. The Japanese 5 per cent. special loan of '96 might also be kept. 3. There seems no reason why you should sell Rexer Arms at present. B. O.—1. The shares are worth holding. 2. An excellent investment to put away. 3. I have not a good opinion of the shares. 4. Good to hold on to for a recovery in South Africans. 5. The shares are a satisfactory holding. Q. C.—1. The holding of the shares is not compatible with security for your capital. 2. The shares are worth holding. 3. Try Grand Trunk Second Preference stock. 4. I have not a high opinion of the company. Hyde Park.—1. Your selection of shares is a good one. 2. I think you might buy some Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunk First Preference. Blake.—Nos. 1 and 3 are good enough to hold. If you want more on No. 2 transfer into the Ordinary. Aberdonensis.—1. The company is a good one. 2. I have no knowledge of the company. 3. A promising speculation. Brook Street.—Your selection of shares is a very indifferent one, and I should suggest that you sell out. Francisco I.—1. The brewery shares are worth holding. 2. Good enough to hold on to. 3. Both railway stocks are good enough to retain. 4. A good speculative investment. Leeds.—1. Hold the shares, but buy no more. 2. A very poor speculation. 3. I do not favour Americans at present prices. 4. I believe the concern is all right.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Hunter.—1. Apply to the Royal Insurance Company or the London Life Office. 2. Have no dealings with the concern. It ought to be obvious to you that you cannot get such a high rate of interest compatible with safety for your principal. Alpha.—1. I believe the concern is reliable. 2. The option ought to turn out profitable. H. B. M., Perak.—The concern is a swindle. Brixton.—Buy North Westerns. A. B. C., Sutton.—The man is a swindler, but there appear to be plenty of fools in the world to keep him going strong. Jaggers.—1. If you want to buy premium bonds do so through the Credit Lyonnais or Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. 2. I suggest that you leave the people named severely alone. D. D. and A. E. T.—See above reply about premium bonds. Atheneum.—It is the old concern, and I should advise you to have no dealings whatever with it. F. P. G.—To my regret, I am not in a position to advise you. B. B., Londonderry.—A reply was sent to you in the ordinary course, but you must blame yourself if you missed it. W. J. H., Newcastle.—I am obliged to you for the copy, which you have passed on to me, of the latest effusion of Mr. J. B. Mackenzie, of 23, Rood Lane. C. B. S.—I suggest that you leave the concern alone. J. G., Fife.—The concern is a low bucket-shop, and should be avoided. A. G. C.—Obviously the man is a swindler. Sin.—The shares are a good speculative purchase. Auceps.—1. Of the two I should prefer Savoy Hotel Five per Cent. Debentures. 2. Indo-China Steam Navigation shares are the better. Bootie.—The concern is very indifferent, and you had better get out. Domus.—1. I have not a high opinion of the prospects of the company. 2. Both the industrials give fair promise. 3. It is probably a question of measurement. Ladies' Agency.—I do not recommend a purchase of the shares. J. B. B., Belfast.—I should not sell Coats shares just now. M. V. A.—The company is in a safe position, and you would be well advised to continue the payment of the premiums. Grand Merci.—The shares are not negotiable.

INDUSTRIALS INTERESTING—MOTOR SHARES CONSPICUOUS—TEXTILE INDUSTRY FLOURISHING—GAS STOCKS—TELEGRAPHS—BAYS QUIET—BANK SHARES—DOCKS.

There is not much cause for complaint in regard to the complexion of affairs in the Industrial market generally. Public interest seems to be steadily broadening out, and in view of the satisfactory outlook, more especially as regards the trade prosperity of the country, which is naturally of the utmost significance in relation to such securities, a still greater degree of confidence is likely to be engendered in the immediate future. The reduction in the Bank rate, too, is calculated to further stimulate the country's industry, and, generally speaking, I believe the Industrial market to be worthy of closer consideration. In point of interest the strength of Cycle and Motor shares is most conspicuous, Humbers, Darracqs, and Daimlers being singled out for special attention. Indications seem to imply that the "boom" experienced by the industry and reflected in the reports covering the past financial year, is gathering further momentum, in which case there seems to be justification for the existing high prices of the shares. In connection with Darracqs, it is important to note that the concern has just secured the largest contract in the history of the motor industry, an order for 4,000 motor cabs having been accepted. In order to enable the Company to complete the contract special works have been erected. The Ordinary shares, even on top of the rise, appear rather attractive in view of the foregoing contract, and possess speculative merits of no mean order, while the Preferred Ordinary are also worth considering. As regards Humbers, it must be considered in relation to the possibilities of the current year that the Company has no longer any arrears of Preference interest to make up, and the outlook, despite

THE DANGER TO HEALTH of obesity is not sufficiently emphasised. Stout people should know that "fatty degeneration" of the heart and liver is a constant menace to them. The Sketch, in writing about ANTIPON, says:—"This pleasant, rational, and most efficacious remedy may be warmly recommended to stout persons, as much for health's sake as for the attainment of perfect elegance of figure." Price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per bottle, of all chemists, or of The ANTIPON COMPANY, 13, Olmar-street, London, S.E.

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

the recent fire, is for a substantially larger Ordinary dividend, in view of the reports of large orders being booked. Daimlers, too, are a rather attractive purchase as a speculative investment. Textiles continue to absorb quite a fair degree of attention, stimulated by reports that the industry is still experiencing prosperous conditions. Fine Spinners, Sewing Cottons, and Calico Printers appear the most attractive. The following table shows the approximate yield obtainable upon Gas stocks:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
British Gas Light	42	£4 12 6
Commercial 4 p.c.	112	4 12 6
Continental Union	126	5 2 6
European	25	4 0 0
Gas Light and Coke	101	4 7 6
South Metropolitan	129	4 5 0
South Suburban	125	4 7 6

The imminence of the dividend declaration is stimulating the speculative movement in Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred stock. The clique professes to believe that the distribution will be substantially larger than the 10s. per cent. paid in respect of 1905. As I have frequently remarked, an increase is probable, but whether it will be sufficiently large to fully justify the existing price of the stock appears to be doubtful. The dividend of the Direct United States Cable Company leaves no ground for complaint. The quarterly payment is 4s. per share, making 8s. for the half-year, in comparison with 6s. 6d. for the corresponding period of 1905. On the strength of this achievement the shares, like many others in this group, the merits of which I have frequently emphasized, would seem to make an attractive holding. They would give over 5½ per cent., while amongst others, Anglo-American Preferred, at the ruling quotation, yields almost 5½ per cent; Eastern Extension 5 per cent., and Direct Spanish 5½ per cent. As regards Hudson's Bays they remain more or less uninteresting, but the general impression is still sanguine enough, and now that the Bank rate has been reduced a recrudescence of the manipulation on the part of the Anglo-American-Canadian clique is generally expected in the immediate future. Should this prove to be the case a still higher price will be established, but nevertheless, I consider it desirable to repeat that "Bays" have now become too heavy for anybody but a man of substance. There is little interest being evinced in Chinese descriptions, Pekin Syndicates being neglected because of the absence of any further news respecting the development of the coal measures. Should, as is expected, the recent disappointments be the result of a purely local fault in the formation, it is safe to assume that the shares will experience a recovery. Here is a table showing the yields obtainable upon Bank shares. It may be mentioned that such holdings have the disadvantage of involving a liability in respect of uncalled capital. Such a risk is very remote, perhaps, but it nevertheless exists:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Barclay & Co. (£20—£8 paid)	26½	£4 10 0
Lloyds (£50—£8 paid)	32	4 10 0
London and County (£80—£20 paid)	93½	4 5 0
London and Provincial (£10—£5 paid)	22	4 1 0
London and Sth. Western (£50—£20 paid)	72½	4 7 6
London and Westminster (£100—£20 paid)	54	4 16 0
National Provincial (£75—£10½ paid)	41	4 7 0

Dock stocks remain much in evidence, more especially London and India Deferred, the position of which I have had occasion to discuss more than once recently. The dividend possibilities scarcely seem to justify anything like the present figure unless it be that the results of the second six months have more than compensated for the shrinkage of the first half. Even so, there is scarcely a chance of any improvement upon the 1¾ per cent. distribution of 1905, but the existing inflation is to be ascribed to some extent to the benefits expected to accrue from the materialisation of the Port of London Bill, which, by the way, has been postponed for another year.

QUEER STORY.

A PECULIAR PERSON.

"Such awful rot! I call it simply contemptible." Thus spoke Frank Norman, a subaltern of two years' standing, home from India on his first long leave. The scene was the smoking-room of a well-known country house in the Shires, where the men of the party had forgathered, after the retirement of the ladies to bed, and, to the accompaniment of much tobacco and whisky, were chatting without restraint on all sorts of topics.

In the course of conversation, some one happened to refer to a case that lately attracted a certain amount of notice in the papers—a case in which a member of that sect known as the "Peculiar People" had been arrested on a charge of manslaughter in connection with the death of his wife. The mention of his case led to some discussion about the tenets of the devotees of that strangely perverse creed, and resulted in Frank Norman pronouncing summary judgment upon them, as reported above.

"Don't you agree with me, General?" inquired the young man, turning to his host, a grey-headed, but hale and erect old soldier, who hitherto had taken no part in the discussion.

"I don't endorse their views, certainly, if you mean that," replied the General gravely. "But contemptible is not exactly the adjective I should apply to these people, nor, for that matter, to any body of men who honestly believe in, and act up to, their religious convictions, however wrong-headed and even pernicious such convictions may be."

"But do you think these fellows are honest believers in their convictions?" rejoined young Norman, incredulously. "For my part, I look on the lot of 'em as mere canting humbugs. And cant and humbug are just the two things I can't stick, at any price."

The General smiled. It amused him to hear this young man of twenty-two laying down the law with such sweeping assertiveness, as few but very young persons have the courage and the omniscience to do. He had been in the habit of doing the same thing himself, in the days of his juvenile infallibility, and had often settled conclusively, in five minutes, questions which have been perplexing sages ever since the foundation of the world. But years and experience had now made him not quite so cocksure in his judgments, and had taught him that every man who may happen to differ from you, even on the most vital points, is not necessarily either a knave or a fool.

"I am quite at one with you, Norman," he said, "in your contempt for cant and humbug. But when you assume that these Peculiar People—misguided though they are—all fall under that category, you are making a very large, and I venture to think, unjustifiable assumption. I do not speak at random, either. I once thought exactly as you do, on the subject. But I had a lesson—a severe lesson" (a look of pain and remorse came over the old soldier's face as he spoke), "which I have never forgotten. Indeed, it makes me feel bad, to this very day, whenever I think about it. I don't know whether you fellows would care to hear the story," he added, looking round the room, inquiringly.

The offer was received with general expressions of approval. General Bickerton was famed for his skill as a raconteur, and every one knew that a story from his lips was sure to be interesting. So the company settled themselves to listen in confident anticipation.

"The circumstances which I am going to tell you about," began the General, "happened to me more than twenty years ago, when I was major and in command of a small hill-station in Northern India. Some little time previously a civilian high in office—I have forgotten his name—holding strong religious views of the ultra-evangelical type, had induced the Government of India to provide in every barrack where white troops were quartered a room called a prayer-room, where men could retire who wished to be quiet, and where the more serious-minded could hold prayer-meetings and Bible classes and discuss religious questions. I don't know if they keep it going still. Possibly they don't. Anyhow, there was one in this station at the time of which I speak. It was rather elaborately fitted up with foot-stools, book-shelves (containing a certain number of improving volumes), and a harmonium in an advanced state of wheeziness. The walls were hung round with texts, and some rather highly-coloured pictures of the horrors of drink and the future fate of publicans and sinners.

"Some of the men liked it, and went there a good deal. But it had one objection: it was close to the quarter that did duty for a theatre, and it sometimes happened that between the songs of a smoking concert you could hear the asthmatic rumbling of the harmonium or the voice of some fervent convert raised in pious exhortation.

"I did not like to interfere with the men to whom this sort of thing appealed. For even then, when I was a good deal less tolerant of the Salvation Army style of religion than I am now—I nevertheless recognised that there were very many worse ways in which Thomas Atkins might employ himself, and that whatever kept him from drink and things still less desirable made for his moral welfare, and, therefore (hysterical rot though much of it appeared to me), should not lightly be discouraged. All the same, I could not help thinking that the enthusiasts who ran the prayer-room sometimes purposely arranged their meetings as a counter attraction to the theatre next door.

"The leading spirit was a civilian. To this day, I don't quite know how he got into the station; but he had official permission to occupy married quarters. He was generally known by the natives as the second-class padre, to distinguish him from the official Church of England chaplain. His religious tenets, so far as I could make out, were a hotch-potch of those of the Salvation Army and the Peculiar People. At any rate, he was a whole-hearted believer in the complete efficacy of faith and prayer, and, in particular, regarded the practice of medicine in sickness as an unwarrantable and impious intrusion into the domain of Providence.

"He had no ostensible means of existence, but lived on faith—that is, on what the frequenters of the prayer-room gave him voluntarily, and on broken victuals from the barrack-room. It must, indeed, have been a meagre livelihood for the enthusiast and his wife and children. They all looked half-starved—the man most of all. But he never complained and he never begged. Indeed, except in the exercise of his religious avocations he seldom spoke to anybody.

"He was a curious man. Several times when I visited the prayer-room I had tried to talk to him, but I could never get anything out of him and soon gave up the attempt in disgust, setting him down as a morose and uncivil person, upon whom any attempt to be kind was thrown away.

"This impression of him was confirmed by his demeanour when I met him outside barracks. He would never take the slightest notice of me, nor even say 'Good morning'! I confess it provoked me a good deal, especially when I chanced to meet him walking with men who would, of course, salute me, while he would turn his head in the opposite direction. And I rather hoped some occasion might arise to give me the chance of rapping him over the knuckles.

"In the hot weather following this man Jones's (I will call him Jones) arrival at the station, we had an unusual number of invalids and convalescents sent up the hill, and in order to house every one we had to pitch tents. As Jones was not actually entitled to quarters, he and his family were among the first to be turned out under canvas.

"One morning my boy came to tell me that the second-class padre sahib wanted to see me. I went out into the verandah and found Jones there waiting. I asked him what he wanted. After some hesitation, and in an awkward, embarrassed, shame-faced sort of way, he told me. It appeared that his wife was down with a sharp attack of fever; and he wanted to know whether I would sanction her being admitted into the female hospital, where all soldiers' wives were treated when ill.

"Now, of course, I never had any intention of refusing his request. On the contrary, I was genuinely sorry for the poor woman, whose hard fate in being married to such a man and having to pass such a beggarly existence commanded my unqualified pity. But I thought that here was a good opportunity to give that fellow the rap over the knuckles which I had long been wanting to administer.

"'It's a most extraordinary thing,' I said, contemptuously, 'that all the time you've been living in quarters you've never come near me, never even had the civility to wish me good-day when we met, in fact, have ignored my very existence. But the first moment you want something, here you are hat in hand. You know that your wife is not entitled to treatment?'

He hung his head, sheepishly, and admitted that he knew this to be the case

"'Besides,' I went on, determined to rub it into him unsparingly, 'I thought that people of your persuasion put no trust in medical treatment, but hold to the belief that faith and prayer are the only effectual remedies. If that is your honest conviction, why do you want your wife to go to the hospital?'

"He remained silent, twisting his battered sun-hat round and round; then he slowly turned away.

"'Stop,' I said—for I thought I had now jobated him sufficiently—'I will give you an order.' And I went to my table and wrote one out for him. He took it, thanked me—still in an embarrassed, hesitating sort of way, as though he were reluctant to be beholden to me for a favour—and hurried off. But after a few steps, he stopped and came back to the verandah.

"'I think,' he said, colouring and stammering, 'that there are some charges made for admission into hospital. I ought to say that I have no money, and therefore cannot pay them. Is it possible for them to be dispensed with in this instance?'

"The fellow's cheek—as I regarded it—incensed me. And I let him have it.

"'I don't understand your religion at all,' I said. 'It seems to me that a creed which makes a man uncivil, idle, and neglectful of providing the means to support his wife and children is an uncommonly poor creed to pin one's faith on. If you'd set a little less store by faith and a little more store by works, you'd be a better specimen of Christianity. . . . There! I will settle whatever charges are payable—for your unfortunate wife's sake, not for yours; and the sooner you get her into hospital, the better.' He went off without a word.

"In the course of the morning, I looked up the station doctor, a real good fellow, and asked him to do what he could for the sick woman, see that she had all she wanted, and keep her in hospital until she was completely recovered; as I was sure that, if she were discharged upon convalescence she would stand little chance of picking up strength upon the meagre fare with which alone her husband could provide her. Then I returned to my office, rather pluming myself on the telling off I'd given the second-class padre sahib, and wondering whether it would have any salutary effect upon his future behaviour."

"Serve him jolly well right, too!" ejaculated young Norman, as the General paused in his recital. "That chap behaved just as I should have expected of such a canting worm; and I'm glad you walked into him properly."

"Stay," said the General, "you haven't heard the end of the story, yet, Norman. . . . Would you like to hear it, gentlemen, or will it bore you?"

"Go on," replied one of the company. "The night's young yet." And the General proceeded:—

"Jones's wife had a sharp go of fever; but she was well looked after by the station doctor, who acted upon my suggestion of keeping her in hospital and feeding her up, through the whole period of convalescence—with the result that she was, at length, discharged considerably stronger and more fit than she had been before her illness.

"She was exceedingly grateful for the kindness shown her, and came to thank me, with tears in her eyes, for all that had been done. But her husband never came near me, nor, though I met him on several occasions about that time, did he take the opportunity to utter one word of acknowledgment. I supposed he was still sulky with me for the way I had rubbed it into him, and it gave me a still less favourable impression of him than before.

"About a week or two after Mrs. Jones's discharge from the hospital, the doctor came round to my quarters one evening, and said:—

"'I say, Major, I'm told that praying chap is seriously ill; and I thought you ought to know of it."

"'Well, you'd better go round and see him,' I replied. 'We don't know what's the matter. It may be something infectious. And look here! Do what you can for him, let him have whatever he wants, and put him where you like. The fellow's no favourite of mine, as you know. In fact, I have the poorest opinion of him, But, of course, I shouldn't let any feeling of that sort stand in the way of doing the right thing by him now he's bowled over by illness.'

"The doctor went off, and presently came back, looking decidedly serious.

"'The chap's very bad indeed,' he said. 'Has a sharp attack of fever, and is so badly nourished and generally in such poor condition that I'm afraid it may go hard with him. The one chance for him is to keep up his strength. He should have milk and brandy at frequent intervals. But there's nothing of that sort, and, indeed, very little of any sort, in the house. His wife, too, poor woman, is quite worn out with nursing him. She can't possibly go on another day without breaking down. He must have good nursing, too, as well as plenty of nourishment. It is the only hope—and a forlorn one at that.'

"'I daresay you can arrange that a ward boy and an orderly are told off to help nurse him,' I rejoined, 'and as for the milk and brandy, there will be no difficulty about that. Let him have everything that is wanted. I will settle the charges later on.'

"'Ah! But it is the patient himself who constitutes the difficulty,' he answered. 'Not only did he decline to see me, with such vehemence, that I had the greatest difficulty in persuading his poor wife to let me in, but he resolutely refused to take either brandy, milk, or anything else that I might prescribe for him. He said his religion forbade him to have anything to do with doctors, and that he would have recourse to no other remedies whatever except prayer and faith in God. I tried to reason with the chap, but it was quite useless. Besides, my presence excited him so much that I saw I was doing more harm than good by remaining, so I came away. Now what the deuce are you to do with a fellow like that?' concluded the doctor, with a helpless shrug of his broad shoulders.

"'I'll go and see if I can bring him to reason," I said. 'He mustn't be allowed to die through his own fanatical perverseness.'

"'I wish you would,' answered the doctor. 'You're not a medical man, so perhaps he will listen to you.'

"I went over at once to the sick man's quarters (I don't think I mentioned, by the way, that some days previously the family had returned to their quarters) and saw his wife, who opened the door to me. At once I began to talk to her very seriously.

"'It is absolutely necessary,' I said, 'that your husband should carry out the doctor's orders. And you and I between us must persuade him to do so.'

"She shook her head and burst out crying.

"'Oh, sir, it is quite useless to attempt it,' she said. 'It is against his principles, and nothing on earth will induce him to submit to medical treatment——'

"'But,' I said, 'when you were down with fever, he did not take that line. He came to me himself and asked me to have you admitted into hospital.'

"'Yes, sir,' she answered, while the tears rolled down her poor, thin cheeks. 'But that was because it was I who was ill. He forced himself to go against his conscience for my sake. He would sell his very soul for me or for one of the children; but when it is his own life that is in danger, he is quite inflexible. Besides——'

"And again she burst into a violent paroxysm of piteous sobbing.

"'Besides—what?" I inquired, gently, when she had recovered a little.

"'I—I hardly like to tell you, sir. But—but I think it—it might have been different—I mean I think he might have listened to reason for mine and the children's sake now, if—if it hadn't been for what you said to him when he came to ask you that favour. Oh, sir, you have misjudged my husband! He is a very proud, sensitive man. He felt deeply the terrible humiliation of having to come to you and to ask for that which, in effect, gave the lie to the sincerity of his own convictions. It was torture—it was worse than torture—to him. Yet he braved it in his love for me. And you—you said things to him which, in his agony, stung and scorched him almost beyond endurance. It might have been different had you dealt gently with him then. But now he is dying—and will die rather than give you a handle to taunt him with—with hypocrisy again.'

"I cannot tell you how I felt, as I listened to the grief-stricken woman's words. I am no hand at describing this sort of thing. I will leave you to imagine it. Enough to say that at that moment I would have cut my right hand off, if by so doing I could have recalled those stinging taunts which I had taken such a self-righteous pleasure in rubbing into the poor, misguided fellow.

"'Let me see him,' I blurted out, shamefacedly, 'and I will tell him I am sorry.'

"She led me into the inner room. The padre was sitting up in bed. There was a look about him which I knew well—which made my heart sink. I had seen men with such a look on them before, when dying of fever. And always it had bespoken the last rally that immediately precedes the final collapse.

"He fixed his eyes—how piercing they were, how unnaturally bright!—full on mine. They shone with a fire of proud, triumphant defiance which there was no mistaking. . . . Then he fell back, still smiling proudly, and lay there cold and stiff, with that proud, triumphant smile now stereotyped on his dead features.

"It was thus he had answered my taunting challenge. . . .

"And by God, gentlemen," concluded the General, while his voice shook with suppressed feeling, "that poor fellow's death was such a lesson to me as I have never forgotten—a lesson that will lie heavy on my conscience till my dying day."

For some moments there was a pause, which young Norman was the first to break.

"Thank you, General," he said, as he rose from his seat. "Your story has given me one in the eye that I feel I jolly well deserved. . . . Well, good-night, you fellows, I think I'll go to bed."

ART NOTES.

ARE WE LESS BEAUTIFUL?

ARE the English as a race degenerating physically? The question has, I know, been already debated at length in various places, and various evidence has been brought to bear upon it; but I do not think that of the portrait painter has ever received much attention. Perhaps it is just as well, because even portrait painters do not always tell the truth—in fact, short of the habitués of a County Court, I should imagine that no class of witness could be more generally unreliable. But just as a County Court judge by long experience comes to the power of sifting the little grain from the intolerable deal of chaff, so, by making allowances, we ought to be able to find certain valuable evidence bearing upon our physical retrogression, even from the artistic progress of our portrait painters. But we have to be very careful not to jump at false conclusions. Thus, the eager, but rash, inquirer, who paid a visit of investigation to the exhibition of the Modern Society of Portrait Painters, now being held at the Institute Galleries in Piccadilly, and accepted what he saw there at the foot of the letter, as the French would say, would be almost certain to come away a victim of the darkest forebodings. He would compare the portraits he saw there with those painted several generations since by Reynolds, and Lawrence, and Romney, and the rest, and he would decide there and then that, physically speaking, England is going to the dogs. First of all—before he came to the making of comparisons at all, I mean—he would leap to the conclusion that no Englishman, or Englishwoman, of the middle-classes has nowadays any features to speak of. Their complexions he would put down as being unhealthy, even when not unnatural. Their nerves he would diagnose as universally on edge; their figures as elusive and evanescent. He would not have walked twice round the galleries before making up his mind beyond any possibility of doubt that, taking everything into consideration, the English are about the ugliest set of people under the sun. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not myself say that he would be wrong in this, any more than he would be right. I merely state an undoubted fact, supposing the visitor to be a person of average intellect.

Now, before considering the cause of this phenomenon, I should wish to pop the supposititious visitor into a hansom and carry him off at once to the exhibition which is now being held by the Royal Society of Miniature Painters at the Modern Gallery in New Bond-street. I should ask him to keep his eyes firmly closed during the journey, so that he should not see any real faces en route, and thus diminish the clarity of his impressions. As soon as he opened them again he would at once leap from one extremity of opinion to the other. He would believe that the English are in reality almost too beautiful to be true; that their complexions are those of slightly unripe peaches tinged with carmine, that they have most expressive eyes, which are so accentuated as to be quite out of keeping with the rest of their faces, but are extremely beautiful for all that; that their lips are red and pouting, their hair beautifully arranged, their expressions of a contented amiability which is not far short of the ideally inane. He would believe, in a word, that the English of the middle class, however it may be with their brain-power, may vie in beauty with the most fascinating dummy that ever adorned a hairdresser's window.

Having arrived at his conclusions, the observer may now, as far as I am concerned, go away and formulate them, first, I hope, communicating to the secretary his desire to have his own miniature painted by whichever of the artists has most caught his fancy, and to have it set in a real gold mount ornamented with pearls, as a gage d'amour for his lady-love (though that he need not mention to the secretary).

Now, if he have been, as I suppose, collecting material for his great essay on Physical Degeneration in Great Britain, the thoughtless visitor is likely to find these two artistic aspects of his subject rather hard to reconcile. How is it, he may well ask, that the same sitters which, to the Modern Portrait Painters, appear so evanescently hideous, yet impress the Royal Miniaturists with the solidity of their simperings, the inanity of their beauty? There is, as a matter of fact, more in both than meets the eye. In the first place, we must remember that while the Modern Portraitists express themselves and their sitters in feet, the Royal Miniaturists think, as it were, in inches. Magnify one of the simpering miniatures by twelve, and it might well appear sternly ferocious; diminish one of the Modern portraits to the same degree, and who shall say how simperingly beautiful it might seem. For, as we all know, virtue carried to excess becomes a vice, and vice versâ.

Again, the miniature and the painting are destined for different ends. The six-foot canvas is to hang in a baronial hall, or, more probably, over a dining-room mantelpiece. It will be seen, as a rule, along with its original, gazing down upon him as he welcomes his friends to his hospitable board. Thus, comparing him with it, or meeting him, after absence, when they have seen it but not him, they will find that he is really much better-looking than they have hitherto thought—that he is, by comparison, rather good-looking than otherwise. It is true that after his death—but by that time the matter of his good looks is not likely to interest him. The miniature, now, has, or had originally, a different mission. It is a tender gift to the absent lover or spouse—male or female. It is intended to keep the giver's features always in their mind, to prevent their errant fancy wandering, to be always carried in their bosom and to be referred to whenever opportunity offers. Obviously, therefore, it should represent its subject as being amiable and beautiful—more so, even, than the original—not necessarily intellectual—for what has love to do with intellect?—but quietly, calmly, simperingly beautiful. Already we may see that there is some method in the contrasted methods of the two schools of portraiture. But there is more to come.

It is a fact of striking significance that whereas the exhibitors at the Modern Portrait Show are almost all men, the vast majority of the Royal Miniaturists are women. We are thus given an opportunity of realising and contrasting the intense, almost reckless ambition of the male painter with the sober caution, the law-abiding orderliness of the woman. The Miniaturists trace their artistic descent directly to the immortal Miss La Creevy, whose life and works are so convincingly set forth in "Nicholas Nickleby." Her ideals are theirs; her methods are, to a very large extent, theirs also. They realise to perfection how and why the great foundress of their school succeeded in satisfying her sitters. To satisfy their sitters is their own very proper ambition; what could, then, be wiser, they very sensibly argue, than to adhere to her example? And so they do. The Modern Portraitists, on the other hand, greatly daring, rush in where the Miniature angels fear to tread. They claim descent from the great masters who made English portraiture world-famous in the eighteenth century. Are they content to follow slavishly in their masters' footsteps? Not a bit of it. "We must improve upon them somehow," they very nobly cry. But they have found that they cannot paint portraits more beautiful than did Reynolds, or Romney, or Gainsborough. So they take the only possible alternative—they determine to make their canvases hideous, that no one may accuse them of lack of enterprise. And so they do.

I do not offer these reflections as all that may be aroused—both on the subject of British physical degeneration and other subjects—by the comparison of the two exhibitions in question. I have no doubt that, if called upon, I could fill pages and pages upon the subject. But I am not called upon. And I am quite sure that the reader who is interested in the matter will be amply qualified to do his own reflections thereon. But I feel confident that, in the end, he will arrive at the same conclusion as myself—that the British public, upon the average, is neither majestically hideous nor simperingly beautiful, but somewhere between the two. And that upon the great problem of National Degeneration our present-day portrait painters throw scarcely more light than I do.

MUSIC.

THE DEARTH OF GREAT SINGERS.

A LEADING concert agent who has just returned from a trip to the Continent in search of new singers, announces in effect that he travelled from Dan even unto Beersheba without finding what he wanted. The conclusion is melancholy, but hardly any other was to be expected. The dearth of great singers is one of the most notable phenomena of the musical world to-day. Mediocrity abounds, but of genius the supply is lamentably scarce. Where are the successors to the singers of bygone years? It is easy to ask the question, but difficult to supply a satisfactory answer. True, more vocalists than ever before are inviting attention at present, but how few can be reckoned in the first class. To consider for a moment our native vocalists only, how limited is the list! Under some heads, indeed, the dearth is almost absolute. Where is the English tenor to-day who can be named as the worthy successor of Sims Reeves, or the baritone who can be reckoned in the same class with Santley? Tenors and baritones of a kind we have, certainly—many of them gifted and cultivated artists who make the most of the powers which have been vouchsafed them. But is there one out of all before the public to-day seriously to be recognised as a legitimate successor of such singers as those named? Only the other day a well-known authority who happened to be in a position to bear personal testimony on the point, was writing to the same effect. "Who," asked Mr. Joseph Bennett, "that remembers Titiens, Lemmens-Sherrington, Rudersdorff, Edith Wynne, Sainton-Dolby, Janet Patey, Sims Reeves, Edward Lloyd, Weiss, Santley, and others easy to name, can look with equanimity upon their successors as a body, albeit some of them have conspicuous abilities?"

Doubtless it is easy to exaggerate in these cases. Seen through the mists of time, the figures of the past always tend to loom larger than life-size. Whereas the inferior singers of former years are forgotten, the few of merit are remembered, and so a false standard is set up. Making due allowance in this respect, however, are we really the victims of hallucination in questioning the claims of our latter-day vocalists? It would be pleasant to be able to think so. Abroad, as at home, much the same condition of things would seem to prevail. Here and there, over the whole of Europe, and not forgetting America, you may find, no doubt, many good singers. Italy has given us, of late years, a Caruso, a Tamagno, a Battistini, and plenty more of smaller note. From France we have had a Maurel, a Plançon, a Landi; and from other quarters have come such notable artists as the De Reszkes, Van Rooy, Ternina, and others who have won their triumphs chiefly in Wagnerian opera. But even so, it is permissible to doubt if any such standard of vocalism prevails to-day as was current a generation since. Without going back to the fabulous achievements of Farinelli, Caffarelli, Gizziello, Faustina, Catalani, and the rest, are there any singers now before the public capable of rivalling the achievements of Patti, Nilsson, Albani, and Trebelli, among women vocalists who can still be remembered by many, or of Mario, Rubini, Tamberlik, and Lablache, among many male singers of about the same period? If so, it would certainly be pleasant to know their names and addresses.

Assuming the fact, what is the explanation? Why are our latter-day vocalists inferior to their fore-runners? Different authorities would doubtless suggest different answers, but most would probably agree that lack of adequate study has not a little to do with the matter. Porpora, it has been recorded, kept Caffarelli for five or six years to one page of exercises, and at the end of the time told him that he was the greatest singer in Europe. It would be amusing to learn the experience of a modern teacher who proposed to one of his pupils the adoption of the same course. The average vocal student of to-day considers himself a finished artist at a time when he would be reckoned just qualified to begin serious study by the teachers of an earlier period. While no amount of training will make fine voices out of poor material, the history of singing furnishes not a few instances—that of Pasta is one of the best known—in which limited natural powers were developed to an astonishing degree by study and training. Nowadays the converse case is more frequently illustrated, and one hears fine natural voices steadily ruined through the faulty manner in which they are used. For a conspicuous illustration one need not look outside the members of the company at present performing at Covent Garden. Modern music has also, no doubt, had its influence—not because, as the old anti-Wagnerians used to declare, it is harmful to the voice in itself, but simply because it is possible to sing it without such stringent exercise and study as that of the older school absolutely necessitated. The trills and roulades of the old florid music are now voted tiresome and banal, but at least they implied a kind of vocal training of which there is little enough to-day. Rossini, Donizetti, and the rest have been avenged, in fact, in a wholly unanticipated manner. We have given up the frivolous music, but therewith have lost the power to sing that of a higher kind which has taken its place.

The opening performances of the German opera season at Covent Garden have been attended so far with the greatest success, and there seems every reason to hope that the financial results have been equally satisfactory seeing what excellent audiences have been attracted. The most noticeable performances of the opening week were, of course, those which Herr Nikisch conducted—particularly that of "Tristan und Isolde," in which he was quite superb. In "Der Freischütz" and "Der Fliegende Holländer" he had hardly the same opportunities. Both works, to tell the truth, make rather tiresome hearing nowadays, whether under Nikisch or anyone else—though it is heresy, of course, to say so. Herr Reichwein has done well, also, with the bâton, and in all other respects the performances have been worthy of high praise, even though there has been no overlooking the German quality of most of the singing. Under the last named head a non-German artist who made a great success was Mme Ackté, so well-known in Paris, who won many friends alike as Elsa and Senta. The singing of Dr. Felix von Krauss has also contrasted gratefully with that of a good many of his compatriots. This week "Die Walküre" was to be done on Tuesday, and "Die Verkaufte Braut" is down for to-morrow (Thursday).

Among recent concerts that of the Queen's Hall Orchestra on Saturday was attractive as usual, including as it did works so far apart in style as the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart and Debussy's "L'Après Midi d'un Faune," both of which, in common with all the other items in the programme, were given with all of his usual spirit and taste by Mr. H. J. Wood. In the closing scene from "Götterdämmerung" Miss Agnes Nicholls sang brilliantly but was seized with sudden indisposition in the midst of her task. She pluckily recovered herself, however, and managed to get through without further mishap. At the London Ballad Concert on Friday Mme. Clara Butt was once again a leading attraction, while that fine pianist M. Raoul Pugno also contributed to the programme. A pianist of a different school who has been heard of late is Herr Gottfried Galston, who has embarked on a series of one composer recitals, the first of which, devoted to Bach, showed him once again to be a player of high intelligence and some individuality. Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, and Brahms are to furnish the remaining programmes of the series.

Speculation has been general of late as to the effect of the new Act in relation to secret commissions in the musical profession, where it must be agreed there is certainly scope for it to operate with advantage. Everyone knows how generally the commission system obtains in the musical world—from the organist who levies tribute on the makers over the purchase of a new instrument for the parish church to the pianoforte professor who kindly selects a piano for his pupil in return for a consideration of which the latter usually knows nothing. In neither case would there be any objection to the practice if the element of secrecy were absent, and the Act referred to does not, of course, prohibit the acceptance of commissions when the circumstance is disclosed. Such disclosure will, however, be unpalatable to many, and it will not be surprising if, as a consequence, not a few incomes, none too large already, are still further diminished. As regards professional musicians purchasing pianos for friends, it has been suggested that the new law may be got round in some cases by the instrument being nominally sold to the teacher in the first instance and afterwards resold by him at a higher price to the intending purchaser. A teacher could, however, hardly adopt this course as a practice without the fact becoming generally known, and this being so it would seem simpler and more straightforward to comply with the Act as it stands. It is doubtful, moreover, whether such a procedure would not constitute a contravention of the new law. But we shall know more on this and other points a little later when the Secret Commissions and Bribery Prevention League gets to work.

Herr Nikisch has been talking in interesting fashion to a Tribune interviewer on the subject of the art of which he is so supreme an exponent. "To let the instruments sing," he told his interlocutor, "is the secret of conducting. Song is the soul of music; everything in an orchestra has to sing, even the dryest instrument. The conductor is like a skilled sportsman who lets the horses have the reins and yet guides them. As long as my picture of the music is not spoiled I let the player and singer draw the line. I remember well my own feelings when playing in the orchestra. I was cut short, still being on the last beat of a bar, when the military conductor began the next." In regard to the trend of opera at the present time, Herr Nikisch deprecated, it seems, the notion that the success which has attended Strauss's "Salomé" implies any general tendency in the direction of works of that order on the part of the general public—which many will be pleased to hear.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke has been taking part in the composer v. publisher controversy, though precisely what is the solution which he suggests I cannot quite gather from his remarks. One learns generally, however, that he thinks rather poorly of the publishers for their ignoble prejudice in favour of works which pay—a view, I am afraid, which is not likely to advance matters very much. Mr. Holbrooke goes on to pay a generous tribute to the work of a younger contemporary, namely, Mr. B. J. Dale, on whose recently published pianoforte sonata he bestows high praise, which should certainly draw more general attention to the work than it has hitherto received. In any case, it is pleasant to see one young composer going out of his way in this fashion to give another a helping hand.

A good deal of indignation is being expressed in quarters not entirely disinterested over the action of the wicked Australian musicians who positively think that they are capable of conducting their own musical examinations (and of turning to good account the fees derived therefrom), without the aid of those itinerant professors representative of the Royal College of Music, the Royal Academy, Trinity College, and other English institutions by whom the bulk of the work has been done in the past. "Could anything be more ungrateful or uncalled for?" it is asked, in accents of indignation. "How can high-thinking Australian musicians be influenced by such sordid considerations?" Yet the position of the Australians is quite reasonable. At present, it is argued, thousands of pounds are paid every year in fees to the various visiting examining bodies, and practically the whole of the profits go to the assistance of music in the old country. Under the new dispensation it is proposed that such profits shall be devoted to musical education in Australia, and such an arrangement seems perfectly natural.

Those are striking figures which have recently been issued by Messrs. Chappell showing the costs in which they were involved in connection with the suppression of the piracy business and the promotion of the Copyright Bill last year—costs amounting in all to between £8,000 and £9,000. It is an enormous total, and even the most prosperous firm may well feel thankful that it has seen the end, at last, of such a ruinous kind of expenditure. Towards their expenses Messrs. Chappell have received from other members of the trade £1,363, and from the composers £722. The amounts are not large.

According to an interview recently published in a Vienna journal (reproduced in the New York Musical Courier), Dr. Joachim has been paying eloquent tribute to the genius of Brahms:—

> Brahms seems to me the quintessence of an entire musical period. Schumann spoke a prophetic word when he once said that in Brahms one had come with whom we should all experience wonderful things. Brahms brought us new beauties, and he is not only a wonder in depth, invention, and concentration, he is also one of the most astounding apparitions in point of versatility. He is lyric, he is symphonic, he wrote great choral works, among them the glorious German Requiem; he enriched house music through his four part songs; he brought half-forgotten wind instruments into use again in chamber music.

As a master of form, Joachim ranks Brahms, we are told, third in the list, and before even Beethoven—Bach being first and Mozart second. Of Wagner, also, Joachim is quoted as speaking favourably, though it is well known, of course, that his admiration for that master's work is of a very qualified order.

What are the most popular tunes of recent years? At the Palace Theatre Mr. Herman Finck is putting the matter to the test just now by his orchestral selection entitled "Melodious Memories," in which some fifty or sixty of the most popular ditties of the last half-century are recalled. It is an interesting list, beginning with such things as "Champagne Charlie," "Not for Joe!" "Slap, bang! Here we are again"; continuing with "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay!" "Dollie Gray," "Queen of my Heart," and others of a few years since, and coming down finally to such still more recent productions as "O, listen to the band," "Dear little girlie, girlie," and the sublime "Bill Bailey." It would be a nice point to determine whether the superiority rests with the older or the later examples. What is perhaps the most curious feature in connection with popular ditties of this order is the limited character of their vogue. Why should a tune which appeals with irresistible force to one generation fail to evoke the slightest response ten years later? The fickleness of the public in this matter is astonishing. The readiness with which a tune is taken up in the first place is equalled only by the celerity with which it is dropped again when it has served its purpose, and apparently it never regains its popularity. It has its day, and ceases to be.

The scheme for a "Three Towns Coast Festival," which owes its inception to Mr. J. M. Glover, Bexhill's musical mayor, appears to be one worthy of all encouragement. Guarantors from the three towns of Eastbourne, Hastings, and Bexhill to the extent of £1,500 only are required, and, these obtained, the project will be energetically forwarded. If only as a business proposition (to use an expressive Americanism), it should appeal to the inhabitants of the towns in question whose welfare is so intimately bound up with the attraction of visitors.

Talking of seaside music, complaint comes from Weymouth of a kind only too familiar in this connection. Each summer a band is provided for the benefit of visitors, and hitherto excellent results have, it seems, been obtained from an orchestra composed of Englishmen and led by an English conductor. This year it is proposed by the Amusements Committee of the Town Council to engage in their place a band known as the White Viennese Orchestra. As a consequence, a large number of ratepayers are making energetic protest. On the face of it it is hard to understand a local authority going out of its way to encourage imported performers at the expense of the native article in this fashion, and it may be hoped that the attention which has been directed to the matter may induce a more considerate policy. No one in his senses objects to the presence in this country of distinguished foreign performers whose merits entitle them to be heard, but in a case such as that referred to it can hardly be pretended that there are not hundreds of native musicians capable of doing the same work equally well, if not better.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—The contrast between the two estimates of D'Alembert—that of Miss Tallentyre in "The Friends of Voltaire" (1) and that of Mrs. Bearne in "Heroines of French Society" (2)—is characteristic of the two volumes. D'Alembert to Miss Tallentyre was "a child, affectionate, solitary, tractable, with the great mind always weighed down by the super-sensitiveness of a child's heart"; whereas to Mrs. Bearne, who sees the philosopher through the eyes of that Pharisaic prig, Madame de Genlis, he "was ugly, common-looking, with a shrill voice telling stories that displeased her—even disgusting." Indeed, Mrs. Bearne's point of view throughout her extremely interesting book is distinctively feminine. Only a woman, e.g., would rank La Marquise de Montagu amongst the heroines of French society, and only a woman, perhaps, at this time of day would weep Royalist and sentimental tears over the destruction of the Bastille. Speaking of the visit of that unctuous professor of a virtue she failed to practise—Madame de Genlis—to the Bastille, Mrs. Bearne says:—

> Madame de Genlis was so far identified with the revolutionary party as not only to rejoice at the infamous attack of the mob upon the Bastille, but to consent to her pupils' request to see the mob finishing the destruction of that beautiful and historical monument.

However, whatever other fault you may find with "Heroines of French Society," you cannot possibly charge the book with dulness. From the first page to the last it has the interest of graphic gossip about famous personages. Here, e.g., is a characteristic glimpse of Napoleon. He sends for his brother-in-law, Leclerc, and orders him off to St. Domingo. When Leclerc pleads that he is bound to France by a tie he cannot snap, Napoleon cries:—

> "Your wife, my sister, Paulette? She goes with you." "It is not my wife, but my sister now at school at Mme. Campan's." "You must marry her at once: I shall find her a husband." "But——" began Leclerc, hesitatingly. "I have spoken: Say no more about it!" cried the Emperor, and Leclerc was dismissed. A few minutes later Davoust most unluckily entered to announce to the Emperor his approaching marriage. "With Mlle. Leclerc? A most suitable match," cried the Emperor. "With Mlle. Leclerc! No, General, with Mme——." "With Mlle. Leclerc, I say," repeated the Emperor. "It is a most suitable marriage, and must take place at once." "But," pleaded Davoust, "I have long loved Mme.——. She is now free. Nothing shall make me give her up." "Nothing but my will," Napoleon rejoined sternly. "You will go at once to Mme. Campan's school at Saint Germain, and there you will be presented to your future wife by her brother, General Leclerc. I shall act as the bride's father and provide the dot, the wedding dress, the presents, and the marriage must take place as soon as the legal formalities can be arranged. You know now my wishes, and have only to obey them."

Hereupon the Emperor rang for Leclerc to introduce him to his future brother-in-law, and that ceremony over, he packed the two generals off to St. Germain, where Davoust was introduced to Mlle. Leclerc, whom to his extreme disgust—for the girl was not in the least to his liking—he had to marry a day or two later! Here, again, is a characteristic glimpse of the days of the Terror:—

> One dark gloomy day during the height of the Terror, Isabey was sitting in his studio when a woman wrapped in a large cloak knocked and entered. "You are the painter, Isabey?" "Yes." "I want you to paint my portrait at once." "At once, Diable! You are in a hurry." "It is not I who am in a hurry, but the guillotine. I am on the suspected list to-day, to-morrow I shall be condemned, and I wish to leave my children this remembrance of me." "I shall set to work at once. Madame. In what costume do you wish yourself painted?" "In this," she answered; and throwing off her hood and cloak she showed herself to be a woman still young and pretty, her hair powdered and covered with a simple little cap, her dress, a grey silk, a green apron, high-heeled shoes, and in her hand a carton. "I am Mme. Venotte," she went on. "I had the honour to be marchande de dentelles to la sainte reine, whom they have sent to God. I wish my children always to see me in the costume I used to wear, when Marie Antoinette deigned to admit me to her presence." Though Isabey painted the portrait in haste, with tears in his eyes, it was one of the best he ever did.

Miss Tallentyre's "The Friends of Voltaire" is a much more solid book than "Heroines of French Society," but it is at least as interesting. It gives you characteristic sketches of such pioneers of the Revolution as D'Alembert, Diderot, Condorcet, and Beaumarchais. Of the galaxy of stars here presented to you, Vauvenargues shines with the clearest, purest light, and his aphorisms ought to be set over against Rochefoucauld's, of whom, indeed, Vauvenargues himself said truly that "he had turned men from virtue by persuading them that it was never genuine." The aphorisms of Vauvenargues are, in fact, as profound and optimistic as Rochefoucauld's are pessimistic and shallow; and most profound of all is his famous axiom to whose truth all the great revolutions and religions of the world testify, "Great thoughts come from the heart." Vauvenargues always resisted the besetting temptation of the aphorist, and especially of the French aphorist—the temptation to sacrifice truth to smartness. No one took more to heart his own maxim, "Would you say great things? Then first accustom yourself never to say false ones." And it must be remembered, and Miss Tallentyre's sketch reminds you of it in every page, that Vauvenargues' noble, brave, suffering, sympathetic and active life illustrated perfectly his manly and optimistic aphorisms. "Who can bear all, can dare all," and "Few sorrows are without remedy: despair is more deceptive than hope," were taught to Vauvenargues by his own sufferings and through his own faith and fortitude. Surely Diderot might have been forgiven more than Miss Tallentyre is inclined to forgive him, if only for his magnanimity. When a lampoonist tried to blackmail this most generous of men by demanding a sum for the suppression of a satire against him, Diderot cried, cheerfully, "Oh I can do better than that for you. Dedicate the lampoon against me to the brother of the Duke of Orleans, who hates me." "But I don't know the Prince." "Sit down, and I will write the dedication for you." He did, and so ably that the satirist obtained a handsome sum. Diderot, too, in the heat and height of his arguments, hammering black and blue the knees of Catherine of Russia—before whom, as before Medusa, every one else was turned to stone—is surely a figure that compels more respect than Miss Tallentyre is willing to concede him? All her portraits, however, stand out clear and sharp in this graphic book, which deserves an honoured and permanent place in your library. You will not, I think, like the style in which Mr. Edgar Saltus has written his suggestive history of love, ancient and modern, "Historia Amoris" (3), but unquestionably it is a suggestive and brilliant piece of work. Again and again, however, it is disfigured by such chopping sentences as, "Cleopatra must have been very heady. Cæsar knew how to keep his head. He could not have done what he did, had he not known. Dissolute, as all men of that epoch had become, he differed from all of them in his epicureanism. Like Epicurus, he was strictly temperate. He supped on dry bread." But all the different loves of the different ages, ancient, mediæval, and modern, are succinctly, adequately, and imaginatively described in Mr. Saltus's vivid pages. I have left myself space only to recommend to you a rollicking novel, Mr. Keighley's "A Beggar on Horseback" (4), whose hero is the stage Irishman, reckless, generous, high-spirited, and, according at least to modern commercial notions, unprincipled. He is, however, a most engaging young fellow, while his adventures are extremely interesting and entertaining reading. —Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

In his introduction to Mr. W. T. Fyfe's book, "Edinburgh under Sir Walter Scott" (Constable, 10s. 6d. net.), Mr. R. S. Rait asserts that during the half-century prior to the death of Scott in 1832 Edinburgh rather than London was the intellectual centre of the kingdom. Not every one will be disposed to admit this, but there will be a ready acceptance of the more modest claim that the society of the Scottish capital in those days "included a long series of remarkable men," some of them distinguished in the world of letters, others renowned for different achievements, and characteristics, and even eccentricities. With Scott, the greatest of them all, as the predominant figure, Mr. Fyfe has drawn a vivid picture of the intellectual and social life of this memorable period in the history of "the modern Athens." He has gathered materials for his book from many sources, and it is particularly rich in stories of the literary lights and legal luminaries of the time. Social habits were a strange mixture of coarseness and extreme decorum. Swearing and drunkenness were regarded almost as virtues, and apropos of this an anecdote of one of the judges, Lord Hermand, may be quoted. Another judge passed a light sentence on a young fellow charged with the manslaughter of a companion during a drunken quarrel. Lord Hermand, who was an ardent worshipper of Bacchus, publicly expressed from the Bench, his disapproval of this leniency, his view being that such affrays brought discredit on the custom of drinking! "We are told," he said, "that the prisoner must have been in liquor. In liquor! Why, he was drunk! And yet he murdered the very man who had been drinking with him! Good God, my laards, if he will do this when he's drunk, what will be not do when he's sober?"

"Birket Foster" is the subject of the most recent of Messrs. Black's colour books (price, 20s. net). Mr. H. M. Cundall has written an appreciative and interesting life of the artist, but, as is usually the case in this series, the illustrations rather than the text constitute the principal attractions of the book. In addition to many of Birket Foster's sketches, with which the letterpress is interspersed, the illustrations comprise between ninety and a hundred full-page plates, of which seventy-five are reproductions in colour from his water-colour drawings. The pictures chosen for the purpose are thoroughly representative of the work of this popular artist, including, of course, not a few of those charming paintings of rural scenes by which he was most widely known. The reproductions in colour have been admirably executed.

Mr. Carl Jeppe modestly asks that his book, "The Kaleidoscopic Transvaal" (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d. net), shall be regarded as an impressionist sketch rather than as an attempt to write history. It is a sketch, however, which will give the average readers a much clearer comprehension of the troubled history of the Transvaal than many more pretentious volumes. Mr. Jeppe went to live in the Transvaal as a child in the early seventies. He was one of the first settlers at Johannesburg, where he practised as a lawyer, and took a prominent part in the public life of the city down to the time of his appointment in 1897 as Consul-General of the Republic at Cape Town. He was closely associated both with Boers and Britons, and in dealing with the disputes that arose he has obviously sought to be fair to all parties. Not the least conspicuous merit of Mr. Jeppe's book is, indeed, its freedom from anything in the nature of partisan bitterness and racial animosity; and he enlivens his narrative with constant touches of genial humour and an abundance of interesting personal reminiscences.

In a volume entitled "Hindustan under Free Lances," which Messrs. Brown, Langham, and Co. will publish, Mr. H. G. Keene, C.I.E., narrates the careers of some half-dozen of those early adventurers who made the British conquest of India possible.

Mr. John Foster Fraser's new book, "Red Russia," announced by Messrs. Cassell and Co., is the outcome of a visit which he paid to that country to study the causes, the happenings, and the consequences of the revolutionary movement.

There will be a number of hitherto unprinted letters in the memoir of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, by George Paston, which Messrs. Methuen will publish. The letters are printed from the Wortley Montagu MSS. at Sandon Hall by permission of the Earl of Harrowby.

Messrs. G. Woolliscroft Rhead and F. A. Rhead, the authors of "Staffordshire Pots and Potteries" (Hutchinson and Co., price 21s. net), are both of them artists intimately associated with the famous industry of which they write. Their work is neither a technical treatise nor a detailed history, though they trace the progress of the potter's craft in Staffordshire from its beginning in Roman times. What they give is rather a series of studies of the potters during different periods, with an account of the conditions under which they worked and their more notable achievements. There are sketches of many men famous in connection with ceramic art, and the book, which is lavishly illustrated, is of interest to the general reader as well as to the connoisseur and collector.

"First Words of an Idler" (Routledge) is a little volume of poems by Mr. Robert Cruttwell, a young Oxonian, whose "apology on his book going out into the world" was hardly needed. Many volumes of poetry have been launched with much less justification. Mr. Cruttwell's verses are always pleasing, and often display a rare felicity of thought, fancy, and expression. "The Death of Shelley," the last and longest piece in the book, is in particular worthy of very high commendation.

"The Letters of Queen Victoria," in three volumes, edited by Lord Esher and Mr. A. C. Benson, will be published by Mr. Murray in October. It is understood that the letters printed in these volumes form the first part of her late Majesty's correspondence, coming down to the death of Prince Albert in December, 1861. Every letter or paper dealing with public affairs, which was either written or received by Queen Victoria, has been carefully preserved in the so-called secret library at Buckingham Palace.

Mr. John Long announces a new novel, "The Folly of the Wise," by Mr. G. Sidney Paternoster. It is a love story—"the love story of a woman of wit and beauty, who awakes so keen a rivalry among her admirers that the result would be disastrous to herself had she the fear of Mrs. Grundy before her eyes."

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—There is an art in attending the cheap sales. Those who have not attained it buy cheap "lines," as they are called. The architecture of these garments is what was once, and may be still, called brummagem (a rude word for Birmingham). Take blouses, for instance. The cheap ones, sometimes got up specially and purposely for the sales, are badly cut and inexpertly put together. The sleeves incommode the arms, the chests are narrow, the backs wide, and the collar declines to "stay put." Weary hours have to be spent by the purchaser, or maid, or sewing woman, in altering what will never come right, because it is faulty in cut.

Now the correct thing to do at a cheap sale is to buy French models (as they are called, though the majority of them have never been in France), even if they are a little soiled. A blouse made of Valenciennes piece lace, Mechlin or Irish, will clean readily and can be bought for a guinea or so, about one-fourth the original price. In this way one gets really good value. And it is well to bear in mind that it is not always the shops where very tempting things are in the windows to which one should go for bargains. Only experience can guide us in such a matter as shopping. We know a girl who saves up all her money for the last day of one particular sale. Then she spends three or four hours intently and does her shopping so exhaustively that she is fitted out for the whole season from head to foot. She invited her friends to see her bargains the other day and it was really like a trousseau. There were hats, coats, an evening wrap that had (oh, joy!) been marked down from thirty guineas to eight, one or two evening gowns as fresh as paint, petticoats, a neat tailor-made, at least a dozen blouses, gloves, stockings, shoes, and odds and ends.

Lilla will not look at clothes in the cheap sales with the single exception of Redfern's, where she always secures wonders in furs, dress lengths (she declares they are given away), and on one occasion an evening coat for twenty guineas which had never been made under £100.

Then there is Clara, who buys all her house linen at cheap sales. She goes for the lots that are described in the catalogues as "slightly soiled," and gets them astonishingly cheap. It matters little that the things are soiled, for they can be washed. I was with her one day when she bought six tablecloths and sets of napkins for very little over the price of one complete set. They had been wet by some accident. Two pairs of large, soft, fleecy blankets, rather more than slightly soiled, were sold to her for the price of one pair. The sharpness of her gaze, as it travels round the piles of things, detects the best bargains in a way that I in vain attempt to copy.

It is the uneducated who are the greatest enemies of progress. You may reply to this that everybody is educated nowadays, and that, therefore, there are no enemies of progress. So perhaps I had better alter my sentence and say that it is the ignorant who are enemies of progress. Education does not remove all kinds of ignorance, and partial education is the mother of bigotry and prejudice. "And the bearings of this observation lays in the application on it," to quote Dickens.

A few weeks since we discovered an oven that works splendidly over a gas ring, cooks a chicken more delicately than any other oven, and bakes pastry to perfection. Having tried it with our own hands in our special cooking den, I gave it to Annabel, our present cook, who had prepared the bird and rather disdainfully watched our operations. Yesterday I said to her: "Cook the pheasants in the Appleton, Annabel. If it succeeds with them as it did with the chicken, they will be very nice." She semi-sniffed and omitted her usual deferential "Yes, madam." I said to Bee afterwards, "Cook resents the new oven just as she resented the new cake tin. She spoiled the cakes, and now she'll spoil the pheasants." She did. And she did more—she spoiled the new oven by letting it burn. It was a stranger, so she 'eaved 'arf a brick at it. This is the usual kitchen attitude to inventions intended for saving time and trouble. Have you observed it? Is it because the minds of the partially educated are not open to new ideas? Or is it that curious streak of obstinacy that always accompanies a want of knowledge?

Our good old Sarah—now, alas! superannuated—was years before she would consent to use a gas-cooker, and it was only on hearing one praised to the skies by a woman of her own class and age that she gave in. "I mislike new-fangled things," she would say. Even when a clever invention saves servants time and trouble they are so prejudiced that they will not give it a trial. I shall never forget a cooking-pot we once had, in which a series of stew-pans stood above one with boiling water in it, the contents of the upper ones cooking chiefly by steam. When it came home I explained it all to our queen of the kitchen, and, pointing to one particular pan, remarked: "That one always has a little water in it, and when it wants more it whistles for it."

"What, m'm?" with a look of horror.

"Yes; when the water has partly evaporated and gets so low as to leave this pipe uncovered, the air rushes up through it and causes a whistling sound."

"I couldn't stay in the kitchen with anything so out of nature as that, m'm," and she refused utterly to have anything to do with it. In vain may science endeavour to relieve our domestic burdens. Ignorance stands with a bludgeon in the way.

Ella's servants have all had influenza. They caught it in couples, and her household has been turned into an amateur hospital, with nurses and doctor. Ella is very kind to her servants, so they have comfortable beds and well-ventilated rooms to sleep in. When the doctor said that the temperature must be kept up to 65 degrees day and night, Ella at once sent for a "Little Ruby" gas-stove for each of the rooms, which are at the top of the house. This cheerful and pretty little stove requires no flue, and is a treasure. "What I should have done without gas-stoves in the dining-room and morning-room I cannot think," said Ella, "when all the servants were ill in bed and the nurses wanted seven meals a day. A good little helpful charwoman came in to help, but there was no bed for her, and I had to come down in the cold mornings to get Alfred's breakfast. The gas-stove—the Wolseley that you recommended, Madge—had the room warm in ten minutes, and there never was such a fire for toast-making. We had forgotten what good toast was like until we made it ourselves at this gas fire; brown all over, not a pale corner anywhere, crisp outside, yet soft in the middle. We are never going to let servants make our toast again."

"Yes," I said, "'We needs must love the highest when we see it.'"

At which rather inappropriate quotation Ella looked slightly puzzled.

There are some wonderful people in the world; we were listening to one last Saturday, in the person of Miss Martha Craig, an American journalist who has filled in her spare time by discovering an entirely new theory of gravitation, has travelled by herself through all sorts of little known places, and has brought out of her experiences a quiet voice, a charming face, an almost delicately slender figure, and a delightful sense of humour. She gave the American Circle of the Lyceum Club an account of her experiences "in Lonely Labrador," and her matter-of-fact tones were in strange contrast to the intensely interesting things she told us about her adventures in that desolate country. The address was cruelly cut short by the exigencies of time and club routine, but we heard a good deal. One amusing incident was that of the band of wandering Indians who applied to Miss Craig for medicine—every one of them! Miss Craig made them pills of flour and cinnamon and water, fried them over the fire, and told them to take two each, sleep with their wigwam flaps open, and eat a good supper of the bacon and coffee she sent them. They all felt much better in the morning, and looked upon her with extreme reverence. Another band entertained her by a display of magic by their magician. When he had finished, Miss Craig said she would now make some magic, and she started a little gramophone. The Indians were astounded but self-controlled. Then she put in a blank record and asked them to sing, which they did with fervour, beating tom-toms the while ("You can imagine the sort of record I got!" said Miss Craig). "Now," said their visitor, "you shall hear some more magic," and she started the new record. Not even Indian stoicism could stand hearing their own performance reproduced; in reverence and fear they flung themselves upon their faces and scratched the earth with their hands.

Why is it that in our country postmarks are seldom legible? What is the use of a postmark at all if it cannot be deciphered? In France, in Germany, in the United States, postmarks are usually clear and distinct. But here in Great Britain there are but few that can be deciphered. We must get some one to ask a question about it in Parliament. That is the only thing to do now when abuses crop up. To write to the Times was once the usual plan, but the Great God Dagon of Printing House Square has fallen, alas, has fallen!

Ashby Sterry wrote amusingly years ago about the perversity of inanimate objects. "Malignity" was his word, I think, and it does not really seem too strong when you think, for instance, of the vicious way in which the hooks on one's gowns behave. I often wonder if other people's hooks behave quite as badly as mine. I asked Mim this question one day, and before I had quite finished she said, "Oh, yes, quite as badly." These wretched but necessary little implements make a point of catching in everything that affords them a chance and of behaving in a manner that, if actuated by design, would be simply vicious. After a careful coiffure one puts one's skirt on in the only way convenient—viz., over the head, and then hooks make a point of catching in the hair and pulling strands of it out of place in the most irritating fashion. Even when gowns are hanging up in the wardrobe, the hooks catch and hold so that when taking one down there is sure to be damage done. Will no one invent a fastening for us that will behave with the most ordinary civility? Buttons are comparatively harmless, but they can work mischief when they choose. Has it ever happened to you to have the fringe of a tablecloth catch on one of your buttons, and, when you get up, to pull the whole affair after you? I saw that happen once. The unfortunate victim was a man, and the culprit button was in his waistcoat. Two or three cups and plates were rolling about the floor, and his expression of astonished bewilderment, with the fringe still affectionately clinging to his button, was extremely funny.

Minna has some Indian friends in England, and asked us to dine with her last week to meet them. Two days before the appointed evening she came to see us, haggard and worn. "I've been trying to order Friday's dinner," said she, "and I can't remember if the A's are Mahometan or Hindu; so I daren't venture on either beef or ham, and when I explained to the cook she went to bed and won't get up! But I've solved it—I've written to them to come to the Eustace Miles Restaurant instead of home, so now I'm safe—you know, even the ordinary butter wouldn't do! So we'll meet in Chandos-street, Madge, dear, and don't you think I'm ingenious?" We congratulated her, but pointed out that strict religionists would not have accepted an invitation to dinner with her. We had a delightful evening in the pretty green restaurant, and her friends turned out to be Parsees after all! Minna is fairly intelligent, and yet she has no clear ideas about these friends, whom she has known for some time. No wonder our rule in India is so much criticised by Indians, when we cannot even distinguish between members of such different races as are comprised in that wonderful country. We are dreadfully muddled in our ideas about Greater Britain, and mix up Australians and New Zealanders most blithely, a thing which they dislike intensely. It reminds me of a girl I saw last summer at Boulogne, going on board the Folkestone packet. She was obviously Britannic, and the official varied his "Are you a British subject?" by a polite, "English, miss?" She withered him with a glare. "I am not!" said she, "I'm Irish," and she walked up the gangway like an empress.

The Belgrave Ladies' Agency, which has been worked up entirely by educated women into a highly important and widely useful business, has been removed from Ebury-street to new and more convenient premises at 164, Buckingham Palace-road. People who used to gibe and sneer at women's lack of business capacity have been gradually finding their occupation gone. If any such come my way I always point out the wonderful success of Mrs. (Edith) Clarke's cheap fish dinners she inaugurated at one of the great exhibitions held in Kensington. With the proceeds of sixpenny and ninepenny dinners this clever lady made enough money to build the imposing structure known as the National Training School for Cookery, and to inaugurate there the classes which are making such thrifty and capable housewives of the students. And the Ladies' Agency is yet another proof that when women put their hands to the plough they can drive a furrow straight and deep as any man. This Agency supplies servants, ladies' maids, companions, governesses, secretaries, finds apartments and houses for those in search of them, and is especially useful to ladies because, being conducted by gentlewomen, the needs of persons of position are thoroughly understood.

The dance at the Wharncliffe Rooms, Hotel Central, in aid of Princess Christian's crèche at Windsor promises to be a huge success. It has been got up by Miss Cunliffe-Owen, who has managed splendidly to keep down all expenses so as to realise as much as possible for the charity. The Princess has given it her immediate patronage, and so have the Duchess of Devonshire, Lady E. Spencer-Churchill, and many others of position.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—As it was with the "many books" in the wise man's time, so—or even more so—is it, in these our days, with the many newspapers. Of making them "there is no end." They pour forth upon us in ever increasing numbers year after year; morn, noon, and night, they are with us, intimately and copiously. They are all things to all, instructing us about everything in heaven and earth, that every philosophy dreams of. What is it that newspapers do not know and try to teach? The limitations are not on the side of their knowledge, but on our capacity for imbibing it. How much more directly they appeal to us than books do! They supply something always for everyone of every sort and kind, which touches a special chord; their fiction based on fact, and fact based on fiction, strike home somewhere. No subject is too high or too low, too great or too small for them. They treat with equal earnestness and omniscience of the constitution of the greatest empire in the world, and of the constitution of an individual. With regard to the last, what power they exercise on health subjects, and on all our lives therefore. What has ever been more effective in causing general unpleasantness to everyone in our climes than the raising of the old winter "colds" to the rank of "the influenza." Is it not mainly, even solely perhaps, due to the press? Winter always brought its feverish colds, chills, and ills; we took them in the day's work, treated them with tried and trusted family nostrums, pitied ourselves a little, and sat by the fireside until the need for that pity was over. Now who dares to treat the same old symptoms in the same old way? The terrors of influenza have compassed them around; these well known symptoms are full of disastrous possibilities, undreamt of before, when ignorance, unenlightened by articles and paragraphs on epidemics and influenza was bliss. They must be treated for these possibilities with respect, and even in fear and trembling. The winter cold had a sufficiently unpleasant present, but what was that compared to the awful future, which is the specialty of "the influenza"? Now, as if the present were not bad enough, instead of a cheery convalescence to look forward to, we are overshadowed by a future of complications, and of the search for, and discovery of, all our weak points.

Next week our season will be in full swing, though the weather more suggests the spring time than the winter. What mistakes one is liable to make in one's shopping. Furs were so much in excess of the situation last week, and no doubt—though indeed we find it difficult enough not to doubt it just now—they will be very much needed in a possibly near future. The Royal Hospital Ball, on the night of the first Viceregal Levee day, will be the first important entertainment of the season. Lord and Lady Grenfell give pleasant entertainments, at which, of course, the military element predominates. It is a popular one with dancing matrons and maidens, as everyone knows, and especially on the state occasions when the fine feathers which make fine birds are worn. How much there is in dress! And what a long time it takes us—if we ever do learn it—to understand that the man or woman is more than the raiment. Lord and Lady Pembroke are expected to be at their residence, Mount Merrion, for several weeks during the Castle season, and to have Lord and Lady Herbert and several other members of their family staying with them. Lord Pembroke is the principal owner of Merrion Square and other fashionable places in our capital, so that it is only in the fitness of things that he should pay his respects at the Viceregal court. Mount Merrion is little more than five miles from Dublin, on the south side, and enjoys the fresh air from the neighbouring Dublin mountains. Lord and Lady Ardilaun arrived at St. Anne's, Clontarf, last week. Lord Ardilaun will, as usual, have his party at Ashford, Galway, for the woodcock shooting, which is so excellent there at this season and later on. Sir John and Lady Arnott, who, with their family, spent some months at Doneraile, which they rented—as they did last season also—for part of the hunting season, will return to Dublin and take up their residence in their new house in Merrion Square, which belonged to Lord Ashbourne until last year. Lady Ashbourne is visiting Ireland just now and staying with many relatives and friends. Lord Ashbourne has no residence in his native land, but thinks of purchasing one there soon. Whether or not a good time is coming to the country in the near future, an astute lawyer is no doubt better able to judge than are most men. The young Duke of Leinster, who was lately living for some time at Carton, the family seat near Maynooth, is very popular with the people. The pity is that he has inherited some of the delicacy of his beautiful mother, and, as a measure of precaution, is obliged to winter abroad. The Leinster property was amongst the first of the properties sold under the last Land Act. Though no longer a "man of property," in the old meaning of the phrase, his Grace of Leinster is sufficiently endowed with this world's goods, even for a young Duke. Lord and Lady Londonderry, who are staying in the North, are having visitors this week at Mount Stewart, amongst them being Lord and Lady Grenfell.—Yours ever, CLARE.

Partridges à la minute are useful in an emergency:—

Split a couple of quite young partridges down the back, skewer them open, dust them with flour, and season them with salt and pepper. Put them, flesh downwards, in a round deep frying pan, adding 4 oz. of butter, cover them closely with a lid that will fit the pan, and cook them briskly on a hot part of the stove, turning the birds frequently until they are firm to the touch, then add a glass of white wine, boil them up, and pour in a gill of cream; stir all briskly together, and turn them out at once on a dish.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

MR. PRATT. MR. PRATT.

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN.

Daily Mail.—"It is a delightful tale. The book is full of genuine humour, and Mr. Pratt is racy of the soil. All the rest is pure joy. Van Brunt's efforts to sail a boat, and his and Hartley's endeavours to cultivate the sandy soil of the Hermitage, their catching of clams—all is good for hearty and innocuous laughter. We do not know if this is a 'best-selling' book in America, but we do know it ought to be."

Daily Telegraph.—"For those healthy people who like to laugh when they read this is a book that may be heartily recommended."

THE NOVEL OF THE YEAR.

Dundee Advertiser.—"The story runs on absolutely new lines. . . . It is splendidly illustrated."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

SEEING FRANCE WITH UNCLE JOHN.

By ANNE WARNER. Numerous Illustrations by M. W. PRESTON.

Yorkshire Post.—"Not since Jerome's 'Three Men in a Boat' do we remember a more amusing tale of travel."

Telegraph.—"Described with rare humour . . . decidedly entertaining."

Notts Guardian.—"A rollicking, laughable book, appealing to the same sense of humour as Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad' . . . the work gains immensely from the clever illustrations."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

THE SORROWS OF MICHAEL.

By MULVY OUSELEY, Author of "Kitty and the Viscount."

Ladies' Field.—"A vivid and picturesque romance . . . vigorously written and of absorbing interest, it should do much to confirm the author's reputation as a clever writer of romantic fiction."

Glasgow Herald.—"An extraordinary tale."

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's clear name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S-GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,461.

It strikes me that considerable amusement might be got out of a Competition in "Spoonerisms." I suppose there will be few readers of TRUTH who will not know what is meant by that term. But, for the benefit of the uninstructed few, I take leave to explain it.

A "Spoonerism" is a particular form of lapsus linguae by which the initial letters of certain words in a sentence are unintentionally transposed, with ridiculous effect; the term being derived from the surname of the eminent and amiable Head of a certain College at Oxford, who is popularly supposed to be especially addicted to such involuntary transpositions.

For instance, to quote one or two hoary chestnuts, he is alleged, while preaching in the University Church, to have startled his hearers by remarking, "I know that many of you have warmed a fish in your hearts, etc." . . . (meaning, of course, really to have said formed a wish); that, on another occasion, he spoke of something having "vanished like a dutiful dream" (meaning a "beautiful dream"); and that, on yet another occasion, he greatly shocked a lady of his acquaintance, whom he met on a railway journey, by alluding to her "rags and bugs" (meaning, of course, "bags and rugs").

These venerable specimens of "Spoonerisms," which are probably, after all, merely the inventions of facetious undergraduates—are just quoted here in order to make quite clear what is meant.

Now, such hundreds, not to say thousands, of "Spoonerisms" have at one time or another appeared in print, that it would be scarcely feasible to exclude chestnuts from this Competition, and so, without insisting on originality in the matter, I offer, this week, the usual Prize of Two Guineas for:

A SENTENCE, IN INTELLIGIBLE ENGLISH, OF NOT MORE THAN THIRTY WORDS, WHICH SHALL CONTAIN THE GREATEST NUMBER OF AMUSING "SPOONERISMS."

But I would point out that the quality, as well as the quantity, of the "Spoonerisms" will be taken into consideration, and that a smaller number of really funny specimens will be adjudged better than a larger number of specimens that fail in that essential quality.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor should send in more than one sentence of "Spoonerisms."

(ii) All sentences must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, February 4, 1907.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PARROT.—I have handed your letter to the Editor of TRUTH.

RIMABEL.—I much regret the printers' errors in your parody, which I duly note, and will allow for in the adjudication.

VICISSITUDE, SPARTAN, RHO.—I much regret that the solutions sent in by these competitors to Puzzle No. 1,457 were received too late to be included in the Competition.

May I, once again, point out that no solution of any Puzzle Competition can be entertained which is received at TRUTH Office later than by the first post on the Monday on which the competition closes!

Competitors will save themselves much needless disappointment, and the Puzzle Editor much needless trouble, if they will be careful to comply with this regulation.

The best alternative names for the months would be the signs of the Zodiac for the twenty-one days of each month, or for January Aquarius, February Pisces, March Aries, and so on.—Lilva.

The first month of the year, "Income," I would call,
And February "Breve" because shortest of all.
Then March, in new terminology, Vernal should be,
And April, usually damp, "Showery," you see.
Next, May, bright and gay, "Flowery" we'll term;
For June's name "Gloria," I'll hold most firm.
Then July, closely following, "Solaria" may be,
And August "Cereal" pray with me agree!
Soft, sweet September, "Autumna," we might call,
And October, baring trees, I would designate Fall.
November—damp and foggy—ugh! let its name be Misty,
And for dull December? Well! shall we say Hilary.

The Handy Home Remedy.

A box of BEECHAM'S PILLS should always be kept in the house, as, like a "stitch in time," they may save much future worry and expense. On the first sign of any derangement of the system a dose should be taken, and they will invariably have the most beneficial effect. "Prevention is better than cure," we are told. Next time you feel "out of sorts," just take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS, and so prevent a seemingly small ailment growing into serious trouble. BEECHAM'S PILLS prevent illness as well as cure it. Most people take them to keep themselves in good health. These are wise and happy ones—they hardly ever know what ill health is.

There is no medicine in the world to compare with

BEECHAM'S PILLS

They will not harm the most delicate—and the strongest will benefit by using them. They are a tried remedy—the trusted friend of thousands of families all over the world.

Women especially suffer from headache, backache, loss of energy and spirits, Nervous Dyspepsia and many other ailments which make life almost unbearable. Every woman can be immediately relieved of this suffering if upon the first sign of derangement she will take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Worth a Guinea a Box.

Sold everywhere in boxes, price 1/1½ (56 pills) & 2/9 (168 pills).

· TRUTH ·

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1570. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, January 30, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICES.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

An Index to the Sixtieth Volume of Truth will be forwarded, post-free, to any address on application to the Publishing Office, Bolt-court, Fleet-street, E.C. The half-yearly Volume can be obtained at the same address, price 25s.

The Annual Truth Cautionary List will be published as a Supplement with next week's Truth.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King will leave London for Paris on Saturday, March 2, according to present arrangements. His Majesty, who will travel on the Continent incognito as Duke of Lancaster, intends to spend a few days in Paris before proceeding to Biarritz.

It is probable that the King will pay a visit to Ireland at Whitsuntide, according to present arrangements, but it is uncertain whether the Queen will accompany his Majesty on this occasion. If the King does go to Ireland, he will arrive at Dublin on Saturday, May 18, and stay at the Viceregal Lodge for about a week. His Majesty will leave Waterford in the Royal yacht on his return to England on Friday, May 31. On Saturday, May 25, the King is to spend a few days at Lismore Castle with the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, and he will probably pay a brief visit to Lord and Lady Londonderry at Mount Stewart, near Belfast, and to Lord and Lady Ormonde at Kilkenny Castle, but, of course, the programme for the fortnight of his Majesty's stay in Ireland will not be definitely settled for the next three months.

The King will hold a Council at Buckingham Palace on Monday, February 11, when the proposed Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament will be submitted to his Majesty for approval.

Their Majesties' "house guests" at Windsor Castle included the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Princes Edward and Albert of Wales, Prince Charles of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, Princess Henry of Battenberg and Prince Maurice, Prince Arthur of Connaught, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mrs. Davidson, Count Wolff Metternich, Count Gleichen, Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Haldane, Mr. John Morley, Lord Roberts, Lord Redesdale, Mr Waddington, Sir Mortimer and Lady Durand, Sir Cla and Lady MacDonald, Sir Schomberg McDonnell, rcu- Henry Knollys, the Bishop of Ripon, Sir Fleet rse, Edwards, Sir Spencer Ponsonby-Fane, and Comma and Mrs. Colin Keppel.

The King did not join the shooting party in Win s in Great Park on Wednesday, but his Majesty was d to on Friday in the Virginia Water preserves (lunch was served in the Fishing Temple), and on Satur st- in the covers round Cranbourne Tower. On Thurs e the King and the Prince of Wales had a day's pheasan, shooting with Lord Burnham at Hall Barn Park, and excellent sport was obtained by the party, which included Lord Howe and Mr. Henry Stonor.

The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife, who have been residing in Portman-square during the last three months, will leave England shortly with their daughters to stay for some time in the south of Europe. It is expected that a complete change will be greatly beneficial to the Princess Royal. Her health has much improved during the winter, but she is still far from strong, and she will require constant care for a long time to come.

The most amazing balderdash is now printed daily by certain journals, the ignorance of the writers being only equalled by their carelessness. In a notice of Queen Marie of Hanover we are informed that her father-in-law, Ernest Duke of Cumberland (afterwards King of Hanover), was very unpopular owing to his severe policy in Scotland after the Battle of Culloden, and the cruelties which he inflicted on the Jacobites! It really seems incredible that any one could print such crack-brained trash. It appears to be supposed that Ernest Duke of Cumberland, a younger son of George III., who died in 1851, was one and the same person as William, Duke of Cumberland, son of George II., who commanded at Culloden in 1746, and who died some years before his grand-nephew, the aforesaid Duke Ernest, was born. Culloden was fought when George III., the father of Duke Ernest, was in his eighth year.

Prince Charles of Hohenzollern, who has been on a visit to their Majesties at Windsor Castle, is a son of the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, and son-in-law of the late Comte de Flandre. He is a brother of the Crown Prince of Roumania, and nephew of King Charles.

The Grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha is staying at Coburg until after the accouchement of her second daughter, the Grand Duchess Cyril, which is expected to take place next month. The Grand Duchess Marie will then proceed to the Riviera, for a stay of about two months at the Château de Fabron, which is now lent to the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, and she will be joined there by her eldest daughter, the Crown Princess of Roumania.

Prince Fushimi of Japan, who is coming to England on a visit to the Court, has arranged to leave Yokohama for Marseilles on Tuesday, February 12, so that he will arrive in London just about Easter, unless he stays for some time in Italy and France on his way to England. The end of March or the beginning of April is by no means a convenient time for a Royal visit of this description, which is usually arranged to take place earlier in May, or in July, when the Court is at Buckingham Palace. Prince Fushimi is paying a return complimentary visit to acknowledge Prince Arthur of Connaught's special mission to Japan last year for the investiture of the Mikado with the Order of the Garter.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen arrived at Dublin Castle on Friday evening from England, and with their family, including Lord and Lady Haddo, took up their residence there for the season. The Levee and the two Courts are being held respectively on Tuesday afternoon this week and on Wednesday and Thursday nights. Entertainments will be given on other nights of the week, and their Excellencies will attend, with a large suite, Lord and Lady Grenfell's Ball at the Royal Hospital. The members of the Viceregal household who have arrived at the Castle this week include Lords Herschell, Powerscourt, Hawkesbury, Anson, Sir Anthony Weldon, Hon. C. Ruthven, and others.

Mr. Bryce stayed last week, on his visit to Dublin, with the Under-Secretary and Lady MacDonnell at their Lodge in the Phœnix Park. His pronouncement on the University Question, in reply to the Catholic and Presbyterian deputations, whom he received in the Privy Council Chamber at Dublin Castle, caused surprise and even sensation in Ireland. The novelty of having such immediate action follow with such swiftness on the "finding" of a Royal Commission, was enough to cause amazement in a country which long has had reason to view such Commissions as the substitute rather than the prelude for doing anything. It is a case of the sword of Damocles suddenly descending from its traditional hanging position, and the hope is universal that some of the knots of the very knotty Irish Question may at last be cut.

It is understood that Lady Crewe will undertake the duties of "the wife of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs" at the Diplomatic and Official Court which their Majesties are to hold at Buckingham Palace on Friday, February 22. Her duty is to name to their Majesties the Ambassadresses and wives of the other Chefs de Mission, who pass the presence in the order of their precedence.

A correspondent writes:—

I have not often read anything more utterly ridiculous in the papers, even in these days, than the skimble-skamble statement in the World that the late Sir James Fergusson was "a contemporary and disciple of D'Orsay," of whom he really knew no more than he did of Beau Brummell. During the earlier years of D'Orsay's residence in London Sir James was in his nursery, and he was at Rugby during Count Alfred's later period. He did not leave Oxford and enter the Grenadier Guards until about three years after D'Orsay had finally left London for Paris. I should think it is very doubtful whether Sir James Fergusson ever set eyes on the man who is so absurdly and ignorantly mentioned in connection with him.

At one time I used to know poor Mr. Whiteley very well, though I have not seen much of him these last few years, except in occasional business dealings. He was a genial, plain-spoken man, very modest in everything concerning himself, and entirely destitute of the "side" usually associated with self-made men who have been exceptionally successful. No one could ever see him on any matter relating to his own business without being impressed with his wonderful knowledge of every detail of it, and though the concern grew to be so big, he always kept his personal eye on every department. Even when he grew old and turned the business over to a company, he never ceased to visit "the shop" daily, and every customer who dealt there personally knew him by sight. This close personal attention to every essential part of his business was, I suppose, the secret of his success. One would never have thought that he would have come to such an end. Possibly, like a good many other people who look happy enough in every-day life, he had a skeleton in his private cupboard. If so, one would hope now that it may be left there.

The unexpected death of Rear-Admiral Corry is deeply regretted in Service circles. He was an excellent officer, and a very able organiser and administrator, as well as personally popular. Admiral Corry had distinguished himself in many ways, and he did good work in improving considerably the training of boys in the Navy. He gained, early in his career, a reputation for practical usefulness, which made him a persona grata at the Admiralty. His work on "The Executive Officer's Orders," etc., is generally considered to be the most valuable text book on this subject. While Admiral Corry was in command of the troopship Crocodile her engines broke down completely when the vessel was far out at sea, but he succeeded in reaching Aden without further damage. There were nearly 1,200 men on board. Since September, 1905, Admiral Corry had most efficiently filled the appointment of Admiral-Superintendent of Chatham Dockyard.

Sir Francis Evans was an active and very able man of business, with an exceedingly genial manner. He worked hard in the development of the South African trade many years before that country assumed its more recent prominence. He was for twenty years the guide and dictator of the Union Steamship Company, and ultimately brought about its amalgamation with the Castle Line. Sir Francis commenced life as a civil engineer, and he afterwards devoted himself to the business of banking for some years, and at one time he was much associated with Newfoundland trade. He was all his life a staunch Liberal, and heartily supported Mr. Gladstone. He sat for Southampton from 1888 until 1900, when he was defeated, but he soon obtained another seat at Maidstone, where, however, he was beaten at the last election. He did not speak often in the House of Commons, but he was always heard on shipping questions with attention and respect.

Mr. Balfour left Whittingehame, his place in Haddingtonshire, last week, for the season, and he is not expected to return to Scotland until the close of the session. He has been on a visit to the King and Queen at Windsor Castle, and is to address a Tory meeting at Hull on Friday, and during his stay in Yorkshire he will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Wilson at Tranby Croft. Mr. Balfour is to pay a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Percy Wyndham at Clouds, near Shaftesbury, during the Easter holidays. On Wednesday, April 3, he will open the new golf links on Lord Bath's estate, near Warminster.

A largely attended meeting of farmers and land agents was held on Friday night at Waddington, near Clitheroe, to protest against the introduction of buckhounds into the district. The meeting was private, but when it broke up the reporters, who were in waiting outside, received the following intimation:—

> The meeting decided, by twenty-eight votes to six, that the Ribblesdale Buckhounds be not allowed to hunt this district.

The farmers assert that one result of the deer-hunting will be enormous injury to lambing sheep, and that the damage altogether "could not be compensated."

ON THE NORTH-EAST WIND.

(Kingsley Brought Up-to-Date.)

How of that loved-least air
  Kingsley once could pen,
"Welcome, wild north-easter,"
  Doth surpass my ken.
And I wish the singer
  Of that biting blast
Just had faced the stinger
  Here on Wednesday last.
If he had, he'd owned, Sir,
  His encomiums wrong,
And, instead, had moaned, Sir,
  This less joyous song:

"Cuss you, wild north-easter,
  When you're on the blow
You will not find me stir
  From my fireside's glow.
Cuss you, howling rudely
  Round our streets and squares,
Nipping, oh! so shrewdly,
  With your searching airs;
Sending icy shivers
  Down each shuddering back,
Parching up our livers
  Till the whole world's black;
Hands and feet a-freezing,
  Turning faces blue,
Setting noses sneezing
  With incipient flu.;
Fierce as wolf's your bite is,
  Sharp as Sheffield knife;
Come you with bronchitis
  And pneumonia rife,
Turning strong folks dizzy,
  Laying weak folks flat,
Making sextons busy,
  Cemeteries fat;
You for man and beast are Bad—for whole and sick.
Cuss you, wild north-easter,
  Cuss you, wind of Nick!"

The following communication has recently been circulated in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, but, of course, not among "second-division clerks":—

> DEAR SIR,—I am sending you a prospectus of this club. From its proximity to all Government offices, the committee think the club may be of use to you, especially for the purpose of lunching. The club has lately removed to larger premises, newly decorated and furnished, and is now one of the cosiest clubs in the United Kingdom. I may add that this note is not issued to second division clerks.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,
> C. E. KENNEDY, Secretary.

The club referred to is an institution called the Westminster Club, and it is stated in its prospectus to be specially designed for the benefit of "members of the Church of England"—in furtherance, presumably, of which design Lord Hugh Cecil, who is nothing if not a member of the Church of England, is the president, while three bishops figure as vice-presidents. It is not clear, under these circumstances, why second-division clerks should be considered so hopelessly ineligible. It cannot be that their salaries stand in the way, seeing that one of the attractions of the club is a luncheon at the modest price of 1s. 6d. Nor, I suppose, is there anything about a second-division clerk which would interfere with the remarkable "cosiness" of the club. One can only suppose that a second-division clerk is not considered quite good enough to eat an eighteenpenny luncheon under the same roof with Lord Hugh Cecil and three bishops.

When the French Government is lauded for having inaugurated a campaign against gambling houses, it must be remembered that it is taking action only against clandestine ones, for the municipal gaming houses which flourish in most of the resorts affected by foreigners still exist in order to provide municipal funds. At such places the casino, with its gambling privileges, is let out to some speculator, and between it and the Monte Carlo establishment the only distinction is that, whereas there is no cheating at the latter, this can hardly be said of the former.

In nothing is British hypocrisy more conspicuous than in our attitude towards public gambling in foreign countries. Of late we have been demonstrating against street betting, and fining the professionals who provide opportunities for it. But, at the same time, we allow wholesale gambling on racecourses, and the odds against the principal forthcoming races are daily quoted in the newspapers, and can be obtained from professional bookmakers. A distinction is made between a street and a racecourse, although to all except the legal mind it is a distinction without a difference.

On the Stock Exchange, too, there is more gambling than at Monte Carlo. Any one can buy or sell securities at the former "for the account," and many most respectable middlemen make a living by providing the opportunity. I am not protesting against this, and I know that it would be difficult to prevent it without hampering the stock market, but, nevertheless, it is as unadulterated gambling as is the Monte Carlo Bank, with, I should say, a heavier percentage against the punter.

In many cases a security is merely a gambling counter. A promoter issues a prospectus. Then, by manipulation and other such devices, he runs up the price. If the game is successful, he manages in this way to get rid of the shares in the more or less rotten venture on the public. A, B, and C, who want to make money, buy for the account, because they notice that the shares are rising. They know absolutely nothing of the intrinsic value of the shares. If the "boom" continues, they win; if it breaks, they lose. At some time the boom is sure to break, and it is a question, therefore, of "devil take the hindmost." Just now the general public are cautious. No doubt, however, they will again be bitten by the craze for making money by "bulling" or "bearing," for there are a vast number of persons who, although not in want, live habitually above their incomes, and trust to chance coming to their aid, generally with more or less unpleasant results.

Advertisements have lately appeared under the seductive heading "Scotch Whisky," inviting all whom it may concern to send 3d. to the Glen Distillery, Limited, Campsie Glen, N.B., for a free sample of their Fine Old Pure Malt Pot Still Whisky, and a copy of their illustrated pamphlet "What is Whisky?" I have seen the advertisement in the Daily Telegraph, and its wording indicates that it has been published in other papers. I therefore call the attention of all whom it may concern to the advertisement (gratuitous) given to the Glen Distillery, Limited, in TRUTH of September 5 last under the title of "The Phantom Still and the Silent Spirit—A Mystery of a Highland Glen." The point of that article was that the illustrated pamphlet above referred to, which contains what purports to be pictures of the Glen, the Distillery, the Stills, and other paraphernalia of the Glen Distillery, Limited, is an impudent imposture faked up by a man named Reiss, who now calls himself Ross, and whose company owns no distillery in Campsie Glen or anywhere else. Among those whom this information specially concerns are the advertisement managers of the Daily Telegraph and other papers patronised by the said Reiss.

Assaults in trains with a view to plunder are increasing in frequency on the Continent. A few weeks ago, Miss Lowe was almost killed, and later a gentleman and his wife, on returning to their compartment in a corridor carriage from lunching in a restaurant car, found that their bags had been broken open and several valuable objects stolen. If I derived my livelihood from robbery, I think that I should make trains my specialty, for the field, if well worked, is a rich one, and detection comparatively difficult.

Before the days of corridor trains, it occasionally happened that some one managed to get into a carriage with a victim, and to rob him after knocking him on the head, or putting a bullet into him. There was at once an outcry for means to communicate with the guard from each compartment. But it always struck me that a desperate rascal, prepared to kill if necessary, could very easily prevent his victim from touching the knob of the communicator. Then came the corridor carriages. All possibility of an attack upon a passenger was supposed to have been rendered impossible. But is this so? A passenger can circulate through the train without attracting attention. He may see in passing a single passenger occupying a compartment, and then settle down there to attack or rob his victim at leisure. This is particularly easy on long night journeys. The corridor carriages are a vast improvement on the old separate compartments; but for safety they do not compare with the carriages in which there are no separate compartments, and these seem to me as comfortable as the former.

I am asked to mention that an amateur performance of a new play by Miss Cicely Wroughton will be given at the Comedy Theatre, in aid of Westminster Hospital, on the afternoon of February 5. Tickets may be obtained at the box office, and from the usual agencies.

I am also asked to mention that a ball in aid of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will be held at Grafton Galleries on Monday, February 11, under the patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Royal, the Duchesses of Somerset and Sutherland, and other ladies. Tickets at one guinea each can be obtained of the Hon. Mrs. Stephen Coleridge, 7, Egerton-mansions, S.W., or any other of the lady patronesses.

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.—E. AUSTIN, J.P., in a letter to the Editor of the Christian World, writes: "I desire to bear my testimony to the efficacy of the cure, having had one of my daughters under Dr. Alabone's treatment with most gratifying results. Twelve years ago she was at death's door, and now every sign of weakness and disease has left the lungs, and she is one of the bonniest girls in the North of London."—"The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh," price 2s. 6d., by E. W. Alabone, Lynton House, Highbury-quadrant, London, N.

A number of letters written by Lord Beaconsfield to his sister were sold at Sotheby's last Tuesday. Some of the papers quote a "remarkable forecast" in a letter dated February, 1833, being apparently in ignorance of the fact that it was published by Mr. Murray in 1886, in the entertaining volume entitled "Lord Beaconsfield's Correspondence with his Sister," in which it will be found on pages 15-16.

Dissatisfaction prevails in certain quarters with some of the arrangements in connection with the typewriting examinations conducted by the Society of Arts and the National Union of Teachers, and the complaints made seem to require looking into by those bodies. One of the most serious of them is that the examiner in typewriting is the headmaster of the Typewriting and Shorthand Departments at the City of London College, from which school candidates compete, so that the examiner is interested in their success, even if he is not actually examining his own pupils. The other complaints are thus stated by one of the dissentients:—

> The examination is becoming more and more a medium for advertising individual typewriter firms.
> Candidates for the advanced stages are considerably handicapped unless they are familiar with a certain Billing appliance used in conjunction with a few well-known makes of typewriters. This puts candidates, who may be equally good operators, but are unfamiliar with this particular appliance, at a considerable disadvantage.
> It is a well-known fact that with the Society of Arts' present system of sending out the "working sets," numbered consecutively, to the various centres, it is possible for the examiner to be aware of the source from which the papers come. Without alleging that he really does know, the possibility of such a thing is clearly undesirable.

All these criticisms are perfectly just if the results of the examinations are to be above suspicion; and it is a simple matter to meet all of them. The Society of Arts would do well to take example by the London Chamber of Commerce, which requires its examiners to resign if they accept teaching appointments. It has also met the point above-mentioned in regard to the numbered "working sets," and made it quite impossible for an examiner to know where particular papers come from.

Dr. Somerville, who is the first Professor of Agriculture at Oxford, delivered his inaugural lecture last week in the hall of St. John's College. Dr. Somerville, who was educated at Munich under Hartig, has taught forestry and agriculture at Edinburgh, Durham, and Cambridge, and he has been for some time past Assistant Secretary to the Board of Agriculture. The Dibthorp Chair of Agriculture is worth £700 a year, and the Professor is required to spend six months of each year in Oxford, and to deliver at least forty lectures every year on "The Scientific Principle of Agriculture and Forestry."

The Simeon Trustees have presented the Rev. W. H. Stone, who has been vicar of St. Mary's, Kilburn, for between ten and eleven years, to the rectory of Walcot, Bath, which is one of the most important benefices in their gift, and which has become vacant by the much-regretted death of Prebendary Rogers. The living of Walcot is worth about £500 a year, and the rector has to find his own house. The stipend depends to a considerable extent upon the pew rents. Directly after Mr. Stone had accepted the living of Walcot he received an offer of the valuable rectory of Tiverton from Lord Harrowby and the other trustees who are the patrons of that benefice.

Prebendary Stuart, vicar of St. Matthew's, Bayswater, has been appointed one of the Simeon Trustees, in the place of the late Prebendary Rogers. The Simeon Trustees present to upwards of 120 livings, many of them being most important parishes and benefices of considerable value.

The Bishop of Stepney is to be the Canon-in-residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during February, replacing Canon Henry Scott Holland.

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York took part in the private conference of the Bishops, which was held at the Church House, Westminster, on Thursday and Friday last. These meetings, which are regarded as strictly private, always take place a fortnight or three weeks before the meeting of Parliament. The Convocation of Canterbury is to meet at Westminster on the morning of Thursday, February 14, and it is understood that the session will terminate at one o'clock on Saturday, the 16th. The Northern Convocation meets at York on Wednesday, February 27.

Canon Wigram, who died the other day, was a great authority on campanology, and his work, "Change-ringing Disentangled," is a recognised text-book on this subject. He was rector of Hertford for twenty-one years, and resigned the living when he found that his energy was in danger of becoming impaired by advancing age. He was one of the most active, influential, and popular clergymen in the diocese of St. Albans. After his departure from Hertford he went to live at St. Albans, where he took much interest in the Abbey services, and he acted as librarian to the Chapter, and made himself useful in many ways. He will be much missed at St. Albans.

The Bishop of Limerick, who died last week, was a very able man, and he was much liked and highly esteemed by all classes and parties. Dr. Bunbury was a man of vigorous and original mind, and many of his public utterances were remarkable for their absolute independence of expression. He was always courteous and tactful, and he was distinguished for his liberal and very pleasant hospitalities. Dr. Bunbury was Dean of Limerick for twenty-seven years before he succeeded the well-known Bishop Graves in 1899, when he was elected first Bishop of Limerick under the new Church constitution, which had been brought about by the Disestablishment of 1869. He exercised an excellent moderating influence on the diocese in the seventies and eighties, when the atmosphere of clerical gatherings was always stormy. The See of Limerick is of the value of nearly £1,400 a year, with residence.

Two or three Roman Catholic correspondents write to approve of the suggestion that the appointment of churchwardens to take over financial responsibility would be of great advantage to the Church. Among them is a priest who argues that no one can have more reason to desire such an arrangement than mission priests. Every priest, he observes, is at present hampered in the performance of his spiritual duties by financial cares and anxieties; and if he happens to have any small private income of his own, he generally has to devote it all to church purposes. I am told by one correspondent that churchwardens are already to be found in some English missions—Eastbourne and Folkestone are particularly mentioned—and I suppose there is no reason why the institution should not be general.

The following letter on another question seems to have a good deal of point in it:—

The Archbishop of Westminster is making an appeal to the charitable for £100,000 to be placed at his disposal in order that the Catholic schools may meet the requirements of the local authorities. Catholics may well hesitate to entrust so much money to the Archbishop's administration until more satisfactory explanations are forthcoming respecting the loss of the Dawes Trust money, and the losses in connection with other Stock Exchange transactions. In his letter of defence he made strong declarations, but the public looks at facts, not unsupported assertions.

Let me call attention to two points that have come out in the correspondence that you have allowed to appear in your columns. First, Archbishop Bourne declared that Canon St. John had been the means of obtaining for Southwark diocese "at least three times" the amount lost in the Bishop bankruptcy—that is to say, at least three times £55,000. What has been done with this sum of at least £165,000? Secondly, the £10,000 collected for the new church at Westminster was to accumulate until it reached £15,000; but the money was in hand some eighteen years ago, and a simple sum in arithmetic will show that the £10,000 should have grown by this time into much more than £15,000. Is the church built? If not, why not? The plain truth, Sir, is, that as regards Archbishop Bourne and his "revered friend" at Portsmouth, English Catholics neither understand nor approve their methods of dealing with either money or men.

One of the most extraordinary exhibitions of human folly that I have ever come across is furnished by the "endless prayer," which has more than once been mentioned in TRUTH. This prayer, which is only a conventional supplication in three sentences, is designed to be transcribed nine times by each person it reaches, and passed on to nine other people, like a snowball begging letter. Those who comply will be "delivered from any calamity," while those who put it in the waste-paper basket are to be grievously afflicted. Moved apparently by this intimation, innumerable idiots are busily transcribing and circulating the prayer. I have seen references to it lately in several provincial papers, and copies of it have reached me from all parts of the country. My impression is that the thing is simply a hoax started by some practical joker, for the prayer purports to have been delivered from Heaven at Jerusalem to a certain American bishop, who has disclaimed all knowledge of the alleged revelation. But whether it originated in jest or earnest, it can only be perpetuated in folly.

I have to acknowledge £1 from "Ginger" towards the Toy Fund and £1 towards a poor children's dinner fund. Mrs. Caroline C. Bland sends me £1 towards the Toy Fund and £1 for the poor couple referred to in my article entitled "The Prison Cure for Poverty."

The new scheme, which was issued the other day, for the Advisory Board of the Army Medical Department seems to be generally approved by those immediately concerned, but the observation generally made upon it is that everything depends upon whether the Board is to be limited in spirit as well as in letter to purely advisory functions. In its original shape the Board incurred much criticism and hostility by its officious and meddlesome interference in administrative matters. It went about inspecting hospitals, even down to the minutest details of domestic management; and it is understood to have exercised a paramount influence in questions of promotion, and so on. An Advisory Board, recruited outside the Service, may possibly be of use in a time of transition and reorganisation, but as a permanent institution it is likely to do as much harm as good; and it is difficult to see why it is more required in connection with the administration of the Medical Department than any other branch of the Army.

A letter which appeared the other day in the Army and Navy Gazette drew attention to the number of officers who have been passed over for promotion under the régime of the late Advisory Board, including many whose records indicate that they have shown themselves good and efficient men. This is a matter on which a good deal has been said in recent issues of TRUTH. Many officers who have suffered in this way have left the Service, but many others remain; and the suggestion made in the Army and Navy Gazette was that their cases should now be reconsidered. There seems to be good ground for this request. Promotion to all ranks having a fixed establishment is now removed altogether from the Advisory Board, and is to be dealt with in future by a board consisting of the Director-General and the Surgeons-General serving in the United Kingdom. It would be more satisfactory to the public, as well as to the officers concerned, if this Board were to review some of the decisions of its predecessors in the case of officers still serving, but serving under a stigma, which there is good reason to believe to be undeserved.

A curious circular letter, signed by a Mr. Wm. Ruston, is being sent to the parents of Army cadets who have passed out of Sandhurst warning them in effect against tailor-made swords. Mr. Ruston declares that unless a guarantee stating that the sword is of English manufacture is demanded there is a probability that a German weapon, worth about a pound, will be supplied, while the price charged will be that of a proved British blade. From inquiries I have made there seems to be some grounds for Mr. Ruston's warning. Practically the sword-making industry in this country is in the hands of two firms, Wilkinson's, of London, and Mole's, of Birmingham, and undoubtedly a large number of swords are supplied to young officers which have never been forged in the workshops of either of these firms, and which are not much more than pieces of soft iron, and would be quite useless except for decorative purposes. The moral would seem to be that the man of trousers is not the best source from which to purchase a sword any more than the sword-maker is the tradesman who might be expected to supply a well-fitting uniform.

From information received I gather that there is considerable dissatisfaction among the army nursing sisters at Colchester with regard to the style in which the catering is done. The nurses are allowed 13s. per week for messing, but they have no control over the way in which the money is spent, this business being entirely in the hands of the matron, subject to an audit of accounts once a year by the matron-in-chief. There is no reason why the messing should not be done satisfactorily for 13s. a week; and the best means of securing that end would seem to be to place it under the supervision of a committee such as exists in connection with every other Service mess.

In reference to what was said in TRUTH a fortnight ago as to the block in promotion in the non-commissioned ranks of the R.E., a correspondent in that corps points out that the Submarine Mining branch was not disbanded, but was converted into the Fortress and Coast Defence Electric Lighting companies, the establishment being but slightly affected by the change; and he attributes the block in promotion entirely to the companies being reduced to their peace establishment after the South African war. He also states that the thirteen N.C.O.s referred to as having been promoted to quartermaster sergeant in the Submarine Mining branch were the seniors on the roll qualified for promotion, that they had all from fifteen to eighteen years' service as N.C.O.s, that they were all promoted to fill vacancies, and did not become supernumerary to the establishment. I take it that my previous correspondent was misinformed in regard to these promotions, and that the explanation above given of the reason for the present congestion is probably the correct one.

It was given out shortly before Christmas that the Channel Fleet was not to be given Christmas leave because the fleet was to go abroad for three months in order that the Atlantic Fleet might come home for Christmas, and that it would return to refit at Devonport in March. But an order has since been given excepting H.M.S. Russell from this arrangement and directing that she shall proceed to Gibraltar for her annual refit on completion of the Lagos manœuvres. Why the Russell is thus specially treated is not evident; but it is particularly unfair on the crew of the ship, as a great many of her officers and men are serving in her as a home ship, on the strength of having previously served a foreign commission. As it is, by the time they return to England, on completion of refit at Gibraltar, they will have served abroad for nine out of the fifteen months of the present commission. It would interest those concerned to know whether it is intended that the Russell shall return to Devonport to give leave on completion of her refit, and whether her officers and crew will receive, when she pays off, the foreign service leave that has accrued during her commission.

Reverting to the recent lifeboat inquiry at Walmer, a correspondent suggests that any uncertainty in connection with launches would be avoided if telephonic or telegraphic communication were established between the Goodwin lightships and the shore. I believe that this suggestion has been made before, but it is worth repeating for the joint consideration of the authorities of Trinity House and the National Lifeboat Institution. Signalling for assistance by gun-fire and flares seems to be a decidedly out-of-date method, and with a telephone or telegraph the lifeboat coxswains could be informed not only of the nature and extent of the disaster, but of the precise direction in which they should proceed.

All the ward-room officers of H.M.S. ——, 1st Cruiser Squadron, were lately favoured—in common, no doubt, with the officers of other ships—with a polite and obliging intimation from "Mr. Harris," 6, Old Cavendish-street, London, that he "will be pleased to receive applications for loans in sums of fifty pounds to ten thousand pounds, which he is prepared to advance upon note of hand alone." The following answer was forwarded to "Mr. Harris":—

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your kind favour, received on the 20th inst., in which you generously offer to advance £10,000 (ten thousand pounds) to each and all the officers of this renowned cruiser, we have to request that you will forward by return of post the amounts required, as stated below. Owing to a bad week at the recent Gibraltar Races the money must be forwarded without delay. Kindly charter treasure ship for this purpose. Notes of hand will be sent on receipt of the bullion. Thanking you in anticipation, we have the honour to subscribe ouselves,

Yours gratefully,

[Here appeared the names of eight officers, with the following list of the sums required:—£9,989. £9,999 0s. 9d., £9,909 19s. 9d., £9,701 6s. 3¾d., £10,000, £9,000, £9,999 19s. 9d., £2,074 17s. 4d.]

P.S.—We note that you do not lend money to minors. There are two midshipmen in this ship for whom we would ask your indulgence. The sums they require are but trifling—viz., 14s. 9d. and 7s. 1d., the amounts of their washing bills. Surely you will stretch the point in their favour?

Many naval officers will be particularly interested to hear that "Mr. Harris" is really one Phineas Henry Emanuel, trading under this alias in partnership with Henry Michaelson. Emanuel was formerly manager of a now defunct firm of jewellers at Portsmouth, which became notorious on account of the blood-sucking business which it surreptitiously carried on among young officers in the Navy.

At my suggestion, a correspondent the other day addressed a complaint to the Postmaster-General respecting the delivery through the post of a circular from Germany advertising a manifestly obscene book. In reply, the Postmaster-General has written to say that the circular (which was in an open envelope) would not have been delivered if its character had been observed, and that instructions have been given for a watch to be kept in case any similar circulars are received. I can assure Mr. Sydney Buxton that such circulars and catalogues, either offensive in themselves or open to objection as advertisements of indecent and mischievous publications, are continually passing through the post in wrappers or open envelopes. Quite recently, for instance, there has been a recrudescence of the activity in this direction of a filthy wretch named Arthur, of Paris. Such circulars and catalogues are usually posted in considerable quantities, so that their detection ought to be an easy matter. But I am afraid that the officials of the Post Office are accustomed to think more of the protection of the revenue than of the cause of public morality in checking the contents of packets sent at the cheaper rates of postage. They are unceasingly on the look-out for any breach of the halfpenny post regulations, which, however technical or trivial, will warrant them in making a surcharge. It is quite clear that nothing like the same vigilance is displayed in stopping circulars and publications of a vicious and obscene character, but I hope that the Postmaster-General's instructions will now result in the cessation of this scandal.

By the way, I have received from correspondents in all parts of the country a considerable number of lottery circulars emanating from a firm at Bremen, which were posted in London on January 21. The circulars were in sealed envelopes, but the "paid" with which they were stamped shows that they must have been posted in bulk, and I cannot but think that if there were a little more keenness on the part of the Post Office this illegal use of the post could be prevented. Not only is the distribution of these foreign lottery circulars illegal, but they are open to the further objection that the lotteries for which tickets are offered are conducted under conditions which make them a delusion and a snare.

Apropos of a paragraph which appeared last week, I have had two letters from old residents of Calcutta protesting against the criticism of the municipality on account of the existence on the Maidan and elsewhere in the city of a number of "tanks" which are neither fenced in nor lighted. Both demur to the description of the so-called "tanks" on the Maidan as "cess-pools," the fact being that they are what in England would be called ponds or ornamental waters, uncontaminated by drains, and stocked with fish. Perhaps cess-pools was too strong a word, but the gentleman whose complaint I noticed as to the filthy condition of the water spoke from the personal experience of an accidental immersion in one of the "tanks." My present correspondents are at variance as to the desirability of railing in these pieces of water, but anyhow, it seems that the Calcutta municipality has no sort of responsibility in reference to the Maidan, which is under the control of the Government of India. With regard to other parts of the city, I am assured that for years past the municipal authorities have been working hard for the filling in of dangerous or insanitary "tanks," but as most of them are on private property the task is a difficult one.

The new cab-fare regulations look very complicated. After studying them carefully, I am not at all sure that I understand them, and I doubt if the general public will ever do so. In that case, the regulations are radically bad, for the first essential of a code of this kind is that everybody who uses a cab should be able to see at a glance how much there is to pay. The taximeter will, no doubt, be a good thing for the public and for the cab trade. The same may be said of the sixpenny minimum fare, which is to be compulsory for taximeter cabs and optional for others; but half the advantage of these innovations is lost when they are made the occasion for introducing a variety of different conditions and fares. In addition to this, a separate scale of charges is introduced for motor cabs. I confess I do not see the reason for it. If a motor cab is to be compelled to take a passenger a mile for 8d., why should a horsed cab be entitled to charge 6d. for half a mile?

It is a pity that this opportunity was not taken of getting rid of one of the greatest causes of complication and anomalies in cab fares—namely, the four-mile radius. This limit was originally introduced, I suppose, quite half a century ago, as a rough measure of the London area which was closely built over. But it has long ceased to have any relation to existing facts. A six-mile radius to-day would scarcely be the equivalent of the four-mile radius fifty years ago. The result of it all is that a three-mile cab drive in one part of London may cost you twice as much as a three-mile drive in another. There ought to be one scale covering the whole area in which cabs are in general use, with some reasonable limit to the distance which a driver may be compelled to go. The only obstacle to this is the stupidity of the cab trade itself, and the Home Office should give it an opportunity of becoming wiser. The development of the motor 'buses and "tubes" must tend to reduce the use of cabs in the central parts of London and to limit it more and more to short journeys in all parts. Low fares for short distances, and especially in the suburban districts, are, therefore, the only means by which the cabs can hold their own against the competition they are now feeling.

A MONKEY AND A BROTHER.

FROM THE MONKEY'S POINT OF VIEW.

(Picked up at the South-Western Police-court.)

The Honourable John de Grey,
A Daniel wise and good,
Struck a strong blow the other day
For injured monkeyhood.

For when a fathead "copper" ran
Me in upon the charge
That on the footpath, like a man,
I'd mooched about, at large,

"Bosh, fellow! Can't endorse your views,"
This Daniel made reply.
"The path he's every right to use—
As much as you or I."

That judgment's very sound and sage,
As all must sure agree,
Who 've studied in their Darwin's page
Our common pedigree,

Which shows we come, both man and I
(So said my champion staunch),
Not merely of one family,
But I'm the elder branch.

Lord Guthrie, the new Scotch Judge, took his seat in the Court of Session last week as successor of Lord Kyllachy. He is a son of Dr. Thomas Guthrie, the celebrated Presbyterian preacher. Lord Guthrie is a very able lawyer, and for many years he has enjoyed a large and varied practice at the Bar. He has been engaged in a great number of important arbitrations, and for many years was legal adviser to the Free Church of Scotland. Lord Guthrie has always been an advanced Liberal in politics, but in 1900 Lord Dunedin (then the Tory Lord Advocate) gracefully recognised his high legal reputation by appointing him to the Sheriffdom of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland. He has done the heavy work of this important post with conspicuous ability and success, and has been generally regarded by competent critics as an admirable Sheriff. His promotion to the Bench has met with general and hearty approval, and in the Edinburgh Parliament House he is expected to make a very strong Judge.

The late Lord Field was a man of very acute mind, and a sound, if not a great, lawyer. That he never got beyond the position of a puisne judge before his retirement from the Bench was due, I imagine, entirely to the physical infirmity which hampered him so much during the last few years of his judicial career. Both at the Bar and on the Bench his opinions and judgments were always regarded with the utmost respect; but during his later years on the Bench he grew terribly deaf, and, probably from this cause, very irritable. Being always a man of rather blunt speech, he became somewhat unpopular with the Bar in consequence, and at the last some of the proceedings in his court were rather painful to witness. This was the more melancholy because his intellect remained as clear and keen as ever, as was shown by the part which he took in the legal business of the House of Lords after he received a peerage. I should think that he was really a man of very kindly disposition, for though I never met him in private life, I have more than once heard him apologise very frankly before the end of a case for little ebullitions which had marred the harmony of the proceedings.

In the course of the discussion that has been going on with regard to the county magistracy, defenders of the existing Tory monopoly have pointed to the number of J.P.s already on the Bench as a reason against any fresh appointments being made by the Lord Chancellor. There are many districts, however, in which a great proportion of the J.P.s are mere dead-heads. An example of this is furnished by the Knutsford Guardian, which states that in the local petty sessional division eleven out of the nineteen magistrates never attend the court or perform any of the other duties of their office. Some of the minority are business men, who are generally away from home during the daytime, so that their services are not available for the holding of occasional courts, the signing of summonses, and other duties. In such circumstances as these it is manifestly absurd that the nominal strength of the Bench should be allowed to stand in the way of additions being made to it.

I am glad to see that the Court of Appeal has reversed the judgment of Mr. Justice Neville in the case of Henry Leetham and Sons (Limited) and others v. Johnstone White, which was commented upon in TRUTH on December 12. Defendant was employed as traveller by a company of corn factors and millers. This company was allied with five other companies in different parts of the country, and by his agreement the defendant became nominally the servant of all six and was bound not to enter the service of any firm in the same line of business in Great Britain and Ireland for a period of five years after the termination of his employment by the plaintiffs. The action was brought to enforce this agreement, the defendant having left the service of the plaintiffs and accepted a situation with another firm. Mr. Justice Neville came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction, but in granting it he severely criticised the state of the law which made no such agreement invalid, "however oppressive and however fatal it may be to the possibility of the employee earning his own living in his own country."

The Court of Appeal found that the law was not so unreasonable as Mr. Justice Neville had supposed. "A trader," said Lord Justice Farwell, "was entitled to protect the particular business in which the servant was employed by an agreement of this kind, but not other businesses in which the servant was not employed, although the trader had an interest in those other businesses. It was against public policy to allow a covenant in gross in restraint of trade." The appeal was therefore allowed. In this case the contract was held to be bad because the restriction went beyond the area embraced in the business of the particular company by whom the defendant was actually employed. The decision does not, however, seem to touch the question whether a contract restraining a man from accepting a similar situation anywhere in the United Kingdom would be binding or not if the business of the employer really extended over the whole country.

In consequence of a recent observation in TRUTH on the numerous "legal aid societies" that have lately sprung into existence, I had an inquiry the other day respecting the National Legal Aid Society, of 1, Great James-street, Bedford-row. The inquiry arose out of a correspondence between this concern and a woman in the country who was desirous of obtaining a divorce from her husband. On the woman's statement of facts the secretary informed her that he was "of opinion" that she would be successful if her statement was correct; and that the cost of proceedings, if conducted by the society's solicitors, would be about £20. In a subsequent letter he went so far as to say that he "had no doubt" that she would be successful. On the facts as given to me, I should myself be "of opinion"—though I am neither a lawyer nor a legal aid society—that the woman's prospect of success would be more than doubtful. On the strength of their confident opinion in her favour, however, the society went on to recommend the woman to "speculate £5" in "having the case investigated by one of our officials;" and this £5 speculation seems to me to be the whole point of the correspondence.

A representative whom I sent to interview the National Legal Aid Society on this case found on the door of No. 1, Great James-street, the name of the society followed by that of "S. Seccombe, Manager," and also by that of "Joseph Sykes, Solicitor." There was also the name of the "Old-Age Pension and Relief Society, S. Seccombe, secretary." My representative found that Mr. Seccombe was not in, but he learned enough to enable him to identify that gentleman; and he was also informed that Mr. Joseph Sykes was the solicitor to the Legal Aid Society. The name of Seccombe may be within the recollection of some of my readers. A few years ago he came under notice repeatedly in these columns in connection with certain more or less bogus volunteer fire brigades, which existed, so far as they existed at all, for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions from ignorant and foolish people who do not understand that they pay in rates all that is necessary for the services of an efficient fire brigade.

This volunteer fire brigade business, at one time a very thriving industry, was knocked on the head by the numerous warnings issued by the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, as well as in TRUTH and other papers. The Old-Age Pension and Relief Society which Seccombe still appears to represent is another questionable concern of much the same character. Seccombe's connection with the National Legal Aid Society is, therefore, sufficient in itself to enable the reader to judge how far this national institution is a genuine association, and how far it is merely a touting agency for a solicitor. It was a solicitor who brought under my notice the above attempt to induce a poor woman to "speculate £5" in a divorce case, which he himself, being fully cognisant of the facts, advised her to be hopeless; and I repeat that the proceedings of these legal aid societies call for the notice of the Incorporated Law Society.

An exceedingly lenient sentence was passed by the magistrates at the Sheffield Police-court last week on an old man who for nine years had been secretary of a Lodge of Oddfellows, and in that capacity had appropriated over £300 of the Lodge's funds. The magistrates only fined him £1, and made an order for the restitution of the money, or in default fourteen days' imprisonment. I would much rather see magistrates err on the side of leniency than otherwise, and in this case the extent of the defalcations was undoubtedly due to the imperfect supervision exercised by the auditors, who never once during the period in question asked to see the bank pass-book to verify the balance which was shown in the Lodge's statements of account. The whole unhappy business should prove an object-lesson to friendly societies, and if it leads to the appointment of qualified auditors it will serve a useful purpose. It should not be difficult for friendly societies to obtain qualified accountants to audit the accounts for a nominal fee, and the adoption of such a course would prevent a great deal of the embezzlement of such funds which goes on at present.

Amongst the aberrations of the Great Unpaid chronicled in my Legal Pillory this week is a case where a man is convicted under the Vagrancy Act for sleeping out with two bottles of beer and 3d. in his possession. I may point out to the Newport magistrates responsible for this conviction that many learned stipendiaries have held that the smallest sum of money found in possession of a man charged with this offence is sufficient evidence of means of subsistence, and that the conviction is therefore illegal. The action of the Romsey magistrates, both on the Borough and the County Bench, in letting a brute who systematically ill-treats his donkey off with a light fine is also worthy of special remark. One would have expected to find some indication of fellow-feeling with the unfortunate animal on the part of the magistrates who sat in judgment on its torturer.

Nottingham Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. E. Jardine and J. H. Hayward. Arthur Nicholls, charged with assaulting his wife. He came home drunk and brutally knocked her about and kicked her. Fined 20s.

Nottingham Summons-court. Before Messrs. J. K. Wright and T. Shipstone. E. Crotts, charged with cruelty to a dog by throwing it over some railings and breaking its leg. Fined 20s.

Tiverton County Sessions. Samuel Britton, charged with cruelty to a horse by travelling it in an unfit condition. It had an injured shoulder, and was in such a shocking condition that it could not walk. Fined 7s. 6d.

Romsey County Bench. Before the Right Hon. E. Ashley, Major S. Chichester, and Messrs. F. C. Vaudrey, Barker, Mill, and H. L. Hansard. William Amey, charged with cruelty to a donkey on December 22. He was prodding it with a nail fixed at the end of a stick, and a part of the animal's body was a mass of scabs and punctures. Fined 5s. and costs.

Romsey Borough Bench. Before the Mayor, Aldermen E. M. Meddings and W. B. George, and Messrs. A. M. Elcombe, J. Coleclough, and H. Guard. William Amey, charged with cruelty to a donkey on the 12th inst. He was prodding the donkey and beating it continuously. The Bench said it was a very bad case. Fined 10s. and costs.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Leslie. Patrick M'Farlane, charged with assaulting Barbara Fyfe and Mary Jane Lowson. He butted one woman in the face with his head, knocked her down and kicked her, and assaulted the other by throwing her to the ground and dragging her about by the hair. Fined 30s.

Henley Borough Bench. Before Messrs. C. Clements, E. Chamberlain, W. Simpkins, C. Simmons, and G. W. Turner. William Jones, charged with assaulting an old man over 80 years of age by striking him on the head. Fined £1 and costs.

Nottingham Borough Police-court. Before Alderman A. Pyatt and Dr. T. J. Dobell. Bernard Masey, charged with stealing brass, the property of the Corporation. Three months' imprisonment.

Nottingham County Police-court. Before Messrs. G. Fellows, H. Heath, and Colonel Story. William Lester, charged with game trespass. One month, in default of paying a fine of 40s.

Blackpool Police-court. John Thompson, charged with stealing a jug, value 6d. One month's hard labour.

Moreton Petty Sessions. G. Stoneman, charged with stealing a bag of coal. One month's hard labour.

Swainsthorpe Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. H. Gurney, E. Knight, P. Green, R. H. Denny, and Sir M. Boileau. F. Garman and James Culling, charged with night poaching. The men were seen with a gun in their possession a few minutes after the hour after sunset. Fourteen days' imprisonment and bound over for twelve months.

Bearsted Police-court. Robert Miles and Frederick Cornwall, charged with trespassing on land in pursuit of game. Miles stooped and took a rabbit out of a trap while in a wood, and Cornwall had a rabbit in his pocket. Miles fined 40s. and costs, and Cornwall 20s. and costs.

Edinburgh Police-court. Before Sheriff Orphoot. W. Connelly, charged with passing himself off as a detective. He told thrilling experiences of his work as a detective to two girls whose acquaintance he made. Fined £5, or thirty days' imprisonment, with £5 caution, or a further thirty days.

Chelmsford Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Wood and other magistrates. T. Humphreys and A. Creek, charged with stealing some odds and ends of furniture value 3s. Three weeks' hard labour each.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

Frome Petty Sessions. Before the Rev. W. A. Duckworth and other magistrates. E. J. Sheppard, charged with working a mare in an unfit state, and W. J. Hozier, charged with causing her to be worked. The animal was aged, in very poor condition, and dead lame in both front feet from chronic bone disease. Sheppard fined 10s. and costs, Hozier £3 and costs.

Ashbourne Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. G. M. Bond, Rev. E. Morris, Peveril Turnbull, C. W. Lyon, F. Wright, and T. J. Barnes. Leonard Bosley and Georgina Bosley, charged with neglecting their children. The man went to Birmingham, and the woman refusing to go with him he sent no money for their support. The house was found to be filthy and the children in a disgraceful condition. Each fined 10s. and costs.

Worcester County Petty Sessions. Before Mr. F. J. A. Wood and other magistrates. George Cull and Harry Powis, charged with stealing two pheasants and a wild duck, the property of Lord Hindlip. The birds were hidden after a shoot and were ultimately found in their baskets. Lord Hindlip did not press the charge, and nothing was known against the men. Fined £2 10s. 9d. each.

Newark County Police-court. Before Alderman B. T. Pratt and Mr. J. C. Kew. J. H. Cooke and T. Whitehead, charged with stealing a quantity of lead and zinc, valued at 6s. Cooke three months' hard labour, and Whitehead one month's hard labour.

Ipswich Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. Burton, Anness, Churchman, Moss, Alexander, Gibb, and Bennett. Albert Clowe, charged with absconding from the workhouse with certain clothes, the property of the guardians. Two months' imprisonment.

Newport Police-court. James Clarke, charged with sleeping in a shed. He was in possession of two bottles of beer and 3d. Fined 40s. and a month's imprisonment.

A short time ago I quoted a report from a Canadian newspaper of a case at Toronto in which the police magistrate, Colonel Denison, committed a Crimean pensioner, 77 years of age, to prison for four months for vagrancy. It was stated that the old fellow himself desired that he should be sent to gaol during the winter, but it was suggested that it was scandalous that he should be reduced to taking this course as his only alternative to his death from cold and starvation. I have now received from Toronto some information regarding this veteran, including his police court record. It seems that he has been before the magistrates many times for vagrancy and drunkenness, and probably his pension, when he draws it, is largely spent in drink. There is, I am told, a "house of industry" (otherwise a workhouse) which he could enter, but he prefers to be in gaol, and on this occasion it was not at all ironically that he thanked Colonel Denison for sending him there. It is only fair to the magistrate that this should be explained, though for any erroneous impression that may have arisen it is not TRUTH, but the Toronto newspaper which reported the case, that is to blame.

I do not know whether a fraud order is in force against a "Professor" Harris Edison, of Binghampton, New York, but if not I would respectfully suggest to the U.S.A. postal officials that they should promulgate one against him. The "Professor" is one of the astrological charlatans. At first he offers to erect a complete horoscope and give a reading from it for 8s. If the offer is not accepted, he expresses his willingness to supply the horoscope for half-price, and later on, if this bait is not swallowed, rather than destroy all the work entailed in "erecting" the horoscope, he is willing to forward it for half-a-crown. The whole bag of tricks is apparently expressly designed for diddling servant girls of their half-crowns.

Some interesting remarks on THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH by Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., are found on page 300.

I am continually receiving inquiries regarding the begging appeals issued by Mrs. Henville, of Braughing, near Ware, Herts, who is about the most prolific of begging-letter writers now in the profession, and quite worthy of being classed amongst the most undeserving. For years I found it necessary to warn the public against her late husband, who, while rector of Chipping Warden, was notorious in the profession which his wife has carried on since his death. Residing in the same house with this woman are a son and two grown-up daughters, a boy of nine (the child of one of the daughters), a broken-down doctor named Hodgson, and a man named Dedman. None of this interesting household appears to be engaged in any remunerative occupation outside the writing of begging letters, but between them they manage to consume a considerable quantity of alcoholic liquor. There are frequent disturbances in the house, and the women appear occasionally with black eyes. It is a pity that the police do not do something to break up this band of dissolute loafers who are obviously living on charity bestowed by kind-hearted but stupid people.

A TANTALUS ON SKATES.

I'm a skater—or I was—
I correct myself because
At least a dozen tedious years have fled
Since, on rapid, twinkling skates,
I have cut my threes and eights,
And my eagles of the type entitled "spread."

True, frosts we've had since then,
Which have frozen lake and fen,
And given promise high of glacial fun,
But by the time I've found
My skates, and had them ground,
The thaw, as sure as Doomsday, has begun.

'Twas so last week; the ice
Was just a-bearing nice;
My skates one night I cleaned up with a zest;
Rose at dawn next day from bed;
Frost gone! And lo! instead,
A mild and muggy drizzle from the west.

Still my way through life I grope,
Hoping ever against hope
That, somewhere in the distant by-and-by,
We a frost may really get
Of sufficient length to let Me air those skates once more before I die.

Recently a number of patients in the diphtheria wards of the isolation hospital at Reigate have been attacked with scarlet fever. It is not at all an unknown thing for patients suffering from one disease to contract another in institutions of this description, but according to information that I have received from a reliable quarter, there has been some flagrantly bad management at the hospital at Reigate, and among other things it is alleged that two dogs belonging to the matron have been allowed to run about all over the place, playing, perhaps, first with children in the scarlet fever wards, and then with those in the diphtheria wards. The Town Council are said to be doing their best to hush the matter up, but this ought not to be permitted, and if some of the parents whose children have suffered from the laxity prevailing in the hospital were to communicate with the Local Government Board, I have no doubt that Mr. John Burns would send down a medical inspector to inquire into the scandal.

In a general way it is not desirable that electioneering quarrels should be threshed out in the Law Courts; but there are exceptions to this, and the action which has been commenced by the members of the Highways Committee of the L.C.C. against the Standard is one of them. On the merits of that case I would not at any time express an opinion, and less than ever with the leading case of Mr. John Burns before my eyes. But it is quite certain that the election campaign of the so-called "Moderates" is being conducted in many directions with illegitimate weapons, and that statements are being circulated broadcast which exceed even the limits which are permissible in the heat of electioneering. Apart from any question as to the merits of the Progressive policy, it has always seemed to me that the chief claim of the County Council to the confidence of London has been the cleanness of its administration; and when the honour and integrity of individual members are called in question, they are quite right to defend themselves vigorously.

Speaking with the profoundest respect to the High Court and his Majesty's Judges, individually and collectively, yet not knowing while I say it but what I may be brought up to-morrow for contempt of court myself, I am heartily glad that the application of the Standard against Mr. Burns was dismissed by the Court, without even calling upon that gentleman to show cause why he should not be committed. I do not say this because I have private prepossessions in favour of Mr. Burns's politics; nor even because, as a fervent admirer of the British Constitution, I feel aghast at such a serio-comic possibility as the sending of one of his Majesty's Ministers to one of his Majesty's Prisons by one (or two) of his Majesty's Judges. I say it because I am a journalist. The law of contempt of court is a snare and a pitfall to journalists, and I cannot understand how any newspaper proprietor can consent to use the weapon against anybody else, least of all in a case where the alleged contempt is doubtful and trivial. The success of the Standard in this case would have brought new terrors to the press, and its failure should be a matter of rejoicing to the press.

There is special cause for rejoicing over the admirable judicial dicta which the application drew from Mr. Justice Phillimore:—

> I am glad to take this opportunity of repeating what I have said before, and what I wish to say every time these applications are made, that is that the world has gone mad on contempt of court, and that the exercise of this jurisdiction should not be extended, but diminished.

I am glad I was not present, for I could not have helped my "hear, hear!" and I know that would have been a gross contempt.

There has always been a curious difference of tone and spirit between the Moderates on the County Council and the rabid partisans who are supposed to be fighting their battle in the press. The difference was conspicuous last week in the observations of the Moderate leaders on the Standard case, when Sir Melvill Beachcroft dissociated himself from defamatory imputations on his opponents, and rather went out of his way to emphasise the loyalty of himself and his party to the Council. The truth is that, though there have been some sharp differences on questions of policy, and feeling has sometimes grown hot, in a general way Moderates and Progressives have worked together for the good of their constituents far more harmoniously than is the general rule on municipal councils. Consequently, they take a common pride in their handiwork. For rabid abuse of the Council, the imputation of unworthy motives to the majority, and ignorant and malicious misrepresentation of its work, one must chiefly look outside Spring Gardens; and it originates almost exclusively with private interests which the L.C.C. has fought for the benefit of the public, or with the political organisations which have incessantly sought to capture the Council and invariably failed. The Unionist press in London has played a most disreputable part in this respect, and has done nothing but harm to the Moderates on the Council, as the more intelligent of them must pretty well know by this time.

The attack in the present campaign is being directed chiefly against the finance of the L.C.C., apparently because the average elector understands little about municipal finance, and the grossest misrepresentations can therefore be offered for his consumption with impunity. A gentleman who poses as a statistician has actually put his name to the statement that the L.C.C. is responsible for the entire debt of London, including the whole stock of the Water Board, and the debts of all the other municipal authorities. This is the sort of thing that is being done on every side, partly in ignorance, but more often with deliberate malice. The Council has published an elaborate statistical table of its tramway finance, showing, among other things, the capital invested and the earnings upon it. On this point the Times comments as follows:—

> The tramways undertaking, says the report, is entered in the balance-sheet as an asset at the amount of £4,720,000 odd. The Council's valuer, however, reported that the valuation of the undertaking as a going concern on the same date would have been seven and a half millions sterling. It remains, therefore, a question whether the capital cost has not been kept down by undervaluing the tramways as well as by failing to charge them with their proper share of the cost of improvements.

No such question can possibly remain. The Times gives a précis of report in another column, showing clearly that the £4,720,000 is capital expenditure. Only a financial ignoramus could suppose that the "capital cost has been kept down" because a valuation of the business "as a going concern" is higher than the net capital that has been invested in it. Yet this instructor of the public has the effrontery to add, "How materially this might affect the estimated net profit hardly needs to be pointed out." We are to understand, apparently, that it is a recognised principle of finance to calculate the dividends of a business, not upon the capital, but upon a valuation of the business as a going concern. We shall be told next in a Times leading article that the dividends of a railway company ought to be declared on the market price of its stock and not upon its actual capital, and that directors who declare a dividend of so much per cent. when their stock stands at 30 or 40 per cent. premium are "undervaluing" the railway in order to mislead the shareholders as to the profits.

Mr. Birrell is certainly an unselfish as well as a bold man. He has not exactly occupied a bed of roses during the last twelve months—at any rate, the thorns have been more in evidence than the blossoms; yet he exchanges it for one of the most thorny couches that a Minister can occupy, especially with important Irish legislation in sight. I suppose he was sick of the Education difficulty, and not disposed to try his hand at another solution of it, and the Prime Minister will naturally be glad to have a man in charge of Irish affairs who has won golden opinions from all parties by his tact and his unfailing good humour under exasperating circumstances. But it denotes a good deal of self-sacrifice on the part of a newly fledged Minister to tackle two of the most difficult legislative problems in successive sessions, and it would not be surprising if Mr. Birrell's appointment as Chief Secretary should involve the postponement of Irish affairs until he has had time to look round him a little in his new office.

Mr. Birrell's appointment to the Chief Secretaryship is popular in Ireland, where geniality and humour are always appreciated, even in high officials. Circumstances might possibly arise to make a pleasant man do an unpleasant thing, but then if he has "a way with him" it does much to save the situation. And if his lines happen to lie in pleasant places, they are very pleasant.

Mr. McKenna has earned his promotion to the Cabinet by steady, hard work ever since he has been in Parliament, and useful service to his party in debate. He is a remarkably clear-headed man, with a great power of getting up his subjects, and he is the sort of man to handle the education question with a good deal less tenderness than Mr. Birrell. What the future may have in store in the shape of Education Bills, Heaven only knows, but it is conceivable that the clerical party may be lamenting one of these days that whereas Mr. Birrell chastised them with whips, Mr. McKenna does the business with scorpions.

THE TOUCHY SHE-BEAR.

An old She Bear, whose Mind was set
On Zoologic Etiquette,
Returning to the Den, one Day,
Where her young Cublings helpless lay,
Observed a Leopard in the Brake,
Hard by, about his Spring to make.
Quick, with maternal Zeal imbued,
She hastened up, to save her Brood;
Nor she alone, but, as 'twould hap,
A Bison-Bull, a friendly Chap,
Those Cublings' peril who'd espied,
Came hurrying from the other Side,
Eager to help her drive away
The baffled Robber from his Prey.
Now, Bear, you'd think, had straight made Speed
To thank him for his friendly Deed.
But no! She asked, with haughty Stare,
By whose Permission he was there,
Intruding in her own pet Lair,
And hoped, in Future, he'd be kind
Enough his own Affairs to mind.
At these ungracious Words, the Bison,
Astonished, fixed Dame Bear his Eyes on:
"Wa-al, Ma'am," said he, "I guess you air
A most tarnation touchy Bear,
Whose Etiquette's fastidious Sense
In a Pal's Impulse finds Offence,
Because, too keen on Friendship's Task,
He didn't wait your Leave to ask."

"KHAKI" IN GERMANY.

HISTORY seems to be repeating itself over the German elections, which bear a curious resemblance to our "Khaki Election" of six years ago. When the edict of dissolution was so suddenly sprung on the old Reichstag a good many people, both in Germany and in this country, thought that the Kaiser and his Chancellor had taken a false step and would have cause to regret it. But Prince Bülow evidently knew his public better. Whether or not it was the result of conscious imitation, he followed exactly the electioneering tactics of Mr. Chamberlain. The "Imperial" issue was pushed to the front and kept there; and if the electors were not told that every vote for the Centre or the Left was a vote for a particular foreign enemy, it was drilled into them that no man could vote for an opponent of the Government and remain true to the Fatherland. To what extent these tactics have succeeded cannot be judged till the second ballots have been taken; but it is already certain that the Government has the upper hand, and that no repetition of such an incident as led to the dissolution is likely to happen in the new Reichstag.

It is bewildering to see the unsympathetic attitude of the English journalists who have worshipped most devoutly at the Chamberlain shrine towards Prince Bülow and his Imperial master. One might have supposed that their hearts would have gone out to a sovereign and his Minister, summoning all patriots to support them in fighting to a finish a sort of war in South Africa. But that any foreign Government should take up such an attitude in its own country appears to be an offence in the eyes of British Jingoes, and full of sinister import to ourselves, so much so that they would actually have welcomed a great Socialist triumph in Germany. This has been declared so plainly that I should think the London press has made some little contribution to the victory of the German Government. It is always a fatal error for the press of one country to proclaim its sympathies with one side or another in the domestic quarrels of a neighbour. Foreign sympathy is always injurious to the side it favours. Nothing did more to prejudice Dreyfus in the eyes of his countrymen than the officious agitation on his behalf in England.

Personally, I do not attach much importance, so far as concerns ourselves, to the constitution of the Reichstag, and none at all to a Government electoral victory obtained under the circumstances of the present one. The Reichstag is composed of a series of groups, bearing no resemblance to anything in our own Parliament. It can exercise little influence on the foreign policy of the Government, except by the extreme measure of rejecting a vote in supply, as was done last month. The various groups are actuated by such a diversity of cross-currents, that their combination for such a purpose can only occur under very exceptional circumstances. An astute Chancellor—such as Prince Bülow and all his predecessors have been—can generally negotiate a bargain with them in detail whenever such a contingency is on the cards. In short, "divide et impera" is the Imperial motto for dealing with Parliaments, and the idiosyncrasies of the German temperament, and the diversity of interests in a federation of States like the German Empire, make the application of the rule easy. The defeat of the Government which led to the dissolution resulted from a temporary coalition of the two principal Opposition groups, the Catholic Centre and the Socialists. Of these, the Socialists were the only one which can be regarded, from the Government point of view, as a solid irreconcilable Opposition, as we understand the term. They are not to be "squared" by any terms which an Imperial Chancellor can offer. The Catholics do not seem to have suffered at the polls, but the Socialists have been hit hard. It looks, therefore, for the moment as if the democratic movement, which was the great feature of the last election, had been damped down by the "khaki" appeal to national sentiment, as it has been before now nearer home.

But such movements, though they may be checked, are not destroyed by such influences. Germany has domestic problems pressing for settlement which are bound to force themselves to the front in course of time. And the rest of the world may take it for granted that the democratic undercurrent in Germany sets steadily in favour of international peace and away from aggressive aspirations against neighbouring States, as it does in other countries, whatever direction the ripples on the surface may take under the influence of passing breezes.

On the other hand, it is equally certain that Germans of all parties are united by strong patriotic sentiments, and a legitimate desire for the growth of their national interests beyond the seas. The more they grow as an industrial or commercial people, the more will their aspirations grow in that direction. Whether the Kaiser keeps the Reichstag under his thumb, or whether the democratic party gets the upper hand, this tendency will equally have to be accepted by the rest of the world. That being so, the question for us is whether we are going, in the spirit of the dog in the manger, to resent the natural and legitimate growth of Germany on the sea and beyond it as a menace to ourselves, or whether we shall lay aside all unworthy jealousy and reconcile ourselves to it as we have reconciled ourselves, notwithstanding a good deal of ignoble jealousy, to the growth of the United States. There is a party among us which would deny to Germany the rights of every independent nation, and interpret every measure taken in accordance with those rights as evidence of malevolent designs against our own independence or our own possessions. There is a corresponding party in Germany which equally, but with far more reason, represents Great Britain as actuated by fierce jealousy of German growth and prosperity, and ready to take the first opportunity of striking a deadly blow at her before she is too strong to defend herself. These two parties mutually aid one another in a policy of incendiarism. If either of them gets the upper hand, a terrible calamity to both nations is bound to follow. It therefore behoves well-disposed and level-headed citizens of both countries to jump on the mischief-makers at every opportunity, and resist them constantly, as they resist the Devil and all his works.

MIND, MATTER, AND "MIDDIES."

Just after remarking last week that what the public needs in regard to naval affairs is criticism founded on knowledge and common sense, I picked up a volume which seems to do something towards supplying that want. It is a reprint by Messrs. Blackwood and Sons of a number of articles that have appeared in Blackwood's Magazine and other publications with the signature "Barfleur," collected under the title of "Naval Policy." From the nature of the case, a book compiled in this way makes no attempt to treat its subject on a systematic plan; but the articles are knit together by a firm grasp of one or two fundamental principles, which are worked out in every chapter in a way that any intelligent land-lubber can understand. And as these principles are quite lost sight of in much of the amateurish naval criticism with which the man in the street is mystified, I recommend the study of the book as a useful exercise in "clear thinking" on the most important of national questions.

I gather that what "Barfleur" chiefly seeks to inculcate is that all recent British naval policy is vitiated by undue exaltation of matter at the expense of mind, of the material element in naval warfare at the expense of the human. This is no new idea to me, and I hope not to my readers. "Battles are lost and won by men, and not by ships" is the axiom prefixed to the analysis of the Battle of Tsushima in "Naval Policy." The same thing was said in Truth in almost the same words when the news of Togo's victory reached England, and the bearing of it on the official naval policy of the last twenty years was pointed out to the best of my humble ability. If this doctrine is sound—as all naval history seems to teach—the basis on which our present fleet has been built up—namely, the comparison on paper of our material with that of foreign powers—is essentially fallacious, and hundreds of millions of money have been spent in pursuit of a false ideal. And the climax of folly is seen at the present moment, when all other considerations are subordinated to the possession (regardless of cost) of one or more marine monsters, the latest triumphs of naval architecture, which look, but still only on paper, superior to any similar machine possessed by a possible enemy. It might have been supposed that Admiral Togo blew all such notions into space in company with the Russian navy, which had long helped to fix our sham scientific standards of naval strength. But stupidity is not so easily vanquished as a Russian admiral.

When, however, naval policy is looked at by the light of naval history from about B.C. 480 to A.D. 1905, the most important question that arises does not relate to the expenditure we have incurred in a mere competition in material, though that is a serious matter enough, but to the training of the men with whom primarily rests the winning of battles. This is a matter on which the general public are necessarily in the dark. We have seen revolutionary changes in the training of officers in the last few years, we listen helplessly to learned arguments about specialisation, the position of the engineering branch, the new conditions introduced by the disappearance of masts and sails, and so forth, and we hope that the people who understand these things know best, and may be trusted to arrive at safe conclusions. But no one can read "Barfleur" on "Naval Policy" without acquiring serious misgivings on this point. The foundation of his argument is that a ship of war is essentially the same machine whether it is propelled by oars, or sails, or steam engines. Starting from this basis, he argues that the training requisite for the effective handling of the machine is essentially the same to-day as it was in the days when Keppel went to sea at ten years old, and Rodney, Hawke, and Nelson, at twelve; that is to say, that sea training is still the only sound education for the sea, and practical performance of duty the only trustworthy test of merit and efficiency. On that view you are flying in the face of nature and experience when you substitute for sea training education in schools on shore and "doing papers" in examination rooms. Surely this view must be sound. It is accepted in every kind of practical business. The captain of a Cunarder or a White Star liner—the nearest analogy for naval purposes—does not receive his professional education in a school on shore, nor rise to his position by doing examination papers. The man who drives a Scotch express does not learn to do it in a technical school, nor is he even required to "pass" in an engineer's shop. It is the same in every walk of life. You learn cricket in the cricket field, billiards in the billiard room, golf on the golf course. You learn none of them from books—or if you do you never become a "crack"—and the younger you begin the better you learn. I believe that the Americans have attempted to teach rowing on dry land, in accordance with the most scientific theories, but somehow they have not managed to beat a Cambridge eight which learns by merely practising on the water.

Remembering all this, I am not surprised that Nelson, going to sea at twelve, turned out as good an officer as other youths who went first for a couple of years to the Portsmouth Academy. Nor do I doubt that any Nelson put on board a man-o'-war to-day at the same age, and left to learn for himself the whole business of working the ship by seeing it done and helping to do it, would know his business better at five-and-twenty than a prize pupil who had in the meantime been flooring all the examiners at all the naval colleges, classes, and schools of instruction. On the one hand you have the lesson from all analogy and experience that the art of handling a machine, however complicated, or even playing a game, is best learnt by practice, not by theoretical teaching. On the other, you have the historical fact that the little "middies" of the eighteenth century, chucked on board ship at ten or twelve years old, as a puppy is chucked into the water, and left to sink or swim by intuition, observation, and practice, with a minimum of formal teaching, grew into the finest race of naval officers the world has ever seen. These things are worth thinking about, especially by First Lords of the Admiralty and Members of Parliament, who nominally control such matters, but are too apt to accept without question the latest dogmas of experts, instead of enlarging the narrowness of professional views by means of common sense and common knowledge. Let us remember, in conclusion, that these considerations bring us straight to the all-important question of £ s. d. The countless millions by which our naval bills have been swollen in recent years have been expended on material, not on men, on the accidental rather than the essential element of success in war. Nor is it even certain that such money as we spend on education and training has been spent in the right way, while it is certain that of all methods of teaching boys, that of making them learn for themselves is the cheapest. We are chiefly engaged to-day not in turning out Nelsons but turning out Dreadnoughts. What did the training of Nelson cost the country? Practically nothing. What does a single Dreadnought cost? The best part of two millions sterling. Which is likely to be worth most "when the guns begin to shoot"?

THE LAST EDALJI PUZZLE.

The anonymous letter-writing which has played such an extraordinary part in the Edalji case has broken out again. For the moment it has added a fresh puzzle to the case, but it has possibly supplied clues which may assist towards the ultimate solution of the mystery. Those who are interested in the case are probably aware of the circumstances to which I refer. On Monday, January 14, Mr. George Edalji, who is at present residing in London, received a letter dated from "III., Park-street, Walsall," signed "Martin Molton," and bearing the Birmingham postmark of the previous evening. The writer stated that he could prove who maimed the pony on August 18, 1903, and requested Mr. Edalji to go on the following Wednesday evening to the G.P.O. and ask for "a letter for me which will be sent by a friend and contain important proofs." This letter was written, I quote from the Daily Telegraph, "on the back and front of a sealed envelope, enclosed in another envelope." In this feature it resembles two of the anonymous letters addressed to Great Wyrley Vicarage in 1893. A communication of a similar nature was also addressed to the Home Office; but it seems that no letter addressed to "Martin Molton" ever reached the G.P.O. On January 22 Mr. Edalji received a second letter from the same correspondent, unsigned, and bearing no address, but also posted in Birmingham. In this letter the writer states that he is the author of the letters of 1893, and that this can be seen from the fact that he always uses the Greek "e," that Mr. Edalji is entirely innocent of the crimes ascribed to him, and that the writer is extremely sorry for the trouble he has caused the family, and is now leaving for Melbourne. A facsimile of the first of these two letters, and the covering envelope, appeared in the Daily Telegraph on Wednesday last. I may say at once that the handwriting undoubtedly presents marked points of resemblance to that of previous letters written during the last fourteen years, including some of those used in evidence against Mr. Edalji at his trial. The letter appears, therefore, to bear directly upon the problems surrounding the case.

It will be remembered that Great Wyrley Vicarage and the Edalji family have been involved in three distinct epidemics of anonymous letter-writing. The first occurred towards the end of 1888, when letters were addressed to the Rev. S. Edalji and a servant girl at the Vicarage, accompanied also by writing on the walls of the house. In connection with this the servant girl referred to, Elizabeth Foster, was prosecuted, and, her solicitor having pleaded that it was only a foolish joke, was discharged on her own recognisances. She continued to live in the neighbourhood until her death in 1905, and was seen among the witnesses in waiting when Mr. George Edalji was brought before the magistrates in 1903, though she was never called by the prosecution. After her prosecution there was no more anonymous letter-writing until 1892, when a fresh epidemic broke out, and was continued at intervals until 1896. During this period the letters were mostly addressed to the Vicar, as before, and often written in the style of a raving lunatic, containing the wildest abuse of the Vicar and his family, and particularly his son George, and being seasoned with most appalling blasphemy. Letters, apparently from the same hand, were also written during this period to various other people, some of them strangers at a distance, who were subjected to annoying hoaxes in which the Vicar of Great Wyrley and his family were involved. Annoying advertisements, at the expense of the Edalji family, were also inserted in the local newspapers, one of them in the form of an apology by George Edalji to the aforesaid Elizabeth Foster, and there was one particularly atrocious letter addressed to a servant girl at the vicarage, just as in 1888. This sort of thing went on until the beginning of 1896. So far as the Edalji family were concerned there was no repetition of it until the cattle-maiming outrages of 1903 had been for some time in progress. Anonymous letters in various handwritings and from various addresses then began to be addressed to the police and other people in the neighbourhood, including Mr. George Edalji himself. In some of these, as the public already knows, the writer pointed to Mr. George Edalji as connected with the cattle-maiming outrages, and this appears to have been the sole evidence which the police had at the time when they proceeded to arrest that gentleman, as the preliminary to compiling their case against him. Mr. Gurrin, the expert who was called for the Crown, was of opinion that certain of these 1903 letters, but not all of them, were in the disguised handwriting of the prisoner; but why Mr. George Edalji, if guilty, should have written letters to the police tending to incriminate himself, and even have addressed a scurrilous libel to himself on a postcard at his own office, no one to this day has ever been able to satisfactorily explain.

Of the 1888 writing no specimens are now in existence. Of that which occurred between 1892 and 1896 a few specimens have been preserved. I am familiar with two of them, one a letter addressed to the Rev. S. Edalji, and another, the letter referred to above, which was addressed to a girl in his service—a letter of an unspeakably filthy description, which it is difficult to believe that any person in his right mind could have penned. These two letters are to all appearance in the same handwriting. As regards the letters of 1903 which were used at the trial, by one of those strange oversights which no doubt contributed to Mr. Edalji's conviction, they were never critically inspected prior to the trial on behalf of the defence, and applications to inspect them subsequently to the conviction were refused by the Home Office. But as soon as Mr. Edalji was released, and I had an opportunity of discussing the case with him, I suggested to him that he should make an application for permission to inspect and to copy these letters. This request having been granted, Mr. Edalji asked that as a matter of convenience he should be allowed to have the letters photographed, and this also was allowed. I accordingly arranged with Mr. Edalji that he should attend with a photographer at Stafford, where the letters were, and select a certain number to be photographed. He did so, and the photographs are now in my possession. It will be seen from this exactly what materials are in existence for the purpose of comparison with the documents reproduced by the Daily Telegraph last Wednesday. They are: (1) A letter addressed to the Rev. S. Edalji somewhere about 1893; (2) a letter addressed to one of his servants in 1895; (3) photographs of various letters used in evidence at the trial in 1903, some of them identified by Mr. Gurrin as being in the disguised handwriting of George Edalji, some of them not imputed to him by that gentleman.

I make no claim myself to be an expert in handwriting. But, according to my experience, there is no mystery about that craft. The expert only differs from the ordinary observer in having devoted more attention to the subject, making his observations by a more systematic method, and being by experience quicker in detecting peculiarities of style which may assist in identifying or differentiating the authorship of two documents which at first sight appear to be written by different hands. The first result of my own observation of these letters is, as I have said above, that the "Martin Molton" letter presents striking resemblances to the two extant letters of 1893 and 1895. There are, of course, many differences, but as it must be presumed that the writer was in both cases disguising his natural hand, these do not count for much. It is the reappearance of striking peculiarities of style, notwithstanding the general attempt at disguise, which supplies the connecting link in such cases. If a person who wrote such letters in a disguised hand in 1893 repeats even one or two marked peculiarities when doing the same thing in 1907, the weight of the evidence is greatly increased.

Secondly, I think there are points of resemblance, though less strongly marked, between the incriminating letters which led to Mr. Edalji's conviction in 1903 and the last-mentioned documents, i.e., the letters of 1893-5 and the "Martin Molton" letter. There is, therefore, on this evidence reason to suspect that the same hand has been at work all through these fourteen years. I quite admit that there also exist in the case of the 1903 letters certain features of resemblance to the writing of George Edalji which Mr. Gurrin pointed out to the jury at the trial. I have never questioned Mr. Gurrin's ability in his own line of business, all that I have said, and say now, on this point is that evidence founded on the observations of an expert in handwriting is very far from conclusive. It must be remembered, too, in justice to Mr. Gurrin, that he did not in the Edalji case, and I believe does not in his general practice, profess to swear to the identity of two handwritings submitted to him. What he does, and what he did in the Edalji case, was to point out certain evidence of identity, and to give the opinion that on this evidence the two writings are from the same hand; but it is for the jury to examine the evidence by the light which the expert throws upon it, and to agree or disagree with his opinion. The ground on which I should chiefly disregard the effect of Mr. Gurrin's evidence, and those resemblances in the formation of particular letters which he pointed out, is that the documents were admittedly in a disguised hand, and that the peculiarities are perfectly consistent with the writing being that of a person who was imitating the prisoner's writing for the purpose of incriminating him. This argument might not have counted for much at the trial, when nothing was mentioned of previous anonymous writing in connection with the Edalji family; but it acquires the greatest weight and importance if it can be shown that for fourteen years somebody, who can scarcely have been George Edalji, has been writing anonymous letters to and about the Edalji family, incidentally avowing a sort of insane hatred against George Edalji, and more than once threatening to disgrace and ruin him. I may point out here that the writer of all these letters, whoever he may be, is somebody intimately connected with the circumstances and movements of the Edalji family, and there is therefore nothing improbable in supposing him to be acquainted with their writing; in fact, in 1903 the writer—as though with a deliberate attempt to fasten the authorship upon George Edalji—contrived to enclose with one of his letters an envelope addressed to that gentleman at his office and bearing the imprint of another firm in Birmingham. It is almost impossible to suppose Mr. Edalji himself doing this, unless he was deliberately endeavouring to put the rope round his own neck. It has all the appearance of being the work of an enemy seeking to incriminate him.

Now, with these facts and considerations before us, what are we to think when the anonymous letter-writer of 1893 and 1895 reappears to-day, not only avowing himself to be the same person, but betraying some of his previous peculiarities of penmanship? Of course, those who have made up their minds that Mr. George Edalji is guilty will argue that he might have written the Daily Telegraph letter himself. In that case he either went down to Birmingham for the purpose of posting it on the night of Sunday, January 13, or he employed a confederate in that town to post it, and he must have done one or the other thing again on January 21. To go to Birmingham himself is a proceeding too risky to be credible, for Mr. Edalji is a man of marked personal appearance, whose portraits have been widely circulated in the press during the past few weeks, and he could hardly go twice from London to Birmingham and back at the present moment without being noticed and identified by somebody. The alternative suggestion, that he might have employed a confederate to post the two letters to him in Birmingham, at the present juncture seems to me equally incredible. In order, however, to preclude doubt as far as possible, I have asked Mr. Edalji whether he can prove that he did not visit Birmingham on these dates, and he says that he can. It must be remembered that he is a convict on ticket-of-leave, with the eyes of the police always upon him, and he may not even leave his lodgings for a night without notifying the police. Unless we are to assume that Mr. Edalji wrote these two letters himself, there is certainly very strong reason for suspecting that the anonymous letters which led to his conviction are the work of some individual who has been pursuing him and his family off and on for fourteen years, and who has been at large in Birmingham during the last three weeks. There is therefore a new argument in the "Martin Molton" letters for an exhaustive official inquiry into the whole of this case in all its ramifications. Many people have been hoping that before this time Mr. Gladstone would have announced that such an inquiry has been ordered. I have not entertained much hope of that result myself; but I entertain no doubt that if the case is properly brought before the House of Commons when it meets, the House will insist that this step shall be taken.

A CASE FOR THE PUBLIC PROSECUTOR.

Nearly two years ago, in an article headed as above, I drew attention to the impudent manner in which the penal sections of the Moneylenders Act with regard to registration were being set at defiance by a shady tout styling himself "Lofthouse and Co.," 119, Victoria-street, S.W. Particulars were given of a disgraceful case of attempted commission-snatching on the part of this rascal, and, inasmuch as he was not registered in accordance with the requirements of the Act, I suggested that he ought to be prosecuted. The Act, I may explain, applies not only to persons whose business is that of moneylending, but to those who advertise or hold themselves out in any way as carrying on that business—in other words, the definition embraces the usurers' jackals as well as the actual usurers. The circulars and advertisements issued by "Lofthouse and Co." clearly come (and still come) within the words of the statute. My article furthermore indicated that "Lofthouse and Co." was a nom de guerre of the notorious Crichton Loftus Tottenham, and that he had also been carrying on another similar business as "John C. Lubbock," first at 2, Haymarket, and subsequently at 19, Hanover-square. In August, 1901, Tottenham had been registered (describing himself as a "gentleman," of 15, York-place, W.) as "Matthew Lubbock," 2, Haymarket, but this registration had run out, and he was not registered at all as "John C. Lubbock." At the time I wrote he was, therefore, committing two specific offences against the Act for which he was liable to heavy penalties.

These matters are recalled now because, as I discovered from an inspection of the register at Somerset House last week, Tottenham's case still constitutes a peculiarly flagrant example of the negligence of the authorities in regard to the enforcement of the Act. In the character of "Lofthouse and Co." he continues to publish his moneylending advertisements, though he remains unregistered. As to his second alias of "John C. Lubbock," the register reveals some interesting and rather amusing facts. On April 11, 1905, three days after the appearance of the above-mentioned article in TRUTH, Tottenham (now calling himself a "moneylender," not a "gentleman") was registered afresh as "Matthew Lubbock," 19, Hanover-square. In the part of the form in which he had to state his "actual name" he gave it as "Abraham Crichton Loftus Tottenham." The officials at Somerset House noticed that in effecting the first "Lubbock" registration in 1901 he had not owned up to the Abraham, subscribing himself simply "Crichton Loftus Tottenham." This led to an inquiry, and in reply Tottenham wrote that the two names referred to the same person and that the omission of the Abraham on the first occasion was due to "a misunderstanding of the terms of the Act." Six months after this incident (October 8, 1905) Emily Bannester, described as a spinster of no occupation, was registered in the place of A. C. L. Tottenham as the person using the trade name of "Matthew Lubbock." Her residence and her place of business were both given as 10c, Portman Mansions, W.

Presumably this was a dodge on the part of Tottenham to put off the scent any one who should suspect that he was connected with "Lubbock." No doubt he thought—quite erroneously—that persons consulting the register at Somerset House would be shown only this new form on which Emily Bannester figured as "Matthew Lubbock." But Mr. Tottenham—as might be surmised from the little mistake about his own name and signature—is a very careless gentleman. Emily Bannester's registration form is filled up in Tottenham's handwriting—or at least in the same handwriting as Tottenham's own registration forms—and it shows that at first he very stupidly gave her place of residence and business too as "119, Victoria-street"—his own office as "Lofthouse and Co."—but then struck out that address and substituted 10c, Portman Mansions. Not only did he fill up the form but, judging from the handwriting, it looks very much as if he also wrote the signature of "Emily Bannester." On September 12, 1906, a new registration of Emily Bannester as "Matthew Lubbock" was effected in consequence of a change of address to 213, Piccadilly. From being a lady of no occupation she had by this time blossomed out into an "artist"—an artist, possibly, in drawing commissions and fees from the pockets of unsophisticated applicants for loans. This latest registration form, like the others, was filled up by Tottenham, but Emily's signature this time was entirely different from what it had been previously, and apparently she had changed the spelling of her name from "Bannester" to "Bannister." From the foregoing facts it is evident that the registration by Emily Bannister—if, indeed, there is such a person at all—is a mere blind, the business being Tottenham's. In spite of the registration, this business is, moreover, carried on illegally, for the name used in the advertisements appearing in the Daily Telegraph and other papers is "John C. Lubbock," whilst the name registered—the only one that can be legally employed—is "Matthew Lubbock." If the Moneylenders Act were properly enforced, "John C. Lubbock" would have long since been prosecuted for trading "otherwise than in his registered name," and "Lofthouse and Co." for trading without being registered at all.

Nor are these by any means the only cases in which the law is being similarly violated. "Ralph Vivian," 80, Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square, whose moneylending advertisement adorns the columns of the Morning Post, and "L. Hignett," whose circulars are dated sometimes from 56, Cicada-road, Wandsworth Common, and sometimes from 1, Carlton-street, Waterloo-place, are both of them unregistered; and, if necessary, I could give the names of other offenders. Why they are permitted to break the law in this way is incomprehensible. It is true that the Act does not saddle anybody in particular with the duty of seeing that its penal sections are enforced, but surely this is a duty which in the ordinary course of things devolves upon the police or the Public Prosecutor. On two or three occasions they have, indeed, recognised this by instituting prosecutions—a fact which only makes it all the more extraordinary that they should fail to take action against Tottenham and his fellow-culprits. The compulsory registration of moneylenders was introduced as one of the checks upon the system of trickery and fraud described in the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Moneylending. In itself it is not, perhaps, a particularly powerful check, but it has some uses, and anyhow it seems to me to be a public scandal that such harpies as Tottenham and Co. should be allowed to snap their fingers at the provisions of the Act. When Parliament meets I hope that the Home Secretary will be asked to explain why they are left unprosecuted and unpunished.

THE THEATRES.

Apollo.

The Apollo Theatre has for a season renounced the gorgeous trappings of musical comedy and donned the severe simplicity of the spoken word. I spent an agreeable evening there last week, and propose to say a word on the three-act drama by Mr. John Valentine which is the pièce de résistance.

"The Stronger Sex" savours much of our Transatlantic cousins, and yet has an English, or rather a Hibernian, cousin itself, in Mr. Shaw's "Man and Superman." Both plays are inspired by the domination of that petticoat which is a tendency of the times in America, and not unknown to our suffragettes. Yes, the world has moved since William Shakespeare penned "The Taming of the Shrew," and I have little doubt that were the latter play produced in England now for the first time it would be heartily damned by the press and public opinion.

Penniless the Hon. Warren Barrington marries an American heiress, Mary, for her money, in the most cynical manner possible. He goes the length of kissing, or trying to kiss, the fair Joan, with whom he has flirted for years. The moment which he selects for this operation is certainly not well-chosen, as it coincides with the appearance at the door of his new-made bride, who sees her husband's movement. She gives a low cry, shrinks back, and so successfully conceals her knowledge of what has passed, that it is not revealed to him until the end of the play. Miss Nina Boucicault, as the delicate-looking heiress with the will of steel, played the part of this female Petruchio with considerable cleverness and much conviction. Mr. Leonard Boyne, the very masculine Katherine, executed the difficult feat of making a dominant personality shrink very small with great skill, and he deserves to be congratulated upon his success in this scarcely congenial part. He begins Bombastes, rapidly adds the Furioso (not allowed his pet horse to ride), breaks the dams (spelling immaterial) and the gilded furniture when he is offered twelve hundred pounds a year pocket-money, but bows in obedience to the almighty dollar when his money-lender creditors appear with a demand for five thousand pounds. Mr. Valentine is doubtless right in his psychology of the young American woman, who is more than their match at business for the two money-lenders, and drives them away with a threat of punishment for blackmail; but I never saw or heard of an English girl who would have been capable of conducting Mary's dialogue with the money-lenders, to which her shrewish spouse harkens, much abashed. But America has its female stockbrokers. One more flash in the pan of a toy revolver, and Penniless the Hon. Warren Barrington's say is said. He tries to bully his wife into obedience, and makes as though to strike her. Out comes her revolver, and exit the lady, triumphant. The rest of the play, as regards this couple, is devoted to telling how Penniless the Hon. is put into business by Mary the Magnificent, who at first pays his salary herself, unknown to him. But Penniless the Hon. is such a good and such a clever boy that very soon he is able to earn for himself quite a nice little salary. Thus has Mary the Magnificent succeeded in transforming her aristocratic husband into an excellent clerk with a chance of partnership. But she is severe, and although he is by this time almost a reformed character, almost a perfect clerk, yet she will not come for a nice ride with her good, obedient husband. For she is always thinking of that kiss of the first act, though more than a year has elapsed.

The beautiful Joan (formerly beloved of Penniless the Hon.) is coy, and so dumfounders, abashes, and completely sits upon Mr. Paul Arthur, who loves her devotedly, and represents an outspoken American of great wealth, cousin to Mary the Magnificent, that their engagement requires the direct interposition of Miss Marie Illington, autocratic aunt of Joan, inheritress of her great fortune. Once Mr. Paul Arthur, the blushing millionaire, has consented (though it seems so sudden), all goes well. The aunt, who says the rudest things imaginable all through the play, roars like a sucking dove at the reconciliation between Mary and her spouse and the engagement of Joan and the millionaire. All is well, Mary is no longer jealous, and, having made her husband into a good clerk, is content to love, govern, and sway him to the end of the chapter. She will even allow him to consult with her upon the weightiest of all subjects—the investment of her moneys.

Overtures should certainly be made for a performance of this beautiful morality play at Yildiz Kiosk, Constantinople, for the benefit of the Grand Turk, and Mr. Valentine should see to it that the inhabitants of Salt Lake City, Utah, are not long deprived of his valuable gospel. "Matinées for Mormons" would be a good advertisement outside the theatre.

French Plays at the New Royalty.

M. Gaston Meyer is again the tenant for a season of the New Royalty Theatre, and all who love the drama cannot but be glad to welcome the visits of our admirable neighbours, which, one hopes, will gradually assume the force of habit, so that mighty London, which has room for everything and everybody of any interest, will never be without her swallow flights of French players across the Channel. They were bold swallows who came over as the cast of "Le Marquis de Priola," which I witnessed on the icy Wednesday of last week. M. Le Bargy was, of course, the attraction, and despite the weather the house was filled with a very distinguished audience.

The story of the Marquis de Priola, which is played by M. Le Bargy with the mastery that comes of talent and practice and a perfect acquaintance with the author's intentions, is in one word the story of a Parisian Don Juan of to-day. M. Henri Lavedan, the dramatist, is a member of the French Academy and a precise student of life. His studies have often led him into the byways affected by a plutocracy dragging an effete aristocracy after it, as a comet its tail. M. Lavedan is, in my opinion, the greatest living writer of dialogue in French. I do not for a moment claim for him the position of premier dramatist, but to read Gyp or Brada in French, or certain English writers who shall be nameless, after Lavedan, is like drinking a pint of rose sherbet after a pint of champagne. The character of the Marquis de Priola, and indeed the whole of the play, are best studied as M. Lavedan studied them: objectively. If one apply any moral or intellectual code to such conduct as his, to a life devoted to the seduction of women alone and to their humiliation, he at once appears so contemptible that we lose interest in him. But if, on the other hand, one direct one's attention chiefly to the brilliant incisiveness of the dialogue, which cuts like a razor, and look upon the Marquis de Priola as more than half a madman, then one can enjoy a very pleasant evening in his company, just as one can agreeably contemplate in painting the masterly treatment by Teniers of "Drunken Boors," or the debauchees of Peter Paul Rubens.

It is a curious thing that both of the Spanish Don Juans were diseased in mind, if not in body, that neither of them persisted to the end in his evil courses but took the cowl, and here in this modern French Don Juan, we have paralysis intervening as the avenger of his evil deeds. It looks, certainly, as though the type of Don Juan were always pathological in one way or the other.

In conclusion I may say of the French plays that the programme, which constantly changes during the next few weeks, is filled with the titles of familiar plays that have not the danger for the uninitiated presented by the flamboyant Marquis de Priola.

At the Savoy Theatre Mrs. D'Oyly Carte continues to carry out her intention of presenting the series of comic operas produced by Mr. W. S. Gilbert and the late Sir Arthur Sullivan.

"The Gondoliers" now holds the boards, and I was struck with the vernal vigour, and the fresh sparkling quality of its music, which seems to well from the composer as from a mossy sunlit rock. A happy Savoyard audience contemplated the decorous octogenarian Duke of Plaza-Toro which, in the hands of Mr. Workman, assumes a living quality, is as it were given a real soul, mean and ridiculous perhaps, but yet a soul, with which it is the privilege of that fine actor to endow whatever part he chooses to play. The remainder of the cast does not call for especial mention, one's attention being chiefly attracted by the carefully-prepared impromptus with which Mr. W. S. Gilbert has studded this, one of his very best, librettos.

"The Playhouse" was opened for a private view last week, and I had the advantage of accompanying Mr. Maude around the stalls of his new house, which, as all the world knows, occupies the site of the Avenue Theatre at the Charing Cross end of Northumberland-avenue. I can endorse from personal experience the extreme comfort of the stalls, which are spacious and placed at a considerable distance from those in front, allowing an easy gangway. The dress circle is also comfortably seated, and I believe that there is relatively as good accommodation all over the house. This apparently inconsiderable detail is really of more importance than a gold mine expended upon gilded hand-rails and gilded wood. Where a man or woman is uncomfortable each will do one of two things: fidget or go out. Here there is no such excuse. For the rest, the house presents an airy appearance, and yet is not over-decorated, as becomes a house devoted to serious comedy. The dark material of the stalls and dress circle is relieved by the cream and gold decorations of the walls, in which are set at intervals on the dress-circle level oil paintings representing English and Italian comedy. I liked the quality of the orange-coloured light diffused from the surrounding globes and from the electrolier which hangs from the centre of the cupola. The Royal box, with its staircase of teak and its Louis XV. retiring room, with the box facing it and two small boxes behind the dress circle, are the only boxes in the theatre. My readers who care to visualise the interior of the Imperial Theatre will get, mutatis mutandis, an idea of the Playhouse, which will be open to all when these lines are in print. It now remains only to wish Mr. Cyril Maude all success in his new house, a wish which found eloquent expression on Monday evening, which witnessed a special progrgamme by many stars and a special prologue by Mr. Shaw.

* * * * *

At the Empire Theatre, Mr. Hymack has a long and animated conversation with a pump. His (simulated) condition implies that he would be the better for a dousing under its watery replies. Strange things happen—parti-coloured gloves come on to his hand, all unaware; they are rejected; others of a different colour take their place; the figure chalked on the pump becomes rude; more garments are rejected, while others take their place, mysteriously. Finally, the pump goes away in high dudgeon, and we turn to Mr. Hymack, to find him habited in a smart frock coat, descended from heaven, since it had no other visible source. Fox-hunting, of which I have spoken before in laudatory terms, follows this item, with one or two happy variations from the original that I formerly witnessed. The Austria Quartette has much more than a quarter of a voice apiece. It was more like a regiment singing in tune, and they are doubtless clever artists. The big number of the new programme is the Living Pictures and Statuary. Of these, the statuary is, in my view, the more satisfactory. "The Teucer" of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, R.A., lived in the bronzed Mr. M. Antonio, and the "Athlete Struggling with a Python," by Lord Leighton, found a fine expression by the same artist in poses. It is a study in the manner of the Laocoon. The pictures rather suggest to me those witticisms of Mr. James Whistler that used to startle, but have now almost the sound of old saws. "Nature is coming up slowly," "A feeble sunset," and many other apparent paradoxes seemed to become almost commonplaces as I watched group succeed group, representing some well-known picture. The intention is excellent, and such poses as "A Venetian Wooing," and "The Bath of Psyche," have a certain alluring prettiness about them, while the Huguenot of Millais stirs romantic memories of the picture. But the fact is that the artist shows us a deal more of the mysteries of colour, light, and shade in his pictures, makes things much more intense than they are in real life, however well arranged, and that is why I went away without sorrow to see some remarkable photographs at 67A, New Bond-street. Baron de Meyer and Mr. Coburn here exhibit some of the most wonderful art photographs I have ever seen, and I advise my readers interested in art or in photography to visit the exhibition. They will thank me when they have seen those remarkable portraits of the former and the wonderful landscapes of the latter.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

A VET. ON DOCTORS.

FROM my own knowledge of veterinary surgeons I agree with the opinion Pasteur expressed in their favour: "I very much enjoy the company and conversation of veterinary surgeons, and I have learnt a great deal from them." Their standard of medical attainments is, at any rate in France, a high one, and they enjoy this advantage over the doctor, that their practice, instead of being confined to one animal—the human being—extends to all domestic species. Their scientific status is so well recognised in France that a medical doctor never takes a fee from a "vet." My own doctor holds the "sister profession" in such high esteem that when a member of his own family is ill, he sends for the "vet.," and the latter calls for a doctor if he thinks circumstances require it.

A man from whom I have learnt more about materia medica than from anybody else is a veterinary surgeon, who stands, it is true, at the top of his profession—M. Paul Cagny. He is the author of the Encyclopédie Vétérinaire, a work which has been translated into several languages. I met M. Cagny this week, when he greeted me in a somewhat startling fashion:—

"I say, is not it a catastrophe?"

"Yes, indeed, cher maître. You mean, of course, Jamaica?"

"No, I do not. I mean the collapse of tuberculine."

"Yes. You have not heard about last Thursday's sitting of the Société des Vétérinaires de France? There was an awful fuss. It was all about 'tuberculine.' Seven or eight years ago, the late Professor Nocard, who was a vet., and also a member of the Academy of Medicine, laid down the doctrine that consumption in cattle could be detected even in its earliest stages by an injection of tuberculine. The method was an infallible one. The statement made a sensation throughout the world, as meat and milk of diseased oxen and cows were supposed to be two of the chief causes of consumption in human beings. The Governments of this and other countries went to huge expense in setting up laboratories for the cultivation of tuberculine. Well, last Thursday a French vet. in the service of the Argentine Government, M. Lignières, Director of the Laboratory of Buenos Ayres, rose to make a communication. He had made systematic tests with tuberculine for the last four or five years, and found that sometimes healthy cattle reacted, while in other cases animals which were afterwards shown to be consumptive felt no effects after an injection. Two of the leading veterinary surgeons of France, Professor Moussu, of the School of Alfort, and Professor Arloing, Director of the School of Lyons, and Member of the Academy of Medicine, concurred with the statement just made by the Argentine delegate. They, too, had been at work experimenting these four or five years, and they found that tuberculine was a broken reed. At best could it be used as corroborative evidence along with clinical symptoms. M. Cagny joined in the debate, remarking the moral of the story was that doctors, whether for human beings or for animals, ought to give microbes a rest for a while and resume clinical studies which modern practitioners have sadly neglected."

"And how did the audience receive your remarks, cher maître?" I asked M. Paul Cagny.

"Some laughed heartily, others—the microbiologists—indulged in a sickly laugh."

The great objection, M. Cagny thinks, to modern theories of disease is that they overlook the great point: the temperament of the patient. Young doctors are analysing everything, looking out for microbes and crystals, forgetting that these are not so much causes as symptoms of a disease. "What do I care," he told me, "if a drop of blood examined under a microscope tells me my horse has got typhoid fever? I know it without that. It is more important, and more difficult, too, for me to find out the exact temperament of the horse, because then I have a chance of treating it successfully." M. Cagny summed up his doctrine in these pithy words:—"The whole art of healing lays in not running athwart nature."

Tronchin, the famous Geneva doctor, taught this also, and the greatest genius of his age, Voltaire, cried "That is what I have always preached!" and became a patient of Tronchin.

La Croix ought to regret having tried to damn with faint praise the lunches provided by Comte de Franqueville for the bishops. They came to the respectable sum of 28,000 frs. for the five repasts to which the eighty-two prelates sat down. This also includes the afternoon teas with petits gâteaux and the extra service. A great chef tells me that he could have done things handsomely, and even sumptuously, for just half the sum.

One of the five days on which the bishops lunched at La Muette fell on Friday. This was not a reason for going to less expense, but the contrary—a grand déjeuner maigre costs more than a grand déjeuner gras. The chief difference between a fine dinner and a déjeuner on a corresponding scale is that at the former there is soup and at the latter there are eggs and no soup. However, from regard for episcopal stomachs, which rarely have the advantage of being young, the host and hostess at La Muette provided potages. Be it known that a plate full of soup as a commencement of a stiff repast is a security against apoplexy or cerebral congestion. Milk soups appeared on the table at the Friday lunch, followed by œufs brouillés, filets de sole à la Joinville, en croustillade, en whitebait, and truite en gélée. After the fish came macaroni à l'italienne. The final—bouchées aux fraises nouvelles—is an exquisite dish worthy of being set before a modern Cleopatra. The strawberries must be raised in blackened hothouses lighted night and day by electricity. Dessert: Grapes and petites confiseries. The latter, in the nature of fondants, melt in the mouth and put no strain on the teeth. Doubtless the coffee following the dessert gave out the aroma of true Moka. Nothing marks so well or so ill the grand repast as perfect or middling coffee. The coffee is the crowning glory of the feast, and especially of the déjeûner, as it acts as a spur to the brain and prepares for the tasks of the afternoon.

The petit verre offered to nos seigneurs excluded old Chartreuse (now priceless) and Benedictine. I am not sure the wines—Hermitage and Clos Vougeot—were the best vintages for elderly and aged churchmen who lead sedentary lives. Burgundy is the wine best suited to the country gentleman who hunts stags, foxes, and spends the most of his time in the saddle.

Of course, apart from the bouchées aux fraises nouvelles there were substantial delicacies. A potage aux trois filets merits special mention. The chef I have been consulting assures me that it is a potage which tests the skill of the cook. This is how he proceeds in making it. He first boils down his fowl, or fowls. Hens have more flavour in the broth-pot than chickens. When they have been done to rags, he cools the broth in an icing apparatus, skims it carefully, strains, replaces it on the stove, and adds, cut in filets, or in plain English sliced, the breasts of chicken, fresh round of beef, and neat's tongue à l'écarlate, to relieve the blandness of the fowl, which is the preponderant element. These additions, after throwing up their scum, which, of course, is skimmed off carefully, are allowed to simmer for about three hours. The broth is then strained, clarified, and re-heated. At the end of this stage it is fit to serve. A poached egg may be added for each convive, or even two. This is often done for after-cotillon refreshments at the end of balls. But the poached eggs in a potage à trois filets might be too nutritious for sedentary old gentlemen who had really nothing to do but say Yes to the Encyclical.

Another test dish was the pâté de lièvre à la Périgord, a preparation of hare deserving to rank as ambrosia. The œufs Doria which were served at one of the five lunches might be also named souvenir de Rome. One finds them in perfection with the accompaniment of striking local colour in the trattorie in the artists' quarter in Rome and round the Flower Market and the Farnese. The eggs are cooked in oil somewhat à la Marengo, with tomatoes and spiced with saffron. The fricandeau de veau marks as the single homely dish in the various menus. It would have been served to make bishops of plain habits and rustic breeding feel at home. It is a great dish in country inns, in peasants' houses, and in the dwellings of the poorer parish priests. The bonne à tout faire can always make a fricandeau de veau à la casserole.

The Archbishop of Paris did not appear at any of the episcopal lunches. He has come to an age (eighty-eight) at which milk is the only safe aliment.

I have known not a few of the industrial kings of this country. I noticed how greatly they over-rated the sort of mental capacity that is requisite to the making of a great fortune, and thinking themselves endowed even as they are, fancied their sons must be men of high ability. They therefore subjected the latter to the highest pressure—training with a view to the passing of brilliant examinations. Instead of making them distinguished men, they dwarfed them into half-witted beings, or forced them into semi or whole lunacy. I could furnish many instances of lamentable failures brought about in this way, but they are not sufficiently notorious to excite interest. There are, however, some hors texte, for instance, Jacques Lebaudy, calling himself Emperor of Sahara, Max Lebaudy, nicknamed le Petit Sucrier, and unfortunate Van Blarenberghe, who last week murdered his octogenarian mother and then committed suicide, the two-fold tragedy taking place with circumstances of shocking ferocity in a Louis XII. palace standing in its own extensive grounds in the Rue de la Bienfaisance.

Van Blarenberghe's father, an industrial king de plus chic, wanted to raise him up by the forcing process of cram, hard work, and the passing of brilliant examinations to high personal distinction. The poor young fellow's life was thus made miserable, and wholly wasted. He had to go into training when little more than a small boy for les grands concours, and for admission later on to the Polytechnic. Unable to attain these distinctions, he had to enter the Génie, where he became a lieutenant. He next resigned to read for the Polytechnic again, and utterly broke down. Still he was driven on to obtain elsewhere an engineer's diploma and to discharge divers highly responsible and largely remunerated functions in railways and other industrial concerns. In a short time it became necessary to place him under treatment in a private asylum near Paris, where his parents could often go to see him. Van Blarenberghe returned home a gentle, and, to all appearance, inoffensive, being, and, according to a medical certificate, cured. The father believed in the certificate, but saw the mind so weakened that he did not dare to put the screw on again at once. The mother felt more uneasy than ever. Under the father's eye the discharged madman was as a good child, and almost too docile for a normal state. The death of thee elder Van Blarenberghe removing this control, the younger grew rather misanthropic, and spent his days in rambling and motoring in the forests near Paris, and sometimes made rushes into those of Burgundy. He also became religious, extremely prayerful in season and out, and imagined he had a call to save his father's soul by a course of vicarious expiation. The mother tried in vain to persuade him that the act of expiation on the Cross of Calvary covered all, and that it would have covered Dives had he but shown charity to the beggar. Here the son caught her up. The late M. Van Blarenberghe had the riches of Dives; but on what occasion was he ever charitable? Eternal justice was not to be cheated. It demanded atonement. It does not appear that he told her who should in his opinion expiate for the sins committed in making and in keeping the vast fortune. But what has happened shows him to have thought: "Those who benefited by his money-making greed." Mme. Van Blarenberghe became seriously frightened, and had alarm bells set up in all her rooms. She instructed her menservants to rush to her the instant she rang any of them. It is not my intention to go into any detail of the frightful tragedy. The journals have left nothing unsaid which they could give about them.

Waldeck-Rousseau declared, often in private and sometimes publicly in courts of law, that the best thing the sons of most of the industrial kings can do is to be spendthrifts. In being so they prove the equity that lies in the nature of things and throw back money into its normal course of circulation. They are doomed to expiate in some way or another the paternal greed and hardness of heart. They may as well do so in amusing themselves. The rake's progress no doubt leads to a plunge into poverty. Is not this wholesome expiation? Waldeck-Rousseau took this line in pleading for Max Lebaudy, le Petit Sucrier, against his mother, who attempted to have him placed, because a spendthrift, under a conseil judiciaire. Jacques Lebaudy, calling himself Emperor of Sahara, holds his gold, silver, and even coppers with a tight hand. He has not yet expiated any part of the paternal sins. Mme. Veuve Lebaudy undergoes partial expiation in the disgrace that follows; she clings to the memory of her beloved Syveton, thus justifying the ideas of Waldeck-Rousseau.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

IT is generally accepted, dear Lady Betty, that this is a "mad world"; the prospect is that shortly it will have become a raving-mad world, a condition which would be frightful. The padded-cell and straitwaistcoat systems of government will have to be adopted by all "civilised" nations; laws will have to be made in every direction to protect us from our neighbours and ourselves. There is no security now but in obscurity. Shot or scandal is the portion of all who attain prominence. Blackmailing is the most flourishing industry of the moment; the statesman is blackmailed by his supporters who want place or title; the prominent and rich are blackmailed by their poorer neighbours; the millionaire is blackmailed by Belgravia; the financier is blackmailed in the City; the actor and actress are blackmailed by the critic; and the doctor is blackmailed by his "fashionable" patients!

Physically and intellectually the condition of the civilised man and woman to-day is better than it ever was; spiritually it is degenerating rapidly. Science, observation, progress, and increased prosperity are enormously improving the physical condition of the community in England, for instance; and education and experience are raising the intelligence of most considerably. The decay of the conscience, however, is obvious. The restraining properties of that spiritual organ appear to be disappearing altogether, though conscience is still preserved by many to enable them—to handicap their neighbours.

* * * * *

The millionaire of the immediate future will be in as perilous a situation as is the ordinary sovereign. He will have to maintain a private police force and army to protect himself from the disorderly and desperate. The pirates of Piccadilly will endeavour to seize him in his yacht at sea, to avoid which capture he will have to be attended by an escort of ships. Poison, pistols, and explosives will occupy his thoughts awake and asleep. It is conceivable that this condition might bring about the return of circumstances which have long since been removed. The millionaires might purchase vast tracts of land—whole counties even—build castles and fortifications, maintain armed retainers, and set up mimic courts! Moneygrub, the billionaire, in those conditions, would be a much more powerful citizen than was any king-maker of the past.

* * * * *

The geology of "society" is a fascinating subject, and it is surprising that no writer before this has thought of it. In the process of development various layers have been formed, and in each of them—as in ordinary geology—are deposited the remains of extinct qualities. Sanctity, chivalry, loyalty, varying codes of honour, the "gentleman of the old school," and the "Early Victorian woman," are each to be found in the layers of the time in which they flourished. As in ordinary geology, there are the primary, secondary, tertiary, and quarternary epochs, each with its distinctive features, culminating in the creation of the millionaire, and the middle-class deluge! Our particular epoch is probably destined to add the billionaire and the blackmailer to the deposits, contributions which should interest greatly social excavators and philosophers of the distant future. What discussion it would arouse were the remains of a conscience discovered in our particular layer, and what plausible theories the discovery would disturb!

* * * * *

The successful draw us up to their level; the unsuccessful down to theirs.

* * * * *

Little minds pick little thoughts.

* * * * *

There is in each of us a resident doctor—nature or instinct, or a combination of both—who is the specialist on the particular constitution which has been entrusted to his care. He is ceaselessly at work, repairing here and preventing there, and ordering rest, abstention, or change of diet. The main features in the mechanism of all human beings are alike, but every constitution differs, and only this specialist knows the strength, weakness, and requirements of his particular patient. The ordinary doctor attends the patient, and, more or less, treats him as if he had no peculiarities—and how should he know them? The only way the latter can "consult" with the resident doctor is to discover what are the "instincts" of the patient, and these he generally ignores. Of course, allowances must be made for circumstances, but having taken those into account, there are always individual "instincts" which should act as guides. To order violent exercise to a patient who has always been inclined to be restful, cold baths to one who has throughout life had a distaste for them, early rising to one who is generally disposed to linger in bed, to endeavour to diminish stoutness or increase flesh in those who are naturally respectively stout or slim, are all treatments which—when contrary to the "instinct" or "nature" of those concerned—must frequently be injurious. These lines are not written to diminish the confidence which is accorded to the members of the medical profession, but to submit to them a suggestion which has obviously much in its favour, in the hope that they may develop it by the light of their superior knowledge, and, of course, without permitting themselves to be unduly influenced by present practice, which is subject to continual alterations.

A little love goes a long way; occasionally it goes to the Divorce Court.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

IT was announced some time ago that My Pet II. would leave Newmarket early in January for France, and that he would be reserved for his engagements in that country. However, the horse is still at Newmarket, and if his owner is well advised he will let his colt run for the Two Thousand before sending him to France. My Pet II. has not grown much since the Newmarket Houghton Meeting, and he is certainly not such a good-looking animal as Sagamore, who would be first favourite for the Derby if Sir James Miller had lived. It is believed that both My Pet II. and Sagamore will discover themselves to be well endowed with stamina. The former is engaged in the Newmarket Biennial, but he is not likely under any circumstances to start for that race, as he would have to give a stone to Lord Falmouth's dark colt St. Martin. It is very likely that the Two Thousand will be an easier race to win than any of the French three-year-old stakes. There is always a strong disposition among sporting writers to depreciate foreign form, as to which they usually know very little indeed.

Lord Derby will begin next season with a stud of thirty-three racehorses in training. Of the older horses Gourd, Bridge of Canny, and Keystone II. are the most promising. Twelve months ago any one at Newmarket would have been astounded to hear that Keystone II. would win the Oaks and the Coronation Stakes, and that Bridge of Canny would secure nine races of the value of close upon £10,000. Until Keystone II. was entered for several races on the 1st she had no engagements for next season, as she was withdrawn long ago from the £2,000 stake at the Liverpool July Meeting. I do not believe that the Oaks winner will be found capable of staying the Ascot Cup course, but I shall expect her to win the Coronation Cup at Epsom if she is then in her best form. Bridge of Canny is entered for the Triennials at Newmarket and at Ascot, and he has a small engagement at the Newmarket First July Meeting. Olympian, colt by Orme out of St. Victorine, and Ste. Claire II., filly by Isinglass out of Santa Brigada (dam of Bridge of Canny), will probably turn out to be the best of Lord Derby's three-year-olds. Olympian made his début at Goodwood when palpably backward, and Bellavista gave him 6 lb. (including sex allowance), and defeated him by two lengths. At the Newmarket First October Meeting Olympian won the Boscawen Post Stakes, but the form was exceedingly moderate, and he could only beat Sixty by a head. Ten days later, at Kempton Park, Galvani defeated Olympian by a length and a half for the Imperial Produce Plate, the pair having met at even weights, and two days afterwards Major Loder's colt won the Middle Park Plate. The Kempton Park race was Olympian's best performance, and it was the more creditable, inasmuch as it was obvious that he still wanted time. This horse was heavily engaged when a yearling, and he is at present entered for nearly thirty races, his earliest engagement being the Craven Stakes at the first of the Newmarket Spring Meetings. He is entered for the Two Thousand, the Newmarket Stakes, and the Derby. Ste. Claire II. never ran last season, and the One Thousand is her first engagement as a three-year-old. She is entered for the Coronation Stakes at Ascot. The three-year-old relation to Keystone II. is Boulter's Lock, her half-brother, by St. Frusquin, but his two-year-old form was very moderate indeed. Lord Derby has fourteen two-year-olds, two of which are leased from Lord Stanley and three from Lady Meux. There is no relative to Keystone II. among the lot, but Bridge of Sighs is half-sister, by Isinglass, to Bridge of Canny. Pilgrim's Way is a filly by St. Frusquin out of Canterbury Pilgrim, and she certainly ought to race if there is anything in "running" blood; but her grandly bred half-sister, by St. Simon—Wife of Bath, ran twice last season as a two-year-old without winning. There is a half-brother, by Ladas, to Olympian, named Triumph II. Vedanta is own brother to Volodyovski. Gourd is a mare that is quite likely to win an important long-distance handicap, but it must always be remembered that she likes soft ground, and her performance at Derby in November showed that the going cannot be too heavy for her.

I am glad to see an excellent entry for the Buckenham Produce Post Stakes, to run at the Newmarket First October Meeting in 1909. There are twelve subscriptions, so that if every owner is represented in the race the stake will be worth £3,600. The King heads the list with three mares, all covered by Persimmon, one of them being Medora, dam of Zinfandel. Sir D. Cooper's lot includes Glare (dam of Flair), covered by Gallinule. Lord Derby has Broad Corrie, covered by Cyllene; Canterbury Pilgrim, by John o' Gaunt; and Glasalt, by St. Simon. One of Mr. A. James's three mares is The Gorgon (dam of Gorgos), covered by Cyllene. Mr. J. B. Joel's lot includes Golden Lassie, covered by Ayrshire; and Schoolbook, by Flying Lemur. The Duke of Portland is represented by Hattie, covered by William the Third; Mneme, by Flying Fox; and Ganderetta, by Carbine. Mr. Raphael has Cimiez, covered by Cyllene; and Skyscraper, by Isinglass. One of Mr. J. de Rothschild's is Pitti (dam of Beppo), covered by Robert le Diable. Mr. W. Hall Walker has Sand Blast (dam of Colonia), covered by Gallinule; and Lady Lightfoot, by Diamond Jubilee. The Duke of Westminster has Vampire (dam of Flying Fox), covered by William the Third; and Lowood and Gay Rose, both by Orme.

There are also good entries for the Ham Stakes at Goodwood (1909) and for the Gratwicke Stakes (1910). The latter event is named after Mr. Gratwicke, who was an intimate friend of the sixth Duke of Richmond, and the former is named after his place in Sussex, Ham Manor, near Angmering, which now belongs to Sir Henry Fletcher. The King has engaged Medora in both races, and his Majesty also has Amphora (covered by Flying Fox) in the Ham Stakes. Mr. L. Brassey has Winifreda (covered by King's Messenger) in the Ham, and Red Lily (covered by Robert le Diable) in the Gratwicke. Lord Derby has Canterbury Pilgrim in both races. The Duke of Devonshire has Burgonet, covered by Gallinule; and Rambling Katie, by St. Frusquin, in the Ham, and in the same race are the Duke of Portland's La Roche (covered by Isinglass) and Elizabeth Hardwick (by William the Third). One of the Duke of Westminster's is Kissing Cup, covered by Lord Bobs. The entry for the Gratwicke includes Lord Falmouth's Quintessence, covered by Cyllene; Lord Cadogan's La Figlia, by Flying Fox; Lord Harewood's Lighthead (dam of Minstead), by Phalaris; Duke of Portland's Gay Duchess, by William the Third; and Duke of Westminster's Westaria (sister to Flying Fox), by Avington.

There are 156 entries for the Gimcrack Stakes at York. This race is a sweepstake of £5 each, £3 forfeit to the fund, with £1,000 added. The conditions might easily be improved so as to render the race much more attractive to owners, without its involving any additional charge on the fund. Let there be an entrance of £3, to be the only liability if forfeit is declared by the first Tuesday in June, with a sweepstake of £10 or £15 each for every animal left in after that date. Mr. W. Hall Walker, who has now won this race two years in succession, is the largest subscriber, with six entries, and next come Lord Carnarvon and Sir R. B. Jardine with five each, and then Lord Derby with four.

There is a large entry of mares for the Convivial Produce Stakes at York, to run in August, 1909. Mr. Bass heads the list with Sceptre, covered by Cyllene. Sir R. B. Jardine's lot includes Baroness La Flèche, covered by Henry the First, the produce being entitled to a breeding allowance of 13 lb. This mare was purchased for 7,500 gs. last July at the sale of Mr. Musker's stud. One of Sir John Thursby's mares is La Sagesse, covered by John o' Gaunt. She was bought from the late Sir James Miller at Newmarket in December, 1905, for 2,500 gs.

Sir Edgar Vincent has at present ten horses in training at Newmarket, six of which are two-year-olds. Sir Edgar had a very useful two-year-old last season in Auber, who won five races value £3,919. He was sold at Newmarket last month for 2,000 gs. This animal was bred by Mr. Purefoy, and Sir Edgar Vincent purchased him at Doncaster as a yearling for 165 gs., so he proved a remarkably good investment. Angouleme, by Orion out of Angola, was beaten nine times last season, but on more than one occasion he ran respectably. It is believed that this colt will "go for" the Chaplin Stakes at the Lincoln Spring Meeting, and if he does start for that race he ought to win it if in form. Cyanean started four times last season without winning, but I hear that she has been looking and going well during the winter, and it is anticipated that she will win a good race as a five-year-old. I expect that when Cyanean does win again the course will be six to eight furlongs. She was a very smart two-year-old, but afterwards went amiss badly. She was bred by Lord Londonderry, and is own sister to Cynosure, the three-year-old colt for which the King paid 3,800 gs. as a yearling at Doncaster. Cynosure failed ignominiously last season, but he is quite likely to win a T.Y.C. race within the next few months. Sir Edgar Vincent will probably win a five furlongs scramble with Ulalume, who started nine times last season, her only success being in the Great Eastern Railway Handicap at the Newmarket First October Meeting, when she just beat Nero (who started favourite), having 11 lb. the best of the weights.

When writing, a fortnight ago, about M. E. Blanc's Derby colt, Ouadi Halfa, I stated that his dam, Yesterling, had been sold by Lord Clonmell to M. Blanc. This was a mistake. It was only the foal (Ouadi Halfa) that was then sold. Yesterling still belongs to Lord Clonmell, and she is now on a visit to Persimmon, the sire of Ouadi Halfa. Last season's yearling out of Yesterling was a filly by Flying Fox, which was sold at Doncaster to Captain Forester for 1,500 gs., and she was the highest priced lot among Lord Clonmell's team of seven.

There has been a deal of apple-blossom twaddle about the King's dark three-year-old, Perambulator, but, as I have before mentioned, nothing whatever is known as to this colt's capacity for racing. Some good judges at Newmarket are decidedly of the opinion that Lord Wolverton's Larig, by Florizel II. out of Pitcroy, will turn out to be the best of the Egerton House three-year-olds. Larig started twice last season—for the Princess Plate at the Newmarket First July Meeting, which race was won by Sagamore, and for the Dewhurst Plate. Lord Wolverton's colt, however, was then very backward. Larig's first important engagement is the Two Thousand, and he is also entered for the Newmarket Stakes and for the Derby.

The bookmakers did so well over the winter betting on last year's Derby that it is strange that they are not tempted to offer more reasonable odds against the nominal favourites for the race on June 5. The rates which have been quoted are preposterous, and only the most infatuated of mooncalves would dream of accepting such odds.

Slieve Gallion is an animal against which many people appear to be strongly prejudiced. He has been denounced as a rogue, and it is vehemently maintained that he will turn out a non-stayer. Nobody at present can possibly know whether he has or has not the stamina necessary to win the Two Thousand or the Derby, but when Slieve Gallion is abused because he was beaten by Galvani in the Middle Park Plate it really ought to be remembered that the colt had been seriously amiss from dental trouble before he went to Newmarket. The fact is that the only course in accordance with common sense is to ignore the Middle Park Plate running altogether in the case of Slieve Gallion. Captain Greer was very well advised in withdrawing his colt from the Dewhurst Plate, as he might have been irretrievably injured if he had been sent back to Newmarket to run for that race. It is to be feared that the majority of owners would have started Slieve Gallion for the Dewhurst Plate, to judge from the numerous indiscretions of this kind which have excited wonder and contempt during the last few years. Slieve Gallion was not stopped in the Middle Park Plate through lack of stamina, for a horse which has cantered away with the New Stakes at Ascot would certainly be able to "get" the B.S.C. at Newmarket. I hear that Slieve Gallion is a certain starter for the Two Thousand if he is then fit and well, the tale about his being reserved for the Derby being a fiction. It will add considerable interest to the Newmarket race if Mr. Raphael decides to start My Pet II., but, in the possible absence of that colt, Slieve Gallion's most dangerous opponents will be All Black, Linacre, Olympian, Dusty Miller, Simon Square, Baltinglass, Bezonian, the dark St. Martin, and possibly Larig or Perambulator. I do not believe that Traquair now has a 1,000 to 1 chance for either Two Thousand or Derby.

Polymelus appears to me to have been harshly treated in the Lincolnshire Handicap, in that he is made to give 10 lb. to Velocity, whereas in the Cambridgeshire the Irish horse was giving him 6 lb., and, as originally handicapped, the winner at Newmarket was made to receive 16 lb. from Velocity. Even if Polymelus accepts for the Lincolnshire Handicap there is not the very slightest chance that he will run for that race, as it would be utterly impossible for his trainer to get him properly fit by March 19. I do not for a moment believe that Mr. Joel will now "mess about" Polymelus in handicaps. The horse will probably be trained for the Coronation Cup at the Epsom Summer Meeting, but the race which will be the aim and end of his preparation will be the Princess of Wales's Stakes at the Newmarket First July Meeting.

Kaffir Chief has already been backed for the Lincoln race, but these early transactions now represent only the harum-scarum fancies of impetuous backers. Kaffir Chief has 7 st. 8 lb. to carry at Lincoln. In the Cambridgeshire he finished second (beaten three lengths) to Polymelus, who was giving him 2 st.! Any one who backs him for the Lincolnshire Handicap must be of the opinion that Polymelus could win that race with something like 11 st. on his back, taking a line through the Newmarket running. Kaffir Chief's form looks even worse when one remembers that in the Cambridgeshire he finished only a neck in front of Malua, who was giving him a year and 18 lb. Kaffir Chief won the Castle Irwell Handicap at Manchester in November, but he had a great advantage in the weights with those animals in the field which had shown good form, as Roseate Dawn was giving him 26 lb., and he was receiving 12 lb. from Dean Swift. According to the public running of Kaffir Chief he is a bad horse, and Cyclops Too (4 yrs., 6 st. 1 lb.) might turn out to be the best from this stable when they come to be galloped.

His Eminence, who has been a winter tip for this race, is by no means overweighted with 7 st. 11 lb., but he may be kept for the City and Suburban, and he ought to be left alone until it is certain that he will start at Lincoln.

Roseate Dawn has been entered for all classes of races, and for events run over every sort of distance. It will be interesting to see how many handicaps this horse accepts for.

I see it is stated that as Galvani is not engaged in the Two Thousand, Major Loder will therefore rely upon Weathercock for that race. There is not the slightest prospect of Weathercock being in proper racing condition by the end of April. Major Loder will no doubt depend upon Baltinglass in the Two Thousand, and it is quite on the cards that the son of Isinglass and Sibola may ultimately turn out to be his owner's best three-year-old.

There is something at once melancholy and grotesque about the desperate efforts of some of the sporting papers to get up a little excitement over the publication of the weights for the Spring Handicaps. Some amateur predictions have been discussed by these journals with ridiculous seriousness. The fact is that nobody cares a potato peeling about the weights in these days, excepting the few people who have backed horses in anticipation, and all such wagers are only on a trumpery scale. Betting some time in advance is absolutely dead, so far as large transactions are concerned, and stable commissions are now kept back until the latest possible moment.

Some sensational nonsense has gone round the press as to the intended activities of the Stewards of the Jockey Club, who are stated to have been aroused by the passing of the Street Betting Act and the action of the Anti-Gambling League, the result being that all the Clerks of Courses have been required to send in a full report of the receipts and payments at their meetings, including a list of salaries. This is a venerable order, which originated with Lord Durham when he held the office of Steward. He required the accounts of every race meeting to be submitted to the Stewards of the Jockey Club, the primary object being to ascertain whether the added money was sufficient, judged by the profits of the meeting. It was also desired to find out whether the rule which provides that no larger dividend than ten per cent. is to be paid to the shareholders of a race company has been strictly complied with. This last regulation applies only to companies which have been formed of late years, but all meetings are practically in the power of the Jockey Club if they infringe this or any other rule, as nothing can be more easy than to deprive an offending meeting of some of its days when the annual list of fixtures is drawn out. The Stewards of the Jockey Club have not made any fresh move whatever, and the drivel which has appeared on the subject is all nonsense and rubbish of the most imaginative kind.

Mr. W. Clark's Meadow Rue is by no means overweighted for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap with 6 st. 10 lb. This colt showed excellent form during the autumn. Mr. D. Baird was very badly advised when he let Meadow Rue go after the colt had won a selling race at the Derby September Meeting.

LAWN TENNIS, THE TRADE, AND THE POT-HUNTER.

Those who are interested in lawn tennis will remember that the All England Lawn Tennis Club, which holds the championship meeting at Wimbledon, recently announced that it was going to pay the full trade price for balls, nets, and the paraphernalia of the game. This course was the proper answer to the reformers who, under the cloak of principle, were making personal attacks. It is very pleasant to be virtuous and vindictive. In the course of the dispute it appeared that at lawn tennis tournaments the much-despised trade supplied balls at half the price at which the public can buy them, besides loaning tennis nets and posts, umpire seats, and so on, for practically nothing, and sometimes supplying labour for marking out the courts. I was anxious to see whether any other tournament committees would follow the lead of Wimbledon. At Surbiton, for instance, there is a tournament. The members of that club are simply embodiments of lawn tennis virtue. They were fearfully shocked at the immorality of Wimbledon in having a tradesman secretary of the club. It was naturally so upsetting to their sensitive suburban susceptibilities that I quite sympathise with them. But will Surbiton follow Wimbledon? Will the Northern Tournament committee, too, be virtuous, or will Mr. MacFie, the leader of reform, expect the trade to provide prizes now that this proposition for levying a tribute on the ball manufacturers has been knocked on the head? I very much fear that the conduct of Wimbledon will not be followed by other tournament committees unless the rules of the Association compel compliance. The simple reason is that tournaments could not pay their way unless they received the trade subvention. Now, the trade supplies the goods at a dead loss. But as business men, and not philanthropists, are at the head of the leading firms, it is only fair to surmise that what they lose on the swings they make up on the roundabouts. They no doubt find that these tournaments not only are a means of advertisement, but that the popularity of the game is increased, and thereby the output of materials is augmented. In this way they create markets for their wares. If this business did not pay them, they would not undertake it. If this support ceased, the standard of comfort that the present-day player of every class exacts would not be at his command. He would not have the unlimited supply of balls, the new nets and posts, and canvas round the courts. All this is his because of the trade subvention. These anti-trade reformers know as well as I do that these are the facts of the case. To talk of the duty of the Lawn Tennis Association to popularise the game is all nonsense. Without the manufacturers the Association would be powerless. The manufacturers are wise in their generation. They have created a class of players who, from the highest to the lowest, expect everything of the best. They are content with nothing less. They carry their exigencies into club and private life, and that is where the trade profit comes in. If you ask Jones, the local hero, who has never played in first-class company in his life, you must do him every honour. He has all the airs and graces of a champion. He eyes the balls that are provided, and bounds them, and feels them, as though he were an expert. He must have a new set of balls every time he comes to your court. If others are there beforehand, you protest that you are keeping the new balls until Jones comes, and it is felt that a very proper course is being pursued.

Now these lawn-tennis players have a very good time. One way and another they gather together a lot of prizes. The rules of the Lawn Tennis Association provide no limit as to the value of prizes. Championship trophies that may be won outright after two or three efforts may cost anything from £20 to £50. These prizes would not be offered if they did not attract crack players, who in their turn draw big gates. I have a shrewd suspicion that the players do not slaughter one another in the pursuit of these pots. If Brown is in the north, then White honours the south. I wonder what would happen if the Association passed a rule such as obtains at colleges at Oxford and Cambridge. There, if at athletics the runner wins a challenge cup outright, he can only retain it by providing one of equal value. It seems to me that a sport that is so dependent on trade support for its luxuries should be a little less lavish in its prizes. Further, the richer tournaments are by these means enabled to crush out the competition that might come about from smaller tournaments. Nor under the rules of the Association is there any limit to the value of the prizes in ordinary competitions. I would restrict their value very stringently. By this means the expenses of any tournament would be materially lessened. The pot-hunter would also be less in evidence. It is to my mind a most unsatisfactory feature of lawn tennis that these valuable prizes out of all proportion to the work that they entail should be offered. The fact that the donors have to rely on trade subvention to give them indicates that there is not the money to pay for them. Their existence makes the path of fresh tournaments a difficult one. The glamour of them may attract fresh players, but it must necessarily create a race of pot-hunters. Were it not that these valuable prizes abound, inter-club and inter-county competitions would become more popular. By means of such matches the standard of the game would be materially improved. But as things are at present it is far nicer to spend one's time in ornamenting one's sideboard than in playing for a county or a club. This question of the limitation of value of prizes and champion trophies is one to which the Lawn Tennis Association should immediately devote its attention.

It was with great regret that I read of the early death of B. Fletcher Robinson. He had played Rugby football for Cambridge University against Oxford in 1891-2-3. When at Jesus he edited the "Granta," and like many who were connected with that paper in its halcyon days he drifted into journalism, although he was called to the Bar. But then journalism was in the blood, for his uncle, Sir John Robinson, was editor of the Daily News. He had been editor of the Express, Vanity Fair, and the World. He at one time thought of entering Parliament. He was very popular, especially at his club, the Reform. He was a tall, fair-haired, good-natured giant, ever ready to see the humorous side of affairs. He edited a manual on Rugby football, and his description of a match before a Yorkshire crowd is one of the best pieces of football writing that I know.

Last Saturday the nearest point at which Rugby football seems to have been practicable was the South Coast of Iceland, or the North Pole. But the frost did not interfere with the business of the Association game. In some places there was snow, in others the sun shone brightly. Everywhere there was frost and nearly everywhere big crowds. At Chelsea there were some 25,000 people present. A victory over West Bromwich meant that the local team would be pretty certain to go up into the First Division, and they won. Where the Crystal Palace had succeeded Woolwich Arsenal failed. Newcastle United beat them and so went a long way towards securing the League championship. In the Southern League Portsmouth strengthened their position at the top of the tree by just beating Watford, while Fulham, their most dangerous opponents, were beaten by Brentford after a fast game.

There has been a good deal of complaint lately in the football press about foul play on the part of professional teams, especially when an amateur is playing with them. I have been told that they resent the presence of a man who is taking the bread out of another professional's mouth. It is a matter of common knowledge that an amateur forward is often starved. Certainly all the trend of events is to exclude amateurs from the professional teams. It will soon be just as unlikely that an amateur will play in a league as that an amateur would take a leading part in a professional theatrical production. This exclusion of the amateur makes it all the more important that the Football Association should jealously safeguard his interests. With regard to rough, or rather, foul play, a player should be warned off at once instead of being warned.

There was some very slow play in the game between Dawson and Stevenson. They began with one set of balls, changed them, and then went back again to them on Friday, when big breaks were once more made. Stevenson in the end won easily as he scored very quickly when he once got going. With regard to Lovejoy's cannon record, I may say in answer to a correspondent that the position of the balls is far more difficult to get than in the case of the old spot stroke, and when obtained is so much more difficult to retain that I do not think that a rule similar to the spot-barred rule is likely to be brought in just at present.

UNSATISFACTORY STOCK MARKETS—SHARP BREAK IN AMERICANS—HEAVY SELLING BY A LONDON OPTION DEALING FIRM—A NERVOUS SENTIMENT—HOME RAILS WEAK DESPITE GOOD DIVIDENDS—THE FORTHCOMING JAPANESE LOAN—KAFFIRS AND THE OUTLOOK.

CONDITIONS on the Stock Exchange during the past week cannot be described as satisfactory. The dominating influence has been the weakness shown by the American market, in which department sales were heavily pressed, and prices tumbled away with an unusual lack of resistance. In view of the long-continued boom in Yankee Rails and the defiance shown by Wall Street to the cautionary signals held out in the Money Market, the fall is only what had been regarded as inevitable by those acquainted with the position. Fortunately the account open here in Americans on behalf of the British public is almost a negligible quantity, although the liberal manner in which our bankers have accommodated Wall Street speculators must render London sensitive to any financial upset in New York. During the last few weeks the banks on this side have been discriminating against loans upon American scrip, and this step, which strikes one as rather belated, has probably had much to do with causing the break in prices, because of New York's unpreparedness to receive the large blocks of stock recently thrown back upon it from this side. Arising out of the recent difficulties in contangoing Americans there has been during the last few days free liquidation on behalf of a large Stock Exchange firm, which appeared to have been carrying a huge amount of stock against call options for which it was liable. As usually happens when sales are pressed by any single firm, rumours of impending trouble have been circulated, and the nervousness thus created has led to a fair amount of scattered liquidation throughout the House. Under such circumstances it is not surprising that prices have suffered without much regard to intrinsic merits. A striking instance of this latter statement is afforded by the events ruling in the Home Railway market. The half-yearly results declared by the trade lines, notably the North-Eastern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and North Staffordshire, proved to be up to the best expectations, yet they failed to prevent stocks going back. The very illogicality of this movement, however, proves that the set-back can only be temporary, and it seems to me the present is an excellent opportunity for the investor. The yields on the best English Railway stocks range from 4 up to 4½ per cent., and with trade still active and traffics steadily expanding the market is bound to have its turn before long. The monetary situation here has already improved considerably during the last few weeks, and, while the uncertainty surrounding the position in New York makes it doubtful if any return to really easy conditions will be witnessed in the immediate future, the City seems to have surmounted the late period of abnormally high loan rates. At one time fears were expressed that high-class investment securities might be disturbed by sales on the part of insurance Companies in connection with losses incurred through the recent disaster to property in Jamaica. Anxiety on this score has, however, been relieved by the understanding that the insurance Companies will take advantage of the protection granted to them by the earthquake clause in their policies. Respecting inter-Bourse securities, the tendency has continued strong, thanks mainly to the support accorded from Paris. Berlin was disposed to stay her hand pending the result of the State elections, the excitement produced by which prevented the Bourse from deriving much benefit from the reduction to 6 per cent. announced by the Reichsbank in its discount rate. One of the most noteworthy features in the Foreign group of stocks was the influential buying of Japanese issues. There is no doubt that the Japanese £25,000,000 Loan for the Conversion of the Six per Cent. Customs bonds is in course of preparation, and this makes it probable that organised action will be taken to raise the existing Four per Cents., the quotation for which must, of course, govern the price at which the new scrip will be placed. As regards the Mining markets, the falling-off in the public inquiry for Kaffirs seems to have caused the controlling houses to withdraw support for the time being. Probably as soon as market conditions look more hopeful a fresh attempt will be made to awaken interest in this section. Within the next six weeks nearly £4,000,000 will be distributed in dividends on Kaffirs, and this should serve as a useful lever to the "shops."

HOME RAILS AND THEIR APPEAL TO THE INVESTOR—DISCUSSION OF THE DIVIDENDS—MODERATE PASSENGER RESULTS—EXCELLENT SHOWINGS BY THE TRADE LINES—THE "BERWICK" AND "POTTS" FINE RESULTS—GREAT CENTRAL'S SET BACK—METROPOLITAN'S MISFORTUNES—CENTRAL LONDON'S 4 PER CENT. RECORD UNBROKEN.

During the past week a great deal of history has been made in the Home Railway market, in connection with the declaration of results for the past half-year, but it has been unaccompanied by any increase in dealings. At the beginning of the Account the professionals ventured to lay in a little stock in expectation of a rally following the dividend announcements. Owing largely to the nervousness engendered by the liquidation going on in neighbouring departments, their anticipations were not fulfilled, and many have cleared out in disgust. It is a spectacle that has been witnessed in this market at least a dozen times in the last three years. The dealers—and, indeed, all close observers of the Home Railway market—recognise that stocks are cheap on the basis of present yields and of the general outlook for trade and for the Money Market. On the other hand, the market has not yet lived down its long reign of unpopularity so far as the investing public is concerned, and so prices go on dwindling and yields increasing to a degree that would have been thought impossible a few years ago. Of course, I do not forget the one or two bright spots, such as Great Northern Deferred and Hull and Barnsley, that have stood out lately. My object is rather to emphasise the undue depression that still exists among Railway securities as a whole, and to draw attention to the unusual opportunity offered to the capitalist willing to exercise a little discrimination and patience. Taking a survey of the recent dividends, the outstanding feature, so far, has been the difference in the results achieved by the goods-carrying lines and those which derive the bulk of their revenue from coaching traffic. It was a foregone conclusion, in view of the moderate results achieved in the matter of gross traffics, that the Southern passenger systems would be unable to increase dividends, and the fact that two Companies—the Brighton and South-Western—have announced payments at reduced rates was not surprising, having regard, in the first case, to a large capital increase, and in the second to the cost entailed by the Salisbury accident. The Brighton Railway during the past half-year continued to suffer from the effects of tramway competition. Its receipts from passenger traffic slightly increased, but the number of passengers carried decreased by over a million to a total of 26¾ millions. Of its total gross increase of £17,100, as much as £14,000 was swallowed up in extra working expenses. The paltry addition thus shown in net revenue was, of course, not sufficient to allow of the dividend being maintained, seeing that £500,000 of Second Preference and a similar amount of Ordinary ranked for dividend this time as compared with the second half of 1905. The outcome is a reduction in the annual rate on Brighton Deferred of ¼ per cent., making 5 per cent. In declaring a dividend of 1¾ per cent. for the year upon its Deferred stock, as against 2 per cent. for the previous twelve months, the South-Western supplies the full explanation by stating that it has set aside £30,000 as a reserve for claims arising out of the Salisbury accident. This sum is within £3,500 of the amount that would be required to maintain the dividend. The carry forward at £32,000 is practically the same as a year ago, and, having regard to the moderate improvement in the published traffics, the Company has done as well as could be expected. The other leading passenger lines—the Great Eastern, South-Eastern and Chatham—have just been able to maintain dividends, though in the last two cases it was necessary to make a reduction in the carry forwards. Turning now to the results so far made known by the lines serving the Midlands and North, we are able to easily trace the good effect produced by the trade boom in the mineral and textile area. The North Eastern is paying at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum for the half year, or ¾ per cent. more than at the corresponding period, while the Board is carrying forward £82,000, as against £49,000. The advance in the dividend and carry forward combined represents an addition to net revenue of £160,000. This is highly gratifying, particularly as there is reason to believe that the Company, in accordance with its traditionally conservative policy, has applied a considerable proportion of its additional gross receipts (estimated at £258,000) to betterments. The rate now declared makes the dividend for the full year 6⅛ per cent., as compared with 5½ per cent. for 1905. It is the best result shown by the North-Eastern since 1900, when 6⅜ per cent. was paid. In that year Berwicks moved between 159 and 177. The price, at the time of writing, allowing for accrued dividend, is only 142, which makes the yield 4¼ per cent.. On these facts the cheapness of the stock is self-evident. If the North-Eastern dividend may be accepted as a criterion of the other "Heavy" results the railway dividend season should wind up in a manner that will amply compensate for the tame performance recorded at the opening. Another excellent showing was that of the Lancashire and Yorkshire, which is distributing at the rate of 4¾ per cent., as compared with 4¼ per cent. a year ago, while slightly strengthening the balance forward. For the full year the dividend on "Leeds" is thus brought up to 4⅜ per cent., as compared with only 3¾ per cent. for 1905. Here again it is necessary to hark back to 1900 to equal such a result, and the research reveals the fact that in the year named the stock never went below 128½, and touched 147—values that make the present price of 105 "cum. div." look strange. The North Staffordshire has also justified the good opinion I formed of the Ordinary stock. Had the Board chose it could have paid at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, but it has prudently elected to strengthen the carry forward and to advance the dividend by ¼ per cent. to 4¾, giving 4⅜ per cent. for the whole year as against 4⅛ per cent. for 1905. North Staffordshire Ordinary is not one of the most marketable of Railway stocks, but, seeing that it can now be picked up at about par (allowing for accrued dividend), and that the yield is consequently 4⅜ per cent., it should command increasing attention from investors during the next few months. The "Potts," be it remembered, is one of the steadiest dividend-paying railways in the country. During the last ten years its distributions (with the single exception of 1901, when the rate was 3¾ per cent.) have fluctuated between 4 and 4½ per cent., the average for the decade working out at £4 4s. 3d. Turning to the dividend announced by the Great Central, the result has probably come as a disappointment to many people, because of the over-sanguine views that had been entertained regarding the immediate results likely to accrue from this Company's new lines. The recently opened Great Central-Great Western joint line viâ High Wycombe, while it offers big possibilities of future development, is for the present throwing a considerable burden upon the Great Central in the shape of extra capital charges and working expenditure, as well as the payment of a heavy rental to the Metropolitan. Hence it is not surprising that in spite of a published gain in gross receipts of £63,000, the Company's half-yearly result discloses a small decline in the divisible profit. It is true that the 1889 Preference will receive its dividend in full for the past year, as against only 3⅛ per cent. for 1905, and that 10s. per cent. will be paid for the year on the 1891 Preference against nil. But while these increases represent an extra distribution for the whole year of £24,000, it should be recognised that about £30,000 extra was distributed for the first half of 1906 alone. It follows, therefore, that in the past six months the balance of net revenue available for dividends on the Preference stocks was actually about £6,000 less than for the second half of 1905. This is the first check to the progress of recovering lost ground in the matter of dividends that the Company has suffered for many half-years, and the setback will probably have a salutary effect in modifying the absurdly extravagant "Bull" estimates that for some time have been circulated in regard to the Junior issues of the Company. In the Underground group outstanding weakness has again been displayed by Metropolitans, in consequence of the disastrous report for the half-year. This has proved too much for the patience of many old stockholders who had for years been holding on in hopes of a better state of affairs being inaugurated with the advent of electric traction. The collapse of "Mets" has been one of the most pitiful exhibitions witnessed in the Railway market of recent years. In the palmy days of 1898 the stock stood at 136⅞, and although "Tube" competition caused a fall to 70 in 1901, the confident hopes indulged in when it was definitely decided to electrify the line led to a sharp recovery, the stock standing at par only two years ago. How anticipations have been falsified is eloquently told by the fact that the price has since been cut in half, sales being made last week below 50. It is not only useless but unjust to blame the management; the Company's misfortunes are due, firstly, to the heavy capital cost entailed by converting the line from steam to electricity, secondly, to the loss of traffic entailed by the opening last April of the Great Central-Great Western joint line via High Wycombe, and, thirdly, to the inauguration of motor-'bus competition, which not only caused a heavy loss of local traffic but was partly instrumental in compelling the Company to reduce its fares. These are not evils which can be called transitory in their effect, though their influence is likely to be modified as time goes on. Some savings are to be expected this year in connection with the abolition of dual traction, and by means of an improved service the Company should win back a good deal of the traffic diverted to the Great Central-Great Western line, though at first the recovery on this account is likely to be gradual. Making all allowances, however, it is difficult to hold out hopes of any early recovery in "Mets.," indeed, it is doubtful if the stock has yet gravelled. Traffics are almost bound to continue showing heavy decreases until April, as up to that month they will run against the period that preceded the diversion of traffic to the Great Central new line. To pay 2 per cent. (which on the existing valuations for Home Railways should be forthcoming if the stock is to remain in the neighbourhood of 50) another £57,000 in net revenue is required, and where anything approaching this sum is to come from it is difficult to foresee. The Central London Railway, I am glad to observe, has not thought it advisable to depart from the pleasant monotony of 4 per cent. dividends. There was some doubt about the maintenance of the usual distributions, as the line—in consequence of the competitive motor 'bus—showed the proportionately big decline in its gross receipts during the half year of £8,200. This falling off has led to a reduction in the carry forward from £25,400 to £14,600, but the fact that the directors have permitted the balance to be drawn upon in this fashion suggests that they are fairly confident of being able to continue paying 4 per cent. Probably the Company has seen the worst of the omnibus competition, while on the other hand points that will tell favourably in the future are the growth of traffics from new "tubes" that will act as feeders, and the increasing revenue from "rents" of properties built over stations. The Central London is one of the few railways that is in the happy position of being able to defy competition. It has, perhaps, the finest route of any line in the world, and loss of traffic arising from the improved omnibus service is almost bound to be made up before long, because the population of London is ever growing. LIBERAL OFFERINGS OF CANADIAN PACIFIC—AN OVERWEIGHTED "BULL" ACCOUNT—GRAND TRUNKS DULL—THE BRIGHT PROSPECTS FOR 1907—ARGENTINE RAILS AND EXAGGERATED STRIKE NEWS—ROSARIOS RECOMMENDED—TWO CHEAP FIXED INTEREST SECURITIES.

Canadian Pacifics have been the most prominent feature in the Stock Exchange during the last few days. For some months past a tremendous "Bull" account has been built up in these shares—largely on behalf of American operators—and the general liquidation lately commenced in New York has affected Canadas severely. On Saturday the price dipped below 186—a reduction of 22 points from the level touched a month ago. It is a pity that Canadian Pacifics should be so closely identified with the gambling methods of Wall Street, for a share of such high merit as an investment ought to be immune from speculative tactics that make it go up and down like a shuttlecock. The break recently witnessed is not connected with any change in the general outlook for the road, which remains very bright. It is true that the last two or three traffic returns have shown fair decreases, but the results may be put down to bad weather, and are not a criterion of what the line will do when the spell of snowstorms now being experienced in the Dominion has passed. In regard to the rumours emanating in New York that an issue of $25,000,000 new Common stock was under contemplation, an emphatic denial has been made at headquarters. The Company, it is stated, has not used any portion of the proceeds of the last issue, mainly because neither the material nor the men for the work could be secured, and therefore there is no present necessity for, or likelihood of, another issue. It is possible that the fall in Canadas may go further, for the "Bull" account is still understood to be very large; and accordingly, the market is worth watching by the investor wanting to get stock cheap. Grand Trunks have not shared with Canadas to anything like the same extent in the fall, prices merely easing off in sympathy with prices all round the House. The moderate dividend prospects in respect of the Third Preference—which are unlikely to get more than 2½ per cent. on account of 1906—have kept speculation in Trunks at a low ebb. It would not be surprising, however, if the market was shortly to take a turn for the better, for once February is passed, and the danger of serious trouble from blizzards is over, dealers will begin to pay more attention to the prospects for the current year, which are distinctly good. Traffic returns continue to show substantial expansion, and it is reasonable to expect that the Company will be able to make some reduction this year in the ratio of operating costs, if only on account of the fact that it will not again be hindered with the arrears of Michigan taxation. The speculative investor, therefore, who buys Trunk Thirds, ought to have no reason to complain, say, six months ahead. The Ordinary stands in a different category, for its dividend possibilities are still very remote. However, the stock is bound to move to some extent in sympathy with the senior issues, and the forthcoming opening of the Pacific road will keep interest in Little Trunks alive, seeing that the Grand Trunk Company holds all the Common stock of the new line, a possession of great potential value. In the Foreign Railway group Argentine issues have been subjected to some selling upon the strikes at Rosario, and rumours that the trouble was likely to spread to Buenos Ayres. So far as can be gathered the disturbances are not regarded with any apprehension in responsible quarters, and there has been evidence that the declines in stock have been taken advantage of by insiders to get stock cheap. The traffic returns of the leading Argentine Railways keep expanding in really astonishing fashion, and there is every reason to expect them continuing to do so, for the wheat harvest has been excellent on the whole, and the moving of the remainder of the crop will give the railways plenty to do until maize begins to come forward, usually about the beginning of April. It is too early yet to prophesy definitely about the maize harvest, but up to the present indications point to a larger yield than in 1906. There have been the usual rumours about damage wrought by locusts, but these appear to be unfounded. Among the Ordinary stocks, Rosarios look especially promising. This is one of the few Argentine issues which offers scope for a higher dividend, seeing that it is still paying less than the 7 per cent. which is generally looked upon as the maximum the railways can distribute without invoking Government interference with tariffs. The report of the Rosario for the year is due shortly, and it should make very pleasant reading. It is not generally believed that the Company will increase its dividend in respect of the past twelve months, because for one thing it is desirous of first building up a strong reserve fund; and another thing, an advance in dividend before the Government gives its formal sanction to the amalgamation between the Rosario and the old Central Argentine would hardly be wise policy. Still the annual figures are likely to show that 8 per cent. has been earned, and that 7 per cent. could be paid after making fair provisions for reserves. Among Argentine Railway fixed interest-bearing securities there are two new ones that seem to have escaped the attention of many people. I refer first to the £10 shares of the Bahia Blanca and North Western Railway which bear interest at 4½ per cent., and are guaranteed by the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway. As these can be obtained at par, and rank for interest after the Debenture stocks of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific, there can be no question that they are a bargain. The other share to which I would draw attention is the £10 Preference issue of the Buenos Ayres Western. These shares also bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent., and can be bought at ¼ premium. Incidentally they look all the cheaper when compared with the same Company's £10 Five per Cent. Preference issue. This is quoted at £13, so that the yield is under 4 per cent. Of course, something has to be allowed for the fact that the banks will not lend upon partly paid securities, but this circumstance does not justify the present difference in yield of about ½ per cent. AMERICANS STEADILY SOLD—HEAVY LIQUIDATION BY A LARGE OPTION DEALING FIRM—SOUTHERN PACIFICS AND SENSATIONAL DIVIDEND RUMOURS—PUBLIC DISTRUST OF WALL STREET—THE HEAVY NEW ISSUE PROGRAMME—A READJUSTMENT OF EXISTING VALUES INEVITABLE.

Another week of liquidation has been experienced by the American Railroad Market, and while the selling pressure has been unaccompanied by any outward signs of disorder, it is noteworthy that less resistance was offered to the decline than for some months past. So far as the general public in this country is concerned, a fall in Yankees is a matter of little direct interest, brokers having for years past reported a growing disinclination on the part of their clients to touch Americans at the greatly enhanced values established. At the same time the course of the market is being very closely watched by the City, for the leading monetary centres of the world are now so closely interlinked that any upheaval in Wall Street would be bound to react in some degree upon London. There has during the last few days been considerable selling on behalf of a leading firm on this side, which apparently had been carrying an uncomfortably overloaded book in connection with the purchase of stock against options. The commitments open in Pacific stocks were said to be enormous, while Eries, Missouris, and Steels also appeared to have been accumulated with no sparing hand. Owing to the discrimination directed by the bank against Americans at the end of last year, this firm seems to have had great difficulty in obtaining carrying-over facilities for its heavy commitments, and at the last settlement matters are said to have reached a crisis—the outcome being seen in the persistent liquidation that has since been going on. A large proportion of the account is believed to have been taken "firm" by a leading New York house, doubtless to be nursed along with other big lines of stock until the first favourable opportunity for realising. Such an episode as this does not make for a more stable market, and, moreover, there is reason to believe that it is merely typical of what has been happening pretty frequently in Wall Street of late. It must not be too readily assumed that the liquidation made so much of lately has been of a character tending to restore the market to health. Liquidation that reduces the account carried on borrowed money and distributes stock amongst real investors is quite a different thing from the liquidation that simply involves the passing on of stock from one speculative group to another, and, unfortunately, it is the latter sort that we appear to have been witnessing. For some time past, indeed, New York financiers appear to have been kept busy taking in one another's washing. The public in the United States, owing to the demands made upon their resources in connection with the financing of their own growing businesses and to a number of other reasons, have for many months given little support to stocks. The action of Mr. Harriman and his friends in springing the Union and Southern Pacific dividend surprise upon the market was doubtless intended as a bold bid for public support, but, if so, it signally failed, and the criticism that such action aroused has turned what was meant to be a bait for the investor into a warning signal. During the past week reports have been going around that Mr. Harriman is preparing a surprise for the market that will even eclipse the episode of August last. The story is that the dividend on Southern Pacific due to be declared at the end of the month will be at the rate of 6 per cent. (as compared with nothing at this time a year ago and 5 per cent. last autumn), and that a further advance to 8 per cent. is contemplated for August. The report is coloured by the rumour that some fancy prices have been given for the call of the shares to September next. This is extraordinary enough to be regarded as absurd were it not that Harriman finance has been nothing else but extraordinary for some time. If the rumoured advance be made, it may, and probably would, cause a firework display in the market, but the good effect would be brief, and would be succeeded by an intensified distrust of Wall Street methods. For the present one would have thought the Union Pacific group had obtained notoriety enough in connection with the investigation now being made before the Inter-State Commerce Commission. The market has not yet got over the shock occasioned by the enormous stock operations conducted by Mr. Harriman, acting on a minute of the Board of Directors authorising him to pledge the credit of the Union Pacific for any purpose that seemed good to him. It was brought out in the evidence before the Commission that the Union Pacific had since June last bought, directly or through the Oregon Short Line, over $100,000,000 stocks of other railway Companies, including $28,125,000 Illinois Central stock, $39,500,000 Baltimore and Ohio, $14,285,000 New York Central, and several millions of Atchison, Milwaukee, and Chicago North-Western. The revelation of such widespread power placed in the hands of one man must surely suggest that the community of interest principle has been allowed to run to extremes, and it is probable that the evidence now being sifted will form the basis for legislative action to restrict the ability of railroad Companies raising funds for the purpose of buying up other Companies' stocks. Meanwhile, apart from the public distrust in the market leaders, monetary conditions are likely to continue a powerful "Bear" influence. The rapid expansion of trade in the United States is compelling the railroads to raise fresh capital for the purpose of building extensions and providing equipment, and it is difficult to see how new issues are to be placed in the present congested state of the New York Money Market without lowering prices of existing stocks. Mr. James J. Hill's recent assertion that the new capital requirements of the railroads would involve an annual expenditure during the next five years of $1,100,000,000 is perhaps a little hard to swallow, but, so far as the current year alone is concerned, the estimate looks like being under, rather than over, the mark, for a calculation just made shows that the capital authorised or issued recently amounts already to nearly a billion dollars. Several of the larger Companies, by issuing stock in "bonus" form —that is, by offering it to existing proprietors at considerably under the market value of the old—have managed to obtain the capital they needed, but the difficulty of getting new stock placed is increasing, and one or two Companies are attempting to raise the wind by the issue of short term notes. This form of borrowing is especially objectionable; it only tends to pile up the load of securities carried by the banks and trust Companies—for short-dated bills are not suitable for the public—and must, if carried to excess, inevitably lead to a crisis. The power of the railroad magnates—who also control the principal banks—and the intrinsic merits undoubtedly possessed by the leading railroad stocks render it unlikely that there will be anything in the nature of a panic, but a readjustment of existing values cannot be avoided. After all, the combination does not exist, in Wall Street or anywhere else, that can resist the power of the law of supply and demand. To be attractive to the public here the yields on stocks must be increased, and they cannot be legitimately increased, as a rule, by the payment of enlarged dividends, because while gross earnings are still increasing, expenses are going ahead at a faster ratio on account of increased capital, and big advances in the cost of materials and labour. The only alternative, then, is a lower level of prices for stocks, and towards this a fair start has already been made, as may be seen from the following table:—

WESTRALIANS REMAIN QUIET—OROYA AND BOULDER RUMOURS UNCONFIRMED—L. AND W. A. EXPLORATIONS AND LAKE VIEWS.

The activity in Mining descriptions has not yet spread to the Westralian market. Except in a few specialties business here is very limited, but the condition of the market is such that a transaction in a small number of shares usually causes a movement in the quotation. Were a brisk demand to arise, prices would be likely to rapidly advance, as dealers in this market are in very short supply of most of the shares. A rumour as to a breakdown of the Great Boulder mill caused a relapse in the price of those shares, but the story lacks confirmation, as does the rumour I referred to last week with respect to a favourable development in the Oroya Brownhill. There has been a fair amount of business in London and W.A. Explorations, in view of the Company's large holding in the Zinc Corporation, and the relapse in the latter naturally caused a decline in the price of the former. The L. and W.A. Exploration Company's report is expected to be issued at the end of February or the beginning of March, and it is confidently anticipated that it will herald the return of the Company to the list of dividend-payers. It will probably be found that the average cost of its large shareholding in Zincs is about half the current market quotation for those shares. Another Westralian Company with a Broken Hill interest is the Lake View Consols, which holds a large number of Broken Hill South Blocks. The latter have been more active the last week or so, and according to well-informed people the price is likely to materially advance in the course of the next few months. An important point in favour of the South Blocks is that its property adjoins the South mine. The ore developed in the bottom level of the latter is the highest grade as yet encountered in this property, and the South's ore bodies are all dipping into the South Blocks. Any material advance in Broken Hill South Blocks—which any time now is likely to start production—is likely to be reflected by Lake Views. Among the "Little Kangaroos," Chaffers are receiving attention, in view of the news from the mine. The Company is cross-cutting to prove the lode which was located by the diamond drill at a depth of 1,700 ft., and the manager has cabled that in view of the appearance of the country rock, he thinks they are in close proximity to the lode. As regards the financial position of the Company, it is stated that about £37,000 of its £100,000 capital is still intact. Deep Leads descriptions are inactive, but are likely to come into favour again as the time specified for the Loddon Valley to enter the wash in the deepest part of the ancient river bed draws near. KAFFIRS LESS ACTIVE BUT FIRM—PRINCIPAL MINES' RESULTS IN 1906—DEEP LEVEL DEVELOPMENTS AND PROSPECTS —DE BEERS AND PREMIERS.

Although the activity in Kaffirs witnessed during the first days of the current year has not been maintained, no serious relapse in prices has occurred. As the settlement now in progress approached there were realisations by those who had speculated for a quick turn, and in addition there was some liquidation said to be on behalf of a large option-dealing firm which had lately had extensive commitments in Yankees. The shares which came on the market, however, were easily absorbed, and on any relapse in prices buyers have come forward. This indicates that the Kaffir market is in a healthy condition, which is more than could be said for other sections which, with Kaffirs, have been receiving most speculative attention of late. The carry-over on Monday was easily arranged, and a favourable feature in connection with the settlement is that a fair amount of stock is being taken off the market. After a period of "marking time," Kaffirs will, it is anticipated, resume an active appearance, and unless conditions alter materially in the meanwhile, the fresh upward movement will start on a firm basis. A good deal of interest is naturally being evinced in regard to the Transvaal labour question, as so much depends upon how the matter is settled. At the meeting of the Van Ryn Company last week—this is one of the few Rand Companies which hold their meetings in London—the principal speakers had a good deal to say on the point. It is worthy of note that the views they expressed are in agreement with the opinion generally held in market circles, namely, that with responsible government in the Transvaal, the one remaining cloud, the uncertainty of the outlook as regards the supply of unskilled labour for the mines, will be satisfactorily cleared away. Mr. Leopold Albu, who should certainly have a good idea of the feeling in the colony, is strongly of opinion that the labour question, on which the prospects of the mining industry so largely depend, will be satisfactorily and definitely settled at no distant date. As Mr. Albu pointed out, the policy declared by the leaders of Het Volk—that it is opposed to the repatriation of the Chinese at work on the Rand until their place can be filled by Kaffirs or some other suitable substitute—is the identical policy of the mining industry. Pending the settlement of the labour question, some encouragement is to be derived from the results achieved by the principal producing mines during the past year. The official monthly statistics for the whole of the year being to hand, it is possible to gain a clear impression of the progress made. In the following table are given the results for 1906 of the leading mines which also contributed to the output during 1905:—

The above table includes fifty-three mines, and it will be seen that thirty-eight of them, or rather more than 70 per cent., made larger profits in 1906 than in the preceding year, the aggregate increase in net revenue amounting to £1,467,677. On the other hand, the profits of fifteen mines were lower by £352,222 than in 1905, leaving a balance to the credit of the past year of well over a million sterling. Providing the anticipations of a satisfactory settlement of the labour question are fulfilled, the aggregate results will in all probability be still better in the current year. To revert to the market position, a point of some importance to be noted in connection with the outlook is that a large sum of money is about to be distributed by South African Mining Companies, and it may reasonably be expected that a fair proportion of this money will come back into the market for re-investment. In course of the next month or six weeks thirty-eight Companies will distribute among their shareholders amounts ranging from £16,735 in the case of the Glynn's Lydenburg to £875,000 by the De Beers Consolidated Mines, and in all, these dividends aggregate nearly four millions sterling. The list is as follows:—

Of this large sum the principal "Trust" Companies will absorb a good share—the Consolidated Gold Fields, for instance, will take about half the Simmer and Jack's distribution, and a large portion of that paid by the Knight's Deep—but British and Continental holders of Kaffirs will still share a large amount, and no doubt they will use at any rate a fair proportion of it to add to their interests in this market. While outcrop descriptions are not devoid of attraction, there is an impression in market circles that Deep Levels are more likely to attract speculative attention in the early future. This view is based to some extent on the fact that in respect of many mines of this class prospects cannot be so accurately gauged as in the case of the majority of outcrops which have been at work, some of them for many years. In other words, there are "possibilities" which give scope for speculation. Moreover, interest in Deep Levels has just been stimulated by borehole results announced by the South Rand Company, and by talk of an amalgamation of that property with the Crown Deep and the deep-level claims owned by the Crown Reef. Some time ago an arrangement was made for the Crown Deep to continue its shafts on the incline to the boundary of the South Rand property to test the value of the reef at that point. The reef series has now been struck, and the assays of the diamond-drill cores, just reported, are very satisfactory. Official confirmation of the report as to an amalgamation is not forthcoming as yet, but it would not surprise me if a scheme were put forward sooner or later. Messrs. Wernher Beit are interested in each of the three Companies named, the Ecksteins are interested in the Crown Deep and the South Rand, while the Consolidated Gold Fields is interested in the South Rand only. The last-mentioned concern, having exhausted its capital, has been financed by the Consolidated Gold Fields and Rand Mines, the latter, according to its last annual report, holding more than half the shares issued by the South Rand Company. Rand Mines at the end of 1905 also held more than half the Crown Deep's share capital, and providing its interests in these two concerns have not been materially reduced, the development now announced is to be regarded as a "Bull" point for speculators in Rand Mines shares. Favourable reports are also current as to the position of other deep-level mines, Rose Deep and Ferreira Deep being specially mentioned. Amalgamation of the Jupiter and Simmer West is under consideration, and providing the terms finally decided upon are mutually satisfactory, the project would seem a desirable one, especially as the properties of the Companies concerned have for a long time been connected underground by various levels, and have been worked practically as one concern. In the Diamond group New Vaal Rivers keep fairly active, but De Beers and Premiers have come in for chief attention during the past week. In connection with the talk as to the De Beers Board intending to redeem the outstanding debentures it is suggested that a fresh issue of Deferred shares will be made to provide the requisite funds. According to one market statement, 100,000 Deferred shares will be issued at £20 each. The amount thus raised would, however, only be sufficient to redeem about one-half the Debenture debt. Another rumour credits the Board with an intention to offer 160,000 Deferred shares to shareholders for subscription at £25 each. Such an issue would raise enough to redeem the whole of the Debentures, but whether this rumour is any better founded than the other remains to be seen. As the settlement approached De Beers were pressed for sale in connection with the liquidation of large options entered into for the past account, but the price has picked up again, and in some quarters it is still thought that the shares will soar to £30 apiece. Jagersfontein also gave way on sales in connection with options, but have since displayed a rallying tendency, and will no doubt continue to move in sympathy with De Beers. Premiers have been weak, and it is said the shares have been attacked by the same "Bear" operators who were active in a like manner in the early part of the past year.

RHODESIANS UNDECIDED—CHARTERED A FIRM SPOT—OPTIMISTIC REPORT ON THE COUNTRY'S PROSPECTS.

Pending a revival of speculative interest in Rhodesian descriptions which it is thought will not be long delayed, prices move within narrow limits in sympathy with the leading Kaffirs, and the past week has witnessed little change in quotations, as the following table demonstrates:—

However, Chartered continue to be watched with a good deal of interest, and on any relapse buyers come forward, the expectation being that the forthcoming report will give a fillip to the Company's shares and to those of other Rhodesian concerns also. Meanwhile encouragement is to be derived from the cable received from Mr. Percy Inskipp, who is at present in Rhodesia. He is optimistic as to the prospects of the country. He reports that the acreage under cultivation shows a very large increase, and that a record season is anticipated. He adds that "the development during the past six months, both in mining and agriculture, is remarkable." This glowing report from Mr. Inskipp strengthens the belief that the forthcoming report of the Chartered Board will provide more pleasant reading for shareholders than any of its predecessors.

TREATISE ON OPTIONS.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to THE SECRETARY, LONDON & PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

WEST AFRICANS REVIVE—WASSAU DEVELOPMENTS—RELAPSE IN ZINCS—UNFOUNDED "SCARE" RUMOURS—COPPERS LOWER—SIBERIANS DULL.

A little renewal of interest is to be noted in the West African market, which for some time has been in a more or less stagnant condition, while other sections have been enjoying increased activity. The inquiry for Jungles during the past week has not resulted in any material improvement in quotations, but any recovery is likely to be very welcome to tired holders of shares of this class who have received so many disappointments. Encouragement is now derived from the fact of the latest Wassau progress report showing a marked improvement in values in the lower levels. This is all the more welcome, as the returns the Wassau has made since it resumed crushing a few months ago have been very poor, and have probably done as much as anything to check speculation in West Africans generally. The market has also derived a little satisfaction from the announcement that the Abosso has resumed crushing. It will be remembered that milling at this mine was interrupted by an accident, a rush of water from the old workings flooding the mine up to the No. 5 level. Option money has been offering on West Africans for the end-March account, which would indicate that there is a belief that interest in this market is likely to broaden in the immediate future. But for the lack of influential backing such as Kaffirs have, Jungles would probably not have languished for so long. As regards the Broken Hill group, business has continued active, but prices have suffered a relapse. The chief set-back has been experienced by Proprietaries and Zincs. In each of these shares a big "Bull" account had been built up, and consequently they were specially susceptible to any adverse influence. In the case of Proprietaries, sales against options which matured on Saturday caused a sharp break in the quotation, while Zincs were affected by several influences. Adverse rumours as to the Corporation's position and its new plant have been freely circulated, but the weakness of the shares has been due rather to the market position than to any fresh development in connection with the affairs of the Company itself. Heavy profit-taking sales on behalf of clients by a prominent firm gave rise to nervousness among the dealers interested, and this feeling was accentuated by the adverse rumours put in circulation. As a matter of fact, however, these rumours are unfounded. The story of the Corporation having no funds is absurd, as there still remains uncalled a large proportion of the money represented by the issue of new shares at 25s. each, and in all, I understand, the Company has £150,000 available resources. That the process employed for extracting the zinc from the tailings is a failure is disproved by the fact that a portion of the new plant which has been brought into operation has, despite difficulties which will ultimately be overcome, given an extraction equal to official anticipations. Moreover, the Corporation is not limited to the use of one process. As to the plant itself, there has been some difficulty in getting it into proper working order owing to the non-delivery of special machinery, but the manager, who is a metallurgical expert of high standing, is confident that the difficulties will be rectified in the course of a few weeks. Last week I suggested, in anticipation of some profit-taking, that intending purchasers of Zincs might, by waiting a little, be able to purchase to better advantage, and the hint has been justified by events, but it must not be assumed that I consider the prospects of the enterprise unfavourable. On the information available the shares appear a promising holding, and they are, of course, of a less speculative nature than ordinary mining shares, as the material the Company will deal with will be already on the surface. In some quarters, however, determined opposition has been and is being shown towards the undertaking. Attempts have frequently been made to frighten holders into selling their shares, and all sorts of "scare" rumours have been invented. Yet so far as I can learn there is not a big "Bear" position in the shares, so that those who have been so actively engaged in propagating false rumours to create an unfavourable impression as to the character of the undertaking have evidently not had the courage to act in accordance with their professed views. It has been suggested to me that the strong prejudice displayed by some market men is the outcome of either a feeling of ill-will towards the people in control of the Zinc Corporation or of interest in some rival scheme. Very likely there is something in both these suggestions, and considering all the circumstances I think that those who have disregarded the attempts made to scare them into throwing their shares on the market will have reason to feel satisfied at no very distant date. Even the recent batch of rumours I have alluded to above did not disturb the public to any extent; on the contrary, I am informed that on the relapse in the quotations buying orders came in from the provinces. This sign of confidence in the future of the undertaking should not be lost sight of by those who may be "Bearing" the shares, or they may find themselves in an unpleasant situation before very long, as did those who persistently "Beared" Oroyas a few years ago. With the two most active shares, other members of the Broken Hill group sympathetically weakened, but it is expected that the Account which has just opened will witness some recovery. Realisation has also been in progress in the Copper group, especially in the Australian issues which have come into prominence during the last few months, and in which a big "Bull" account has been built up. Mount Lyells have given way with other things, but in view of the continuance of satisfactory news as to the development of the North Lyell mine at depth it is thought Mount Lyells will be one of the first to substantially recover, and in the market it is confidently predicted that the price will reach £3 before very long. One or two interesting announcements have to be noted in connection with Siberian descriptions. The Directors of the Orsk Goldfields have issued a statement on the "titles" question to the effect that the Russian Ministry of Finance has officially notified the Company that on December 30 last the Company was formally authorised to hold and to work its mines in its own name. This announcement, however, had only a slight and temporary beneficial effect upon the shares, the general tendency of which, in common with that of the majority of the group, has been in the downward direction. Siberian Props made up on Monday 5¼ lower than at the previous carry-over, and already show a decline on the current account. Of the Indian Gold shares, Coromandels are now quoted at only a few pence, in consequence of the proposal to reconstruct for the fourth time. Shareholders meet to-day to consider the scheme, which involves a fresh liability of 6s. 8d. per share. As it is proposed to expend the money raised on a new property in the Dharwar district, the proprietors may feel more disposed to put their hands in their pockets again than if they were asked to pursue a forlorn hope in further developing their old property on the Kolar field. Insurance Notes—Amalgamations among Life Offices—Proprietors and Policy-holders—Mutualisation of Proprietary Companies—Lists of Policy holders—The Absorption of the Union.

Last week I referred to the probable absorption of the Union Fire and Life Office by the Commercial Union and dealt generally with the pros and cons of amalgamations among insurance Companies: but I had no space for the more important question, from the policy-holders' point of view, of amalgamations among life offices. Whereas in other branches of the business the whole of the profits go to the shareholders and the policy-holders have a relatively small stake in the companies' welfare, in life assurance Companies the participating policy-holders take nearly the whole of the surplus, and the life funds, which are normally vastly more than the share capital, are the sole property of the assured.

In the majority of proprietary Companies only the shareholders have any voice in the management, the policy-holders being almost powerless to influence their own affairs. It must be recognised that shareholders having started a life office, and, in early days, having run the risk of success or failure, are fully entitled to be paid. At the same time the existence of share capital is no benefit of any sort or kind to the policy-holders. No Company, except perhaps a very new one, that is not super-abundantly secure without the share capital can be made safe by adding the capital to the life assurance funds. There is thus no discoverable benefit to policy-holders from the existence of share capital, though some proprietary Companies are so well managed and the interests of their policy-holders made so predominant that they are fully as advantageous for their policy-holders as mutual offices. At the same time it has to be recognised as beyond question that mutual offices as a class are better than proprietary offices as a class. In saying this I am not thinking of recently established proprietary Companies, but considering both proprietary and mutual offices that have been established for, say, fifty years. One bad result of the Life Assurance Companies' Act, of 1870, which in other ways has worked extremely well, was to make the formation of a new mutual office practically impossible, but in these days of amalgamations attention might well be called to the advisability of mutualising some of the proprietary life Companies. A case in point is the Star, whose proprietors and policy-holders decided by a big majority not to consider the proposed amalgamation about which so much has been said. With a share capital of only £5,000 and a life assurance fund of more than £6,000,000 it is really absurd that the shareholders should take one-tenth of the profits, and it would be a great improvement if arrangements could be made for buying out the shareholders. An appropriate prelude to the mutualisation of proprietary Companies would be that all holders of participating life policies above a certain amount should be given a vote, and thus be able to override the decisions of the shareholders, if necessary, in the interests of the assured. The Star gives votes to certain holders of whole life policies, but those who have endowment assurance policies have no vote. Even this arrangement is exceptional, since in most Companies the proprietors only are entitled to vote. Without wishing to see legislation interfere with insurance matters to a greater extent than can be helped, it seems to me that a valuable amendment to the Life Assurance Companies' Acts would be to give voting power to the policy-holders, and to provide that at the request of not less than, say, fifty policy-holders, the names and addresses of all the assured in the possession of votes should be communicated to a policy-holders' committee.

Since the stake of policy-holders is many times greater than that of the shareholders in practically every life office, it is plainly inappropriate that the assured should have no voice in the election of Directors or the management of the Company. I am quite well aware that while things are going well policy-holders do not trouble to exercise the votes which they have in mutual societies; but the power is there in case of need, and the occasion for the exercise of such power on the part of the policy-holders is more likely to arise in proprietary than in mutual Companies. Apart from crucial questions like amalgamation, many points occur upon which policy-holders should be able to express an opinion and take concerted action; for instance, it is frequently the case that a proprietary Company spends more money than is good from a policy-holder's point of view, in order to obtain a large new business. This course tends to decrease the bonuses to policy-holders, while increasing the dividends to shareholders. The evil may seldom be great enough to call for special agitation on the part of the policy-holders, but if a certain number of Directors were elected by the assured their interests would, at least in some cases, be better looked after than they are now.

The laws of New York have made it compulsory upon the insurance Companies to give access to the names and addresses of all their policy-holders. I believe any one can demand the right to copy the list. This is perhaps going too far, but it would seem quite fitting that a list of policy-holders should be supplied to any fairly representative committee. The chief difficulty in bringing about co-operation among policy-holders is that they have no means of communicating with one another. The Act of 1870 having made the formation of new mutual offices impossible, there is much to be said in favour of an amending Act, giving policy-holders a share in the management, and perhaps making it possible to convert proprietary Companies into mutual societies, of course on terms that would be fair to the shareholders.

Returning more directly to the question of amalgamations, there seems to me little doubt that these are as a rule beneficial to the policy-holders. If a life office is in a thoroughly flourishing condition, it is not in the least likely to surrender its separate existence, while when a life assurance Company finds itself in a bad way it can almost always sell its business to a strong office on terms which produce better bonuses for the participating policy-holders than they would be likely to receive from the original Company, besides providing greater security for all the assured. As I pointed out last week, the absorption of many small fire or accident Companies into one big one, and the tariff combination among these big Companies, tends to create a trust or combine, with practically unlimited power; and this might, at some time or other, result in oppressive terms for policy-holders. It does not seem to me that any such trust is possible in connection with life assurance, since in mutual offices the whole of the profits, and in proprietary Companies usually nine-tenths of the profits, go to the policy-holders; the policy-holders are the only people out of whom excessive profits could be made, and they are the only people to whom excessive profits could be paid; consequently, any fear of a Life Assurance Trust seems to me altogether groundless. I do not yet know what terms the Union will receive for the sale of its business. The Company was founded as a fire office in 1714, and from the point of view of sentiment the disappearance of so old a Company is to be regretted; but it has incurred very heavy fire losses in recent years, and I am by no means sure that amalgamation is not almost a necessity. The life branch of the Union was founded in 1813, and has never been much of a success; I do not think it has a single policy to offer which is so good as can be obtained elsewhere, and so, as existing policy-holders are likely to gain, and as the disappearance of the Union will deprive the public of the opportunity of assuring relatively badly, the absorption of the Company is perhaps not to be objected to.

"On the Scientific Increase of Income."

There has recently been a violent eruption of seductively worded newspaper advertisements—one of them was offered for insertion in TRUTH, but refused—inviting small investors to apply to Arnold and Butler, 124, Holborn, E.C., for a book "On the Scientific Increase of Income." The small investor is given to understand that this precious treatise will show him how to obtain ten, twenty, or even thirty per cent. for his money "with scarcely any risk," while if he is courageous enough to go in for something of "a more speculative character" his capital can be doubled and at times trebled. Being, of course, pure philanthropists, Arnold and Butler not only give away this wonderful work, together with a quantity of other equally fascinating literature, but generously offer the small investor the benefit of their valuable services in the execution of the scheme whereby he is to amass a fortune. They are ready, in fact anxious, to relieve him of any trouble in the matter; all that he has to do is to accept their disinterested advice and send them his money for investment "on margin." That is the beginning of the process, and no doubt Arnold and Butler can be relied upon to see that it is the end, too.

By the way, I was glad to see that in the Daily Mail last Tuesday Mr. Charles Duguid—a financial journalist for whom I have great respect—made some forcible remarks on the "many scandals that are arising in connection with the dealings of silly people with circularising outside brokers of low class," and the urgent necessity for some measure to protect the public from these bucket-shop harpies. It was, however, rather disappointing to observe on the opposite page of the Daily Mail one of the flamboyant advertisements of the above-mentioned firm of Arnold and Butler. Pending legislation on the subject, my contemporary's City Editor might perhaps do something to check the operations of "low-class" outside brokers by pressing his own excellent views on the attention of the advertisement manager of the Daily Mail.

Milne, Son and Hamilton, 11, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., are—as I indicated some months ago—another of the benevolent firms whose unselfish aim it is to make money for you or me, or any other stranger, rather than for themselves. "Despite our having addressed you continually," they wrote to a correspondent the other day, "we regret to notice that we are still without your esteemed commands," and so in order to prove their "undeniable bona fides" they offered as "a special inducement" to open an account for him with the small sum of twenty shillings, though it was contrary to their custom to do so with less than £5. Needless to say, on the operation they recommended the twenty shillings would have been a gift to Milne, Son and Hamilton.

Publications for Investors.

Mr. Thomas Skinner's "Stock Exchange Year Book," now in its thirty-third year of publication, has such a well-established reputation as a work of reference that one need say but a few words in welcoming the appearance of the 1907 edition. As usual, the preface is devoted to a concise review of the past financial year, and the 2,000 odd pages to which the volume runs are filled with admirably digested information relating to the origin, history, and present condition of each of the public securities and joint-stock Companies known to the markets of the United Kingdom. Not only is the information about each security or Company carefully compiled and clearly set forth, but the contents of the volume are most conveniently arranged for the purpose of ready reference. The Year Book is published at 77-81, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, E.C., price 28s. net.

Messrs. Spottiswoode and Co., Limited, 54, Gracechurch-street, E.C., have sent me a copy of the annual edition of "The Stock Exchange Handbook," a work which gives investors a mass of useful information in a compact form. I have also received from Messrs. F. C. Mathieson and Sons, 16, Copthall-avenue, E.C., the 1907 issue of their well-known "Highest and Lowest Prices," giving the extreme fluctuation of every stock officially quoted on the Stock Exchange, with dividends for the past six years; their "Provincial Highest and Lowest," and their handy half-yearly "Traffic Tables" and "American Traffic Tables." Other publications that have reached me include "Horncastle's Manual" (61, Cheapside, E.C.) and "The Mount Lyell Mining Manual" (Effingham Wilson, 54, Threadneedle-street, E.C.); while the Financial Review of Reviews has forwarded one of the neat cabinets that are now supplied for the convenient filing of twelve numbers of that monthly.

New Issue.

The following prospectus is published:—

The United Motor Cab Company, Limited.—This Company has been formed "for the purpose of acquiring as a going concern the business of the City and Suburban Motor Cab Company, Limited, together with their existing service of motor cabs, and of further increasing the business by placing upon the streets of London an additional supply of motor cabs and cars for public use under contracts with the Société des Automobiles Unic (George Richard and Co.), and with A. Darracq and Co. (1905) Limited." The capital of the United Motor Cab Co. is £253,000, divided into 250,000 Preferred Ordinary shares of £1 each, and 60,000 Deferred shares of 1s. each. Of the Preferred Ordinary shares 199,537 are now offered for subscription. The list will open to-day and close on or before Friday.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Railways.

Medicus.—Purchase only if you are prepared to put them away for a time. J. J., Rochester.—You are being needlessly alarmed by such irresponsible criticism of the Company. Do not sell. Tyro.—I am glad to know that you took my advice and profited by it. Of course you understand that the shares you have now bought are decidedly speculative. Christoper.—There is every probability of a good appreciation in the near future. Chagford.—Central London Ordinary is a sound investment, and worth holding for a higher price. You will find a reference to the stock in this week's article. Amiens.—I do not care for Nos. 2 and 3, but the others should be held. Exmoor.—I would suggest Buenos Ayres Western New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference. Petrol.—Grand Trunk First Preference, Buenos Ayres Westerns New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference and Central London Preferred should meet with your requirements. Better spread the money over the three. F. M.—Canadian Pacific Preference, Grand Trunk Pacific Four per Cent. bonds, Buenos Ayres and Pacific First Preference, National of Mexico Four and a Half per Cent. Prior Lien bonds, and Central London Preferred. The average yield would be about 4 per cent. Aberdeen.—Great Northern (U.S.A.) Preferred is quoted at about 173. This is "cum," the stock rights estimated as worth 20. These rights were deducted from the price at one time, but have since been restored, owing to the attempts being made in the courts to prevent the new stock being issued. The value of the ore rights was about 84. Northern Pacifics are quoted at about 156. The rights recently deducted were appraised at 24. Sonka.—For investment I should give the preference to Trunk Thirds, but I cannot pretend to foresee what price the stock will stand at five years hence. Interest on Chillagoe Debentures has been permanently reduced to 5 per cent., except in any year during which shareholders in the company shall have been paid dividends in excess of 1s. per share, when for such year the interest is to be 6 per cent. I have once or twice referred to the bucket-shop you mention. Welshman.—The Company does not publish traffic returns. The bonds can only be regarded as a speculation.

Mines.

H. M'E.—Yes, at the current price they are a fair speculative investment. I do not answer inquiries by post. T. W., Aberdeen.—Your South Africans are good, and you ought not to think of selling them at present prices. Anchor.—Yes, I still consider the shares a hopeful speculative lock-up. Leona.—You might secure the profit available on your present holding, and purchase London and W.A. Explorations, on which an early dividend seems probable. White Horse.—Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are fair speculative purchases with a view to a moderate profit in a buoyant market; but the others do not offer much attraction just now. F. J. S.—I have not heard a price for the Diamond Syndicate's shares, but you could acquire an interest in them by purchasing the shares of the present Company. I cannot reply by letter. Sphinxalex.—1. Very speculative, and you could probably do better in something else. 2. A fairly hopeful speculation, but other shares in the same group are more active. 3. Not very attractive. 4. I do not care to recommend such an operation. A. W. J.—Thanks for the papers. The amalgamation scheme is certainly not attractive. Anxious.—Hold all three. 24.—A three months' call option on Arizonas would be a fairly hopeful speculation. Kraft, Aberdeen.—Both are promising purchases at present prices. Captain, Lichfield.—1. Hold. 2. A pure speculation. 3. A hopeful holding for dividends. 4. The market is talking them to a higher price, but they are highly speculative.

Mixed Securities.

Safety.—1. Hold these shares for the present. 2. I do not recommend them. 3. These are excellent. M., Cardiff.—For a permanent investment your selection is very good, though I think it would be better to leave out No. 4. Nap.—1. A fair speculation with a reasonable prospect of improvement in value. 2. Not very promising. Peter Pan.—1. This stock is likely to have a recovery within the next month or so. 2. You should keep these shares also. 3. Make the exchange you mention. 4. I will give the desired list under this heading next week; it requires careful consideration. Puzzled.—1. This is an obscure Company, and the shares are not at all a desirable purchase. 2. They may be worth buying as a speculative lock-up. 3. I have no information regarding this matter. 4. I printed last week a table showing the yields obtainable on bank shares, including Lloyds and the London and South-Western. Orion.—Your list is a very fair one, though I would leave out No. 3, as the shares look like going lower. Pax.—1, 2, and 3. Should be inclined to average. 4. May improve, but speculative. Am sorry your previous letter was overlooked. Gipsy.—3. Hold Zincos. 4. A fair speculation. 5. I do not look for much early advance in either. 1, 2, and 6. Will reply next week. Perseus.—1. No information. 2. Of the two I should prefer the Japanese Four and a Half per Cents. Benula.—Your little list of twenty-four inquiries shall receive attention. In the meantime I should hold the first five and the last five. Rusticus.—1. There is the possibility you mention, and as you can see a handsome profit you had better take it. 2. See remarks in my article this week. R. C. W.—Hold all of them for the present. Como.—1. The Tin shares seem a good holding for dividends, but for an early advance in market value you might do better in the market suggested. 2. The shares may go lower yet, though on any further break they ought to be worth buying to put away. 3. As you suggest, you could probably employ your money to better advantage than on these shares just now. Panama.—Hold all.

Miscellaneous.

Innocent.—There was no enclosure in your letter, but the question you ask leaves little doubt that the circular came from a bucket-shop. Have nothing to do with such people. Victim.—You should have noted my warnings. "Blythe, Gould, and Co.," and "The Globe and Lancashire Stock Exchange," were two aliases of the same individuals. They are now in the hands of the police. J. E. S.—You should write to the secretary of the Company at Manchester. W. M., Tiverton.—At the price of £1 15s. and on the current dividend Rio de Janeiro Flour Mills shares would yield £8 11s. 3d. per cent. Gondolier.—I am unable to say whether the attacks on the concern have any real justification. Widow.—Be content with the lower interest and greater security of your present investment. Disgusted.—Sell if you can. N. B., Chester.—It is contrary to my rules to recommend or name brokers. A list of members of the Stock Exchange can be obtained from the secretary. Mendips.—The position of the Company is not altogether satisfactory; but I do not think you need fear any default in the preference dividend. Charles S.—My opinion is that you would be throwing good money after bad by taking the course proposed. Dum Dum.—It is a progressive and flourishing concern, and you will find it difficult to get a better return for your money with an equal degree of safety. D. M., Liverpool.—"Martin Bull" is one of the bucket-shop brigade with whom I have repeatedly dealt. St. Enoch.—Do you really imagine that you can get 10 per cent. and gilt-edged security? If you do, you have a lot to learn, and you may find the lesson rather costly. H. J. H., Manchester.—I know nothing whatever about the concern except that the shares are now scarcely saleable. Jesmond.—By this time you will have seen the reports in the daily papers. Zogloba.—These foreign lottery bonds are a sheer gamble, and you should not on any account deal with the Paris concern mentioned. If you want to buy some of the bonds write to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. Nestor.—1. No, it is a concern of the bucket-shop class. See preceding answer. 2. Take your profit. 3. Such information is constantly given in my article. Uncertain.—See answer to "Zogloba." Preston.—It is too early yet to express an opinion as to this Company. Sunsea.—As you recognise that a certain amount of risk has to be taken, I see no objection to either of the shares named. K., Dublin.—Get rid of them at any price. As you say, it is a pity you did not act upon my advice last September. Gudgeon.—A bucket-shop swindler. You may help to have him brought to justice if you communicate with the police. F. S., Bristol.—By exercising a little patience you may be able to average on better terms. J. T., Belfast.—I know nothing of the firm. Limerick.—I am making inquiries. Novice.—I cannot advise as to the soundness of the concern, and only recommend dealing with members of the Stock Exchange. X. Y. Z., Chatham.—Keep them for the present. Pekoe.—I am unacquainted with the firm, but I recommend you to deal with a member of the Stock Exchange. Vane.—The official "business done" quotation on that day was 100¾.

Insurance.

J. G. M.—Your letter is interesting, but I did not refer to liberality of conditions. I approved the specification of amounts of surrenders, etc., and options of settlement. The suicide clause is seldom absent from British policies. In regard to your objections, interest is not likely in practice to be charged for days of grace; interest on loans is rightly at a higher rate, since interest earned is higher; selection of paid-up insurance or cash value within three months is not of much moment, and absence of bonus for the first year is wise, because practically no company earns profits in the first year. No bonus in the first year is the rule in one company only. Yankee, Belfast.—You should certainly continue paying premiums. The company is perfectly sound and much better than before. Jectona. — This Insurance Company is not so popular as some, but there is nothing to be said against it. Roma. — 1. The Company is sound, and its present representative of the highest standing. As no claim may arise for many years, its absence from this country is objectionable. It depends on your age and the kind of policy you have whether you should continue paying premiums or not. 2. I do not advise a purchase, as shares of this description, whilst easy to buy, are sometimes difficult to sell.

INDUSTRIALS DULL—PEKING SYNDICATE DISAPPOINTMENT—"BAYS" DEPRESSED—ANGLO-AMERICAN SURPRISE—LONDON DOCKS SPURT—IMPERIAL TOBACCO SHARES.

In common with other departments, the Miscellaneous market generally has been stagnant, though there have been a few interesting movements. One of the most noteworthy was a relapse in Peking Syndicate shares on the appearance of the report to be submitted at the meeting this week. In the main, it is made up of somewhat ancient history, being furnished with accounts only to December 31, 1905, but its tenor was regarded as disappointing. It is admitted that no work has been done on the Shansi concessions. In the northern area this is owing to local hostility and a dispute with the Chinese Governor, who refuses to grant the necessary permit except on impossible conditions; and in the southern area no progress can be made until the completion of a railway, which will be a difficult and costly line to build. As to the Honan concession, it seems to be doubtful whether the coal from the mine that has been opened up will be worth working. All this has, of course, had the effect of strengthening the demand of a number of the shareholders for additions to or changes on the directorate with the view to the adoption of a more vigorous policy. Hudson's Bays have suffered somewhat in sympathy with Canadian Pacifics, but a recovery in the near future may be confidently anticipated. Perhaps the greatest surprise of the week was the announcement of a dividend of 35s. per cent. on Anglo-American Deferred. Two years ago this stock received nothing, and last year the dividend was only 10s. per cent. An increase this time was justifiably counted upon, but not so much as 35s. per cent., a rate that has not even been approached for years past. There has been considerable business in London and India Docks Deferred stock on the declaration of a dividend of 2¼ per cent. for the year, as compared with 1¾ per cent. for 1905. The rise in the price of the stock to 64 appears, however, to have been largely attributable to what seem to be decidedly shadowy hopes of some beneficial result being obtained from possible legislation affecting the Port of London. The report of the Imperial Tobacco Company, Limited, recommends a dividend of 10 per cent., free of income tax, on the deferred Ordinary shares and an allocation of a quarter of a million sterling to the reserve account. This is the best distribution on the deferred shares that has yet been made, and such a proof of the growing prosperity of the Company must obviously improve the position of its debentures and Preference and Preferred Ordinary shares, which at the existing quotations are well worth the attention of investors. Textiles have been quieter than for some time past, and Brewery shares have also been inactive, such slight changes as were recorded being mostly in a downward direction. The strike of music-hall artists excited momentary attention, but does not appear to have been regarded very seriously, the effect on music-hall shares being very trifling. An interesting review of the past year was given by Mr. J. Spencer Phillips in his speech at the meeting of Lloyds Bank, Limited, at Birmingham, on Friday. Though the year was undoubtedly a profitable one to bankers, it is, he pointed out, a mistake to suppose that a very high Bank rate is ipso facto a thing to be desired by them, not the least important of many countervailing effects being the depreciation which takes place in the value of investments. The balance-sheet presented to the shareholders of Lloyds was of a very satisfactory character. The available profit was £889,853, an increase of £123,899, of which £55,688 was attributable to the amalgamation with the Devon and Cornwall Bank. The dividend declared was at the rate of 18¾ per cent.

QUEER STORY.

OVER THE GARDEN WALL.

IT was generally agreed by all who knew her that Hallie Simcox ought to have been born a boy; for a boy she was, and a man she subsequently became, in everything except the accident of sex. And this accident was the more unfortunate, inasmuch as she was the only child of Squire Simcox, a man of old family and considerable estate, who badly wanted an heir male to his name and his property. There had been Simcoxes at Simcox Manor in unbroken succession for four hundred years, and now the good old name threatened to become extinct.

This was a source of great distress to the Squire, and was, indeed, particularly vexing, because his daughter Hallie came so very near being a boy. If she had been a girlish girl, thoroughly feminine in character as well as in sex, it would have been less provoking to the old gentleman. But the fact of her being a boyish girl, entirely masculine in everything except sex, made it unspeakably tantalising. When one misses one's heart's desire by miles, one seldom frets much about it. The distance between hope and fulfilment is too great. But when one just misses it by inches, it always galls and irritates. It is like being proxime accessit for a Balliol scholarship or losing the Derby by a short head.

From her earliest youth, Hallie Simcox had shown pronounced masculine proclivities. Strong and active, she could run and jump and climb trees, and play cricket and rounders, with any lad of her years. There was another thing she could do, and she was the only girl I have ever known capable of it: she could shy. That was enough, of itself, to differentiate Hallie from all the rest of her sex.

As she grew older, she became an ardent devotee of field sports. What she didn't know, at eighteen, about dogs and horses, about foxes, pheasants, and partridges, wasn't worth knowing. No gamekeeper in the county was a more thorough master of that branch of knowledge which is known as woodcraft. No huntsman in the Shires showed to better advantage across country. She adopted the straddle-wise seat (a much more daring departure from convention then than it is now), and could ride anything anywhere. To see her piloting a team or a tandem was an object-lesson in ribbon-handling. To watch her bring down rocketers with her twenty-bore was a polite education in the art of covert-shooting; and to hear her express herself when an unsportsmanlike horseman from town rode through young wheat was a study in robust phraseology.

"God bless 'er 'eart," old Dick Spenceley, huntsman to the local pack, was often heard to declare, with appreciative gusto, "she du talk somethink proper, she du. Squire ain't bad, when 'e's put out; but 'e's a fule to little missie, bless 'er 'eart."

In addition to all her other masculine qualities, the fair Hallie added that of being supremely masterful. She had an imperious—not to say dictatorial—way with her, that somehow compelled obedience. Indeed, I can flatter myself that I was about the only person who had much to do with her (always excepting the Squire, her father), upon whom she was not in the habit of sitting unmercifully. But then, I am a man of exceptionally determined character. Besides, Hallie and I were the best of chums.

This frank good comradeship had begun when she was in pinafores and I in knickers, and it had continued uninterruptedly ever since. It was comradeship, too, pure and simple, into which the question of sex never entered. To all intents and purposes, Hallie was a boy—in my estimation, as well as in her own. Both our lives were devoted to field sports. We rode, drove, shot, hunted, and fished together, on a footing of perfect equality. I never showed her any of those conventional courtesies which custom exacted from me towards other girls; partly because such a thing never occurred to me where Hallie was concerned, partly, also, because she would certainly have resented it if I had. A man in disposition, she liked to be treated as a man; and so, I say, it never crossed my mind to treat her as anything else.

Well, things went on smoothly enough for my chum, and she continued to lead her frankly mannish and sporting existence, like the good fellow she was, until she attained her twenty-third year. Then the Squire suddenly exploded a bomb upon her, which caused a great upset.

I had seen for some days that she was not herself, but that something was evidently troubling her, and one afternoon, while we were out riding together, she confided to me what it was.

"I say, Dick," she began, in her frank, direct way—which was like her riding across country, always straight from point to point, no matter what jumps had to be negotiated—"I say, Dick, old man, there's something I want to speak to you about. You're the best pal I've got, and I'm counting on you to stand by me. Fact is, I'm in rather a tight place."

"What is it, Hal, old fellow? What's up now?"

"It's the pater," she answered, with a worried, aggrieved frown. "He wants me to marry."

"To marry?" I ejaculated, very much taken aback; for the idea of this good fellow and hardy sportsman doing anything so weak as to go the way of other girls and submit herself to any man in the capacity of wife had never entered my head, even in my wildest dreams.

"Yes, to marry," she answered, with a scornful little laugh. "Did you ever hear such beastly rot?"

"But what's your pater's object?" I inquired.

"Oh, his object would be reasonable enough in itself if I were like other girls," she admitted, though with some reluctance. "He says I'm the last of our family, and he looks to me to perpetuate the line and the name."
